PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENT.

The present is an age, and ours is a country, demanding great condensation and brevity in writers who would secure attention. So active are busy are the habits of the mass of our countrymen, that they have neither time nor patience to turn and peruse the pages of the cumbersome quartos and folios of the 17th century; while a tolerable competency would scarcely suffice for the purchase of the numerous works of which the modern press is so fruitful, on the subjects embraced in this volume. The work then, combining and condensing the most valuable results of the researches of the best writers on any subject, while it will be most likely to be received with favor, will at the same time be best calculated to facilitate the acquisition, and consequently the diffusion of knowledge. With these views the "COMPREHENSIVE COMMENTARY on the Bible" was projected; and its unprecedented sale has encouraged the same publishers to offer to the public the present volume. The subjects embraced in this work are interesting to ALL, and as it is not designed to be in the least sectarian, or denominational, it cannot fail to be desirable for all, whether professedly religious or not, at least as a book of reference.

The following are some of the peculiarities of the plan:—

1. It is designed to be a standard and permanent work; and here it is believed will be found collected and compressed in one super-royal octavo volume of upwards of twelve hundred pages, in a shape combining convenience and cheapness, and in a style blending the sweetness of the popular with the richness of the profound, what has heretofore been scattered through more than fifty volumes, and mixed with much of little or no value. Among the works, all the valuable matter of which will be found in this, together with some from which copious extracts have been made, are the following:—

BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATION.

Calmer's Dictionary of the Bible; Brown's do.; Barr's do.; Wells' Scripture Geography; Horne's Introduction; Harris' Scripture's Natural History; Abbott's edition of Carpenter's do.; Faxon's Illustrations of Scripture; Draper's do.; Harmer's Observations; John's Archeology; Mrs. Sherwood's Dictionary of Types and Emblems; Barber's Oriental Customs; Josephus' Jewish Customs; Keith's Evidence of Prophecy; Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium; Robinson's Biblical Repository; Crable's English Synonymes.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

Moshem's History of the Christian Church; Miner's do.; Jones' do.; Waddington's do.; Nessler's do.; Murdock's Elements of Doctrinal History; Lord King's History of the Primitive Church; Robinson's History of Baptism; Siametti's History of the Crusades against the Albigenses.

RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY.

Fox's Lives of the Martyrs; Middleton's Eccelesiastical Biography; Jones' Christian Biog.; Davenport's Dictionary of Biography; Universal Biographical Dictionary; Betham's Female Biography; Gissold's

Last Hours of Eminent Christians; Ismyne's History of the Baptists; Benedict's do.; Mather's Magnalia; Elliot's American Biography; Allen's do.; Memoirs of American Missionaries; Encyclopedia Americana.

THEOLOGY.

Buck's Theological Dictionary, enlarged by Dr. Henderson; Jones' Biblical Cyclopaedia; Hawker's Biblical Dictionary; Watson's Biblical and Theological Dictionary; Christian Examiner; Campbell's Dissertations; Dwight's Theology; Spirit of the Pilgrims; Works of Andrew Fuller; do. of Robert Hall; Douglas on the Advancement of Society in Knowledge and Religion.

CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS.

Evans' Sketch of Religious Denominations; Jones' Dictionary of Religious Opinions; Hannah Adams' do.; Robbins' do.; Douglas on Errors regarding Religion; Benedict's History of All Religions; Watson's Dictionary of do.; Ward's Female Letters; Edwards' Quarterly Register.

MISSIONS.

Edwards' Missionary Gazetteer.

Many articles are original, especially those relating to the principal denominations in this country, as will be seen on reference to the fourth paragraph below.

2. It is designed for a complete book of reference on ALL religious subjects; to which a person can turn when any thing occurs in reading or conversation connected with Religion which he does not understand, or in regard to which he wishes to refresh his memory, as he would to a dictionary for a definition of a word. Nearly every subject treated in the books which form the basis of this, is touched upon; but those which are of minor importance are very brief, and those of greater utility handled more at length. Articles rarely recurred to will be found here; but it is not burdened with any thing that is altogether useless.

3. In Theology, the general plan of Buck's Dictionary is followed; especially in its evangelical cast and Christian candor, in its copious illustrations of important topics, and its valuable references to the best works on both sides of the question. Watson, Jones, and others, however, have supplied us occasionally with articles of superior value.

4. The edition of Buck which has been used is the new one lately published in England, edited by Prof. HENDERSON, who has added nearly five hundred new articles, which will be found incorporated in this.

5. The accounts of the History, Doctrines, &c. of different denominations, have been prepared with an aim at the strictest impartiality. Where it was practicable some leading man of the principal sects existing in this country has been employed to prepare the article relating to it; and where it has not been, the matter has been drawn from some one or more prominent writers of the denomination, of acknowledged authority. THE WORK DOES NOT AIM TO EFFECT A COMPROMISE of opinions among the different denominations of Christians, but to present the views of each fully, and in their own words, leaving the reader to form his own conclusions as to which is most correct. This must be a truly acceptable course to all who can respond to the sentiment quoted by Robert Hall, "Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica VERITAS."

The following are some of the contributors under this head:—

BAPTISM. Pedobaptist Views, Rev. J. TRACY, Editor of the Boston Recorder. Baptist Views, Rev. J. D. KNOWLES, Professor in the Newton Theological Institution.

BAPTISTS. Prepared under the revision and sanction of Rev. Dr. SHARP, Boston.

CONGREGATIONALISTS. Prepared by a member, and revised and sanctioned by Rev. Prof. EMERSON, of Andover Theological Seminary, and Rev. Dr. WENGER, of Boston.

CHRISTIANS. Rev. J. V. HIMES, BOSTON.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, or REFORMERS. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, of Bethany, Virginia.

FREE WILL BAPTISTS. Rev. S. BRICE, Editor of the Morning Star, Dover, N. H.

METHODIST CHURCH. Rev. S. W. WILSON, Editor of Zion's Herald, Boston.

PRESBYTERIANS. Rev. Dr. MILLER, of Princeton Theological Seminary.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Rev. Mr. BOYLE, presbyter, of Boston.

PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH. Rev. T. F. NORRIS, President of the New England Conference.

UNIVERSAL RESTORATIONISTS. Rev. PAUL DEAN.

5. To adapt it to popular use, all words in foreign languages have been omitted; or where Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek terms unavoidably occur, they are given in English characters.

6. Scripture Biography, which occupies a large space in most Bible Dictionaries, is handled here in the briefest manner possible—giving only the characteristic outlines, except when difficulties occur which require to be cleared up.

7. In consequence of the space thus gained, the new department of Religious Biography is made full and extensive; embracing, it is believed, every distinguished religious writer, preacher, and character, including the most distinguished females, and those philanthropists who were actuated by religious principles. Every denomination will find here notices of its most illustrious men, especially such as have lived and died in this country, from its settlement to this time. To every notice of an author a list of his principal writings (so far as possible) is given, with a reference to the best biographies of the individual.

8. As a Dictionary and Gazetteer of the Bible, the work will be found, it is believed, more copious and accurate than any other now in use, adding to the characteristic outlines, except when difficulties occur which require to be cleared up. In the notices of the various cities and countries mentioned in the Bible, the fulfilment of the Prophecies regarding them, so far as developed, are particularly noticed.

9. The object of the ENCYCLOPEDIA being to do good on evangelical principles, the work preserves throughout, as far as possible, a devotional and practical, as well as a critical, picturesque, and popular character, that it may minister to the heart, no less than to the judgment and the imagination.

10. MAPS and ENGRAVINGS, as well as WOOD CUTS, have been added to enrich and adorn, as well as illustrate, the work.

On the whole, the amount of information embodied in this work is immense, and it is hoped the matter, by collation, arrangement, abridgment, and addition, has been very greatly improved; and while it will be found interesting and valuable to Families, and those individuals who only desire to acquire general knowledge, to the SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHER and BIBLE CLASS LEADER it cannot but prove an invaluable treasure.

Few words are necessary to set forth the advantages of a work like this. A mind of ordinary intelligence must see them at a glance. It is not known that a similar attempt has heretofore been made, to bring together so wide a range of information from every department of religious knowledge. The works which have been most used in the compilation of this, and whose separate advantages are here combined, are far more limited and partial in design. For comprehensiveness of plan, therefore, the present work stands alone, and without a rival, in the wide field of theological literature. Nor does any single work in either of the departments of religious knowledge here embraced, contain an equal number of articles in that department, or an equal variety and amount of valuable information. In the labor which he has expended on this work, therefore, the Editor has been cheered by the hope of presenting an acceptable offering to the religious public, of performing a service of real and lasting utility to the cause of Christ, which he believes and feels to be, in the language of the eloquent Buckminster, "the cause of human happiness forever and ever."

Although, as stated in the Advertisement of the Publishers, this work is prepared with special adaptation to the wants of this country and of this age, the Editor begs that the nature of this adaptation may not be mis-understood. To some minds it may possibly suggest the idea that it is merely "got up" for temporary purposes, and that it consists of light and undigested materials, thrown loosely and hastily together,—a mere book-selling speculation. The best answer to such a supposition will be found in a careful examination of the book itself. It claims not however to be faultless. It would be singular indeed if, in a work of some ten thousand different articles, the eye of even candid criticism could not detect deficiencies, minor mistakes, positive errors even. No diligence, no research, no comparison of statements, however careful, no sifting of authorities, however severe, no sincerity of aim at the most rigid accuracy and impartiality, he apprehends, can wholly avoid these things. It is something however to have aimed aright. The true critic will feel this. He is not qualified for the task of criticism who has not himself passed through a course of mental trial and discipline in the pursuit of truth, and especially of religious truth, which has taught him the difficulties of the pursuit, and imbued his heart with a generous sympathy. For the judgment which such men shall form of his labors, the Editor shall entertain the sincerest deference. If any shall assail the work in a different spirit, he shall feel little affected by their censure, otherwise than to beseech of God their better illumination; while he cheerfully confides in the real value of the work itself, and the favoring providence of the great Author and Finisher of our faith, (not unbesought to this end, so far as it may be connected with his glory,) for its ultimate popularity and success.

It is necessary, however, that the Editor should bespeak the attention of his readers, and of all such especially as shall use this work, to some of the principles by which he has been guided in its preparation. The most important of these were named in the Prospectus, and are now embodied in the Advertisement; yet some of minor consequence it is necessary to mention here.

In compilations of this nature it has not generally been thought of importance to give the names of the authorities consulted or employed, in connexion with each article. Various reasons have been assigned for this omission. But the Editor, after proceeding some little way in his work, became dissatisfied with the prescriptive course on this point, and judged it best in all cases to refer to the sources from which the several articles were compiled or selected. Various advantages seem to him to attend this method. It is certainly more ingenuous. It renders due honor to those who have previously labored in the field, and where, as in some instances, but a single name appears, it shows to whom the Encyclopedia is indebted either for the best original article, the most judicious selection, or the most valuable compilation. In many cases too, where the article is abridged to adapt it to this work, it enables the reader to consult the works in which it is treated more at length. Yet even in abridged articles, it is believed, he will often confess with pleasure, that "the half is better than the whole."

At the same time, in justice both to himself and to others, the Editor would remark, that no writer from whom he has compiled or selected, and whose name appears at the end of a particular article, is to be held responsible for its precise form or language, unless his language is expressly quoted. In all other cases the Editor of the Encyclopedia has felt himself at liberty to modify not only the arrangement, but the diction and sentiments, to bring an article nearer to that state of order, accuracy, clearness, and completeness, which the most recent information, and the habits of his own mind, led him to think desirable and useful to his readers. Such only as will take the trouble to compare article by article as they stand here, with the same articles as they appear in the works referred to, will be able to judge of the amount of labor expended in this manner, or of the degree of improvement by this means attained.

It is perhaps unnecessary to say, that the original articles on the different CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS, furnished for this work by the several gentlemen whose names are attached to them, are to be exempted from the above remarks. It has been an invariable rule with the Editor to insert them as prepared by their authors, without the slightest alteration; except in a single instance, the omission of a name, which justice to the individual would not suffer to appear in the connexion where it stood. For whatever appears in those articles, the respective authors or revisers are alone responsible. To this they have cheerfully consented by giving their names to the public. And the Editor cannot but feel himself happy in having been able to secure to each denomination so able an organ and representative. No better pledge of authenticity and impartiality could have been given by the Publishers, or have been desired by the community. Those articles alone stamp unequalled authority and value upon the Encyclopedia, as a standard work of reference on those points; which, amidst the mis-statements and colorings of party spirit, it is always so difficult to ascertain with any thing like precision and certainty. The Editor regrets that in two or three instances his applications for similar articles on other denominations, proved unsuccessful. In these cases he has done the best he could. It may be proper also to observe here, that the article Baptists, to which no name is attached, as in the case of others, was drawn up by the Editor, under the revision of the Rev. Dr. Sharp, and actually printed, before the arrangement followed in the remainder of the work was finally adjusted.

In the preparation of the whole work, the Editor has been governed by a single idea—the aim to make it, to the utmost of his ability, what he should judge most desirable as a companion of the Bible; a companion, however, not in the sense of a master or equal, but of a ministering attendant. He is not one of those who regard the word of God without note or comment, so far as relates to the great doctrine of salvation, as either defective, equivocal, or obscure. On the contrary, he believes that notwithstanding all the disadvantages of a translation, a foreign idiom, and an oriental drapery, it is, in every really important point, full, unambiguous, and clear. A distinction should ever be made between its history and its poetry, between its doctrine and its allusions. The transparent and vigorous simplicity of the former, requires little aid from learned labors; the wayfaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein. But besides its history and its doctrine, or, in other words, its facts, and its moral principles, precepts, and promises connected with those facts, the Bible abounds in allusions, geographical, historical, and analogical, and these, together with prophecy and its accomplishment, form the proper field for BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATION. Accordingly, the Editor has made it a point to collect every ray of light within his reach, and concentrate it on the geography, history, scenery, sects, customs, and manners, peculiar to every spot of interest referred to on the sacred page, that the reader may be able to surround himself with the very associations of the sacred writers, or the persons present in the scenes they describe. Yet while, with the feeling of a poet, he has prosecuted these researches, he deems it right to warn his readers that this kind of knowledge is but the literature, “the letter,” not the vital spirit of religion; and that the most learned critic in these matters is but on a level in point of real information with the humblest peasant in Judea, or the busiest citizen of Greece and of Rome, into whose hands at first, without note or comment, the sacred writings came. The same remarks apply, also, to the articles of Biblical Introduction, which treat of the age, origin, contents, and character of the several books of the Old and New Testament, including the Higher Criticism, which examines their authenticity; though great attention has been paid to these points, as well as to Biblical Interpretation, in the Encyclopedia. Physiology, also, and Natural History, together with Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, have been made tributary to Biblical Exposition.

After a knowledge of the sacred documents of our Religion, comes the history of its progress and effects in the world, together with the changes it has undergone from the neglect or misinterpretation of those documents; and this is the province of ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. The Editor hopes that his attention to this subject has enabled him to throw a clearer light over some articles in this department. He also owns himself much indebted to the candor and research of Mr. Williams, in the last English edition of his valuable Dictionary of all Religions.

Closely connected with this is the department of RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY, in which the Editor has aimed to pursue a liberal course, embracing the most noted writers for and against Natural Religion, for and against Revelation, for and against Orthodoxy, as generally understood. He has thus enabled his readers to form just ideas of the character of each, and to feel the benefits of comparison between men of opposite views on the greatest of all subjects. He has also included many whose writings have exerted an influence, favorable or unfavorable to Religion, on intellect and morals in Christian lands. But chiefly he has delighted to dwell on characters eminent for piety and philanthropy, and to preserve some of their most memorable sayings, together with glimpses of their dying hours. No collection of Religious Biography of equal extent and value probably exists in the English, or any other language. It is brought down also to the present year. The Editor regards this department alone as worth the whole cost of the book.

In the department of THEOLOGY, strictly speaking, he has taken no little pains to set every important subject in the clearest light, and to state it in the most scriptural manner. And as he has had the advantage of drawing upon authors of different sentiments, who have preceded him in similar works, but with more partial views, he has sought, as far as he could with a clear conscience, to select and combine what seemed to him true, and good, and edifying in each, to enrich the present work. All the bibliographical references in Buck's Theological Dictionary are retained, with copious additions, chiefly, however, of writers of more recent date, of standard merit, and whose writings are generally accessible in this country. These references are rarely made to particular volumes and pages, as these can be of little service where various editions abound, in various forms, and especially when the topic can be so readily found by turning to an index. No valuable work, unless alphabetically arranged, is now published without an index. The copious topical references also introduced throughout this work, the Editor trusts will greatly augment its value.

Although it has been a general rule to exclude from the Encyclopedia all foreign languages, yet in a few instances, for the sake of the scholar, a Latin quotation has been retained, on account of its aptness or beauty of illustration. The English reader can pass over these, or get the sense of them from a friend who understands the language.

Of the MISSIONARY GAZETTEER, he needs only to say, that it is wholly prepared by Mr. B. B. Edwards, whose name is a sufficient pledge of its proper execution.

Articles not found in the body of the work, must be looked for in the Appendix; where also will be found brief historical articles on the various Religious and Benevolent Societies of the age.

After all, the Editor wishes the present work, however satisfactory to the general reader, to be looked upon by the student, not as a full view of any one subject, but rather in the light of ground already gained and made good, as a starting point for fresh investigations. Each article should be regarded as an organized nucleus, a living root, around which he is to accumulate the stores derived from his future reading and reflections.

Especially does he wish to apply this remark to his junior brethren in the Christian ministry. While we glory only in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, and justly value all objects by their relation to Him, it is not for us to stand still, amidst the mighty stream of advancement in human affairs. The best movements of society should always find us in the front ranks. Such is our commission. What high and generous, yet gentle courage do we need for its fulfilment. The present, is, not without reason, denominated an age of inquiry. How far profound, how far impartial, how far governed by the meekness of wisdom, how far springing from the fervent love of truth and righteousness, we will not say—but still it is an age of inquiry. All who are acquainted with the movements of the civilized world, must be aware that within the last fifty years, the prevailing systems of metaphysics and morals, and the most important doctrines of Christianity, as well as the evidence of Christianity itself, have undergone a rigorous investigation, by some of the ablest minds of an age, than which none perhaps has been more fruitful in great men. The whole structure of theology, as well as of politics, has been re-examined from its foundations, by the searching spirit of the times. And it is well. The spirit that is moving on these troubled elements, we verily believe, is the Spirit of God. It is a spirit that is at once purifying our faith at home, and extending it abroad among all the nations. Under its quickening influence, Biblical Literature and Criticism have been greatly advanced. The Laws of sound Interpretation have become better understood, and are more generally applied in the investigation of the Sacred Volume; though on this point there is still much to be desired. The Baconian method is by no means universal yet. Preconceived notions, abstract speculations, illogical reasonings, and partial inductions of Scripture, still too much abound. And even where these lead not astray, there is far too imperfect a faith in the simple word of God. In Religion, reason makes no real discoveries except as she walks in the clear light of Divine revelation. "The use of reason in religion is to enlarge our minds to the amplitude of truth; but the abuse of reason is more common, which would contract truth to the narrowness of our understandings."

Some advantages have certainly been gained by the recent spirit of inquiry and free discussion. If few new truths have been discovered, many old ones have been better settled and defined; and some crude and impure mixtures purged away. The practical applications of truth have also been more ably illustrated, and we may hope henceforth to see more and better fruit spring from their belief and inculcation. Besides this, good men of different communions are becoming every day better acquainted with each other; and a gradual approximation of sentiment and feeling is taking place, through the agency of spiritual revivals, of benevolent institutions and associations, and of the religious periodical press. This fact affords a cheering augury for the future.

The Editor entertains hopes that this work will be found to participate in some good degree of this spirit of the age, and that it will help to diffuse its quickening and healing influence still more widely. No object, he can truly say, has throughout been dearer to his bosom, than the hope of hastening the triumphs of truth and charity—the charity and truth of the blessed Gospel—over the whole world. Unless his heart has deceived him, he has labored in the spirit of that fundamental Christian prayer—HALLOWED BE THY NAME; THY KINGDOM COME; THY WILL BE DONE, AS IN HEAVEN, SO IN EARTH. In that spirit he would wish the work to be read; and if any thing has been inserted not in harmony with this, he can most heartily wish it were expunged.

Should any reader be staggered at the multifarious forms of human belief here presented, especially among professed Christians, a brief but full solution may be found in the following remarks of Mr. Douglas. “Errors, though they appear infinite at first view, may be reduced to a few classes and to a very few principles. Errors regarding religion, while they have their original cause in the dimness of the divine image in the fallen mind, and the consequent obscurity of heavenly truth, may be traced in their proximate causes either to preconceived opinions or to partial views. Thus the old errors of the ancient world, after the coming of our Savior, re-appeared in a Christian disguise, giving rise to as many heresies in religion as there had formerly been sects in philosophy; and the good seed of the word had almost been stifled by the indigenous weeds which revived along with it in the mind; as they rushed up with all the strength and advantage which they derived from being the natural and previous occupants of the soil. More lately, in religion, as in philosophy, imperfect induction has been the stumbling-block, instead of preconceived theories; and a part of divine truth, separated from its proper place, and exaggerated beyond its just dimensions, has been opposed to the whole.”

If any, question the propriety and use, of perpetuating in this form the various crudities and abortions of error in the human mind, we reply in the words of the same eloquent and philosophic writer: “Thus we complete the ‘intellectual globe,’ (to use an expression of Bacon,) when we add the darkened to the enlightened hemisphere of thought. Then our belief has its highest and perfect repose, when we ascend to that point of view which discloses at once the foundations of truth and the outlets of error; as the wanderings of the planets are explained away, and disappear with all their epicycles, and nothing remains but the immutable order of the heavens, when contemplated from their centre and point of rest.”

The Editor cannot conclude without returning his most grateful acknowledgments to the Publishers, who have furnished him with the opportunity and materials, and to those gentlemen who have assisted him in making the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge what it is—the most recent, comprehensive, illustrative, and trust-worthy work of reference on all denominational points, as he hopes it will be found, also, on the various topics adverted to above. He would particularly express his obligations to the Rev. David Benedict, for permission to use his valuable History of all Religions, and to President Allen, for the assistance derived from his copious collection of American Biography. But, above all, would he devoutly acknowledge the kindness of that gracious Being, who has enabled him to perform this service for the cause of Christ, and for his fellow-men, and to finish a task of such magnitude and solemn import, at least in his own view from the first, that he would not have deemed the sacrifice too great had it cost his life. To the favor of that most glorious of Beings, whose approbation he chiefly covets, to whom he owes the rich gift of an intelligent, moral, and immortal existence, redeemed too by an inestimable price, as well as to the use of the public for whom it is prepared, he humbly commends this work.

RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

A, the first letter in almost all alphabets. In the Hebrew it is called Aleph. This, and all the other letters of the Hebrew alphabet, are found in the 119th Psalm, prefixed to the several sections of that richest of all devotional compositions. Both the Hebrews and Greeks used their letters as numerals. Hence A. (Aleph.) came to signify the first; as did also the Greek Alpha, a distinguishing title assumed by our Lord, Rev. 1: 8, 11. 21: 6. 22: 13. Alpha, in connection with Omega, the former the first, and the latter the last letter in the alphabet, are beautiful symbols of that glorious Being, of whom, and through whom, and to whom are all things. Rom. 11: 36. As appropriated to himself, by our Savior, it is a sublime affirmation, from his own lips, of his essential deity, and all comprehending fullness. Perhaps the best exposition ever given of this glorious title, is found in Col. 1: 15—20.

AARON, son of Amram, and the elder brother of Moses. He was a prince of the tribe of Levi; and his name, derived from Har, a mountain, is by some supposed to signify a mountaineer; but by others, to denote eminent, as if prophetic of his lofty designation; he being called of God, not only to take part in the redemption of his people from Egypt, but also to be the first HIGH PRIEST of Israel. In this most high and sacred relation, he was in several respects an illustrious type of Christ; who is the body and substance of all the Levitical shadows and sacrifices; through whose mediation alone, the guilty can have access to God. Col. 2: 17. The history of Aaron is found in the books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers; it is unnecessary, therefore, to repeat it here. He died in mount Hor, A. M. 2552, aged 123 years. The seeming contradiction as to the place of his death, (Num. 20: 22—29, with Deut. 10: 6.) is removed by the fact mentioned by Burckhardt, that Mosera is the name of the valley at the foot of mount Hor.—(See articles HIGH PRIEST; BREAST-PLATE; ERBOD; URIM; CALF; TYPE; SHADOW; HOR.)

Calmet, in reviewing the history of Aaron, remarks, 1. A striking instance of divine sovereignty in the preference given to Moses, his younger brother.—2. A strong confirmation of their divine mission in the peculiar circumstances of their meeting at mount Horeb.—3. Probable evidence that Aaron was chief of his people in Egypt, though under the authority of Pharaoh.—4. That his consent to make the golden calf in the wilderness proceeded from exhausted faith and patience, joined with unjustifiable weakness and timidity.—5. That the sedition of Aaron and Miriam against Moses affords another argument against the supposition of collusion between the brothers.—6. That in the general character of Aaron there was much of the excellence, and especially of the meekness, of Moses.—7. That he probably assisted his brother in writing out some parts of the books which now bear the name of Moses.—And, lastly, that his death presents one of the most singular and impressive scenes in the history of our race.

The last idea is thus enlarged upon by Jones: "Neither the purity of his character, nor the honor of his high priesthood, could exempt him from the common lot of mortals, or confer a perpetuity upon his office. The law of Moses perfected nothing, as the apostle tells the Hebrews. It served only to the introduction of a better hope. Under that dispensation 'the priests were many, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death.' Heb.

7: 23. The continual succession of mortal men, of which the Aaronic priesthood was made up, while it strikingly evinced its imperfection and its temporary duration, was evidently designed to serve as 'an example and shadow of heavenly things,' and to lead the Israelites to look forward to 'better things to come'—when 'ANOTHER PRIEST should arise, after the order of Melchisedek, and not after the order of Aaron—a priest who should spring out of the tribe of Judah, and who should be constituted not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life'—whose priesthood should be unchangeable in the heavens. In reference to this view of things, the death of Aaron, and all its train of attendant circumstances, are replete with instruction. In the sight of all the congregation, at the command of Moses, he quits the camp of Israel, accompanied by his brother and his son Eleazer, and ascends the mountain where he is to die. Here the father is stripped of his priestly vestments, one by one, which Moses immediately places upon his son Eleazer, his successor in the office of the high priest. Thus disrobed of the insignia of his office, with a gentle but melancholy grandeur, the venerable old man resigns himself to death, and is 'gathered to his people, according to the word of the LORD.'"

AB, the eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of their sacred year; corresponding to our July.—(See MONTH, and JEWISH CALENDAR, at the end of this volume.) Should not Christians, every month, in special prayer, remember this singular and unhappy people, who, though rejected for their unbelief, maintain still the forms of religion in the absence of its power? Yet again they shall be restored to God in Christ. Rom. 11.

ABADDON, (Hebrew, corresponding to Apollyon, Greek, and signifying Destroyer;) the angel of the bottomless pit, and king over the symbolic locusts. Rev. 9: 11.—(See LOCUST.) Le Clerc, Grotius, and Hammond interpret these locusts of the zealots and robbers, who, under John of Gischala, desolated Judea before the destruction of Jerusalem. But Mr. Mede remarks, that the title Abaddon alludes to Obodas, the common name of the ancient monarchs of that part of Arabia from which Mahomet came; and considers the passage as descriptive of the inundation of the Arabians or Saracens under Mahomet and his successors. Mr. Lowman, and, after him, Bishop Newton, adopts and confirms this interpretation. He shows that the rise and progress of the Mahometan religion and empire exhibit a signal accomplishment of this prophecy. All the circumstances correspond to the character of the Arabians, and the history of the period that extended from A. D. 612 to A. D. 762, being five prophetic months, or one hundred and fifty years. The title of Destroyer given to their king, was peculiarly suitable to a succession of caliphs, who, in propagating the Mahometan imposture by fire and sword, destroyed at once both the bodies and the souls of men; and seemed to be the visible representatives of Satan himself, who was "a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth." John, 8: 44.

Brown, Bryant, and others have given different interpretations of the passage; but as Dr. Scott observes, "Every circumstance of this emblematical prediction so exactly accords to the Saracens, and so little snits the church or hierarchy of Rome, or any of their religious orders, (who gained their advantage by priestcraft, not oy arms,) that there can be no propriety in attempting to explain it of them; especially as they are described with sufficient precision in what follows. Prophecies have a determinate meaning; but by giving loose to a lively imagination, to find distant resemblances, we are more like to perplex, than to satisfy the inquirer."—Jones. Watson; Brown; Newton on the Prophecies; Scott's Notes on Rev. ix.; Fuller's Lectures on the Apocalypse.

ABANA, and PHARPAR; rivers of Damascus, in Syria, memorable from the words of Naaman, the Leper, 2 Kings, 5: 12. The name Abana is formed from Aben, a stone, and Bana, to build; and literally signifies walled with stone. This name may appear significant when it is known that the Abana is probably that branch of the Barrady, or (as the Greeks called it) Chryssorroas, which runs through the city. The Pharpar, there is reason to believe, is not the Orontes, as some have supposed, but another branch of the Barrady, which watered the gardens without the walls of Damascus. The Barrady itself springs from the foot of mount Lebanon, (or Libanus.) eastward. Its name seems derived from the refreshing coolness and purity of its waters.

The language and conduct of Naaman afford a striking illustration of man's natural disaffection to the gospel, which is God's chosen method of healing the leprosy of our fallen nature. Its simplicity, and gratuitous character, as well as the self-denial it demands, are alike unpalatable to the self-indulgent, the superstitious, and the self-righteous. Yet it is invariably found, that without submission to God's appointment, without washing in the "fountain which He has opened in the house of Judah for sin and uncleanness," there is no healing for us.—Calmet; Brown; Harker; Watson.

ABARIM, a range of mountains or hills beyond Jordan, in the country of Moab. Nebo, Pisgah, and Peor, were in the number. Nebo is chiefly memorable as the sacred spot where Moses died. Num. 33: 48. Dent. 32: 49, 50, 34: 1.

ABASE, to treat with contempt; to reduce to meanness and wretchedness. It comes from a Hebrew word which signifies the bottom. It is inserted here chiefly with a view to illustrate that emphatic and oft repeated maxim of our Lord, (Mat. 23: 12. Luke, 14: 11. 18: 14.) "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted."

ABAUZIT, (ΑΒΑΥΖΙΤ,) was born in Languedoc, 1679. In consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, his mother, who was a Protestant, took refuge with her son in Geneva. He engaged with such eagerness in his studies, that he made great proficiency in languages, theology, antiquity, and the exact sciences. At the age of nineteen, he travelled into Holland, where he became acquainted with Boyle and Basnage. Thence he passed into England, where he was favorably noticed by Newton, and invited to remain by King William, on very advantageous conditions. He determined, however, to return to Geneva, and, devoting himself to study, he rendered important assistance to a society engaged in translating the New Testament into French. In 1727, he was appointed public librarian in Geneva, and was presented with the freedom of the city. He died in 1767. A. was a profound scholar, a true philosopher, and a sincere Christian. His conversation was unostentatious, but instructive and animated. He was simple in his manners, independent and decided in his opinions, but a friend to universal toleration. He defended the Principia, and even detected an error in that work, when very few men could understand it. Newton declared him "a fit man to judge between Leibnitz and himself." Rousseau describes him as the "wise and modest Abauzit," and Voltaire pronounced him "a great man." His knowledge was extensive in the whole circle of antiquities, in ancient history, geography, and chronology. In theology his researches were deep, and his moderation enabled him to avoid the violence of theological parties. His works are chiefly on theological subjects. An Essay on the Apocalypse, Reflections on the Eucharist, and On the Mysteries of Religion, are his principal writings.—Davenport.

ABBA; an Aramaean or Syriac word of endearment, signifying My Father. (See ARAMAEAN LANGUAGE.) Dr.

vid Levi, in his Lingua Sacra, derives it from a root, denoting desire, delight, complacency, satisfaction. The learned Mr. Selden has proved from the Babylonian Gemara, that a slave or menial servant was not permitted to employ this appellation in addressing the ab, that is, the lord and head of the family; because it was indicative of the closest relationship and the tenderest reciprocal affection. Its use was restricted to such as sustained this intimate relationship, and was regarded as the appropriate language of children, whether by birth or adoption.

Its use in the New Testament seems to correspond exactly with the facts here stated. It is employed by our Lord himself during his agony in the garden of Gethsemane—"when he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, and said, ABBA, Father, all things are possible to thee; let this cup pass from me." Mark, 14: 36. What filial adoration, submission, tenderness, confidence, breathe in these words! So, when recounting to the Roman and Galatian churches, the peculiar privileges of those in whom the Spirit of Christ dwells, the apostle describes this as their peculiar distinction—above such as still continue slaves to sin or in the bondage of a legal state—that through that Spirit they cry, "ABBA, Father!" In other words, true believers address God in a language of filial love and confidence, corresponding to that new and endearing relation, which they sustain as "children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." Rom. 8: 15. Gal. 4: 6.

Hence it appears that all Christians, by virtue of their relation to God in Christ, are authorized, (if not, indeed, enjoined,) to employ this language of filial hope and tenderness in their approaches to their Heavenly Father. And if the reader of this page is enabled to see his own personal privilege herein, and can enter into a proper apprehension of the word, in this most endearing view, he will be led to discover the sweetness and blessedness of it; and may find it yield him not only a daily assistance in the exercises of devotion, but special support and comfort in the most dark and trying hour. He will know that his access into his Father's presence is at all times free; and, instead of "the spirit of bondage again unto fear," will feel the force of the encouragement, (Phil. 4: 6, 7,) "in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, to make known his requests unto God."—Jones; Harker; Watson.

The word Abba in after ages came to be used in the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic churches, in an improper sense, as a title given to their bishops. The bishops themselves bestow the title Abba more eminently upon the bishop of Alexandria; which gave occasion for the people to call him Baba, or Papa, that is, grandfather; a title which he bore before the bishop of Rome.—Buck.

ABBADIE, (JAMES, D. D.) an eminent Protestant divine, was born at Nay, in Berne, in the year 1658. He prosecuted his studies at Saumer, at Paris, and at Sedan, at which last place he was honored with the degree of doctor in divinity. He proceeded thence to Holland, and afterward to Berlin, where he was made minister of the French church, then lately established by the elector of Brandenburg. In this city he resided during several years, and was in high favor with the elector. The French congregation at Berlin was at first but thin; but upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes, great numbers of the exiled Protestants retired to Brandenburg, where they were received with the greatest humanity; so that doctor Abbadie had in a little time a great charge, of which he took all possible care; and by his interest at court, did many services to his distressed countrymen. The elector dying in 1688, Abbadie accepted a proposal from marshal Schomberg to go with him to Holland, and afterwards to England, with the prince of Orange. In the autumn of 1689, he accompanied the marshal to Ireland, where he continued till after the battle of the Boyne, in 1690, in which his great patron was killed. This occasioned his return to London, where he was appointed minister of the French church, in the Savoy. He sometime afterward was promoted to the deanery of Kihaloe, in Ireland, which he enjoyed for many years. Having made a tour to Holland, in order to publish one of his books, he returned to London, where he was taken ill, and died in the parish of Mary-Je-bone, Sept. 23, 1727.—He was a firm and decided Protestant, and strongly attached to the cause of king William, as appears by his elaborate defence of the Revolution, and his history of the Assassination plot. He had very superior faculties, well cultivated with useful learning. His doctrinal sentiments were Calvinistic, and he was a most zealous defender of the Protestant religion. His writings are characterized by strong nervous eloquence, for which he was distinguished, and which enabled him to enforce the objects of his ministry with great spirit and energy from the pulpit.

The principal work of Dr. Abbadie is a "Treatise on the Christian Religion," which has gone through seven editions. It consists of three parts; in the first he combats the Atheists; the Deists in the second; and, in the last, the Socinians. This work met with almost unexampled praise, on its first publication. The Abbe HOUVRILLE pronounces it, "the most splendid treatise in defence of the Christian Religion, published by the Protestants."—The late Mr. Abraham Booth, about the middle of the last century, when the Socinian controversy was warmly agitated in England, published in a 12mo. volume, that portion of Dr. Abbadie's work which relates to the Socinians, somewhat abridged, under the title of "The Deity of Jesus Christ essential to the Christian Religion;" and it met with a very favorable acceptance from the public.* Among the other productions of Dr. Abbadie's pen may be mentioned, "Sermons on several Texts of Scripture;" "The Art of knowing One's-self, or an Inquiry into the Sources of Morality;" "The Truth of the Reformed Religion;" and "The Triumph of Providence and Religion, or the Opening of the Seven Seals by the Son of God." Amsterdam, 1723.—Jones's Religious Biography; Biographia Britannica.

ABBE, the name of those literary men in France, who have passed through a regular course of theological study; but have as yet obtained no fixed settlement in church or state, though very willing to accept of either.—They are generally employed as public or private instructors of youth, and enjoy many privileges. As a class, their writings have exerted a powerful influence on society.—Buck; Ency. Amer.

ABBES, (JAMES,) an English martyr of the sixteenth century. During the persecution under Queen Mary, this young man was arrested, and brought before Dr. Hopkins, bishop of Norwich; who, by means of threats and fair speeches, gained a temporary victory over his conscience. But after his discharge, his inward anguish of remorse forced him to return to the bishop, and profess his hearty repentance that he had ever yielded to his persuasions and denied his faith. Being now proof against all efforts of the adherents of Rome, he was condemned to the stake; which for the sake of Christ he cheerfully endured, until his body was consumed to ashes, in Bury, Aug. 2, 1555.—Fox's Book of Martyrs.

ABBESS, the superior of an abbey or convent of nuns. The abbess has the same right and authority over her nuns that the abbots regular have over their monks. The sex, indeed, does not allow her to perform the spiritual functions annexed to the priesthood, wherewith the abbot is usually invested; but there are instances of some abbesses who have a right, or rather a privilege, to commission a priest to act for them. They have even a kind of episcopal jurisdiction, as well as some abbots who are exempted from the visitation of their diocesan.—Buck.

ABBEY; a monastery, governed by a superior under the title of Abbot or Abbess. Monasteries were at first nothing more than religious houses, whither persons retired from the bustle of the world to spend their time in solitude and devotion: but they soon degenerated from their original institution, and procured large privileges, exemptions, and riches. They prevailed greatly in Britain before the reformation, particularly in England; and as they increased in riches, so the state became poor, for the lands which these regulars possessed could never revert to the lords who gave them. These places were wholly abolished by Henry VIII. He first appointed visitors to inspect into the lives of the monks and nuns, which were found in some places very disorderly; upon which the abbots, perceiving their dissolution unavoidable, were induced to resign their houses to the king, who by that means became invested with the abbey lands; these were afterwards granted to different persons, whose descendants enjoy them at this day: they were then valued at £2,853,000 per annum; an immense sum in those days.—Though the suppression of these houses, considered in a religious and political light, was a great benefit to the nation, yet it must be owned, that, at the time they flourished, they were not entirely useless. Abbeys were then the repositories as well as the seminaries of learning; many valuable books and national records have been preserved in their libraries; the only place wherein they could have been safely lodged in those turbulent times. Indeed, the historians of England are chiefly beholden to the monks for the knowledge they have of former national events. Thus a kind Providence overruled even the institutions of superstition for good. (See MONASTERY.)—Buck.

ABBOT, the chief ruler of a monastery or abbey. At first they were laymen, and subject to the bishop and ordinary pastors. Their monasteries being remote from cities, and built in the farthest solitudes, they had no share in ecclesiastical affairs; but, there being among them several persons of learning, they were called out of the deserts by the bishops, and fixed in the suburbs of the cities, and at length in the cities themselves. From that time they degenerated, and, learning to be ambitious, aspired to be independent of the bishops, which occasioned some severe laws to be made against them. At length, however, the abbots carried their point, and obtained the title of lord, with other badges of the episcopate, particularly the mitre. Hence arose new distinctions among them. Those were termed mitred abbots who were privileged to wear the mitre, and exercise episcopal authority within their respective precincts, being exempted from the jurisdiction of the bishop. Others were called croziered abbots, from their bearing the crozier, or pastoral staff. Others were styled acumenical or universal abbots, in imitation of the patriarch of Constantinople; while others were termed cardinal abbots, from their superiority over all other abbots. At present, in the Roman Catholic countries, the chief distinctions are those of regular and commendatory. The former take the vow and wear the habit of their order; whereas the latter are seculars, though they are obliged by their bulls to take orders when of proper ages.—Buck.

ABBOT, (ROBERT, D. D. S. T. P.) bishop of Salisbury. He was born in 1550, at Guildford in Surry, of pious parents; was educated at Oxford; and soon became very popular as a preacher. He was a great scholar, a deep divine, and an amiable Christian. Gravity was said to flow in his brother George, but to smile in him. In 1594, he began to be eminent as a polemic writer, particularly in the Catholic controversy. In 1597, he received his degree of D. D. He was soon after chosen chaplain in ordinary to James I. who did him the honor to print his own Commentary on the Apocalypse along with Abbot's Antichristi Demonstratio. In 1609, he was elected master of Balliol college, where he distinguished himself, not only by promoting diligence in study, but by restoring piety, peace, and temperance, which had been almost wholly extinguished. In 1610, he was nominated by the king among the first fellows of the Royal college at Chelsea, then newly founded, and designed as a kind of fortress of controversial divinity. The same year he was made prebendary of Normanton. In 1612, his majesty named him successor of Dr. Thomas Holland in the theological chair at Oxford, which he modestly refused, until forced by a mandate from the king. This important station he filled with great honor, until transferred to the see of Salisbury, Dec. 3, 1615. Here also his labors were indefatigable to build up his congregation, both by doctrine and discipline; but they were interrupted soon by an agonizing attack of the gravel and stone, brought on by his previous close application to study. Amidst the tears of his flock, but in the triumph of peace, patience, love, and heavenly hope, he died March 2, 1617, in the 58th year of his age. His last words were, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Finish in me the work which thou hast begun!"

Dr. Abbot had the character of being a profound divine; most admirably well read in the fathers, councils, and schoolmen. As a theological professor, he was more moderate in his Calvinistic views than either of his two predecessors, Humphrey and Holland, though decidedly opposed to the Arminianism of Laud. He is classed in the same rank with Jewel, Bilson, and Reynolds, among the prime worthies of the English church, though by some suspected to favor the Puritans.

His writings were more numerous than his publications. The latter are, 1. The Mirror of Popish Superstition, 1594; 2. A Sermon on the Exaltation of the Kingdom and Priesthood of Christ, 1601; 3. Antichristi Demonstratio, 1603—of this a new edition was issued in 1608, and it is much commended by Scaliger; 4. Defence of the Reformed Catholic of Mr. W. Perkins, against the Bastard counter-Catholic of Dr. Wm. Bishop—in three parts, 1606, 1607, 1609, a most elaborate and comprehensive work; 5. The Old Way, a Sermon, at St. Mary's, Oxford, 1610; 6. The true ancient Roman Catholic, being a Reply to Dr. Bishop, 1611; 7. Antilogia, 1613; 8. De gratiâ et perseverantiâ Sanctorum, &c., 1618; 9. In Ricardâ Thomsoni, &c., 1618; 10. De Supremâ Potestate Regiâ, &c., 1610. The three last, were printed after his death. Among his unpublished writings is a Commentary in Latin on the whole Epistle to the Romans; which is called "an accurate work, in which he has handled all the controversial points of religion, and inclosed the whole magazine of his learning." The MS. in 4 vols. folio, is in the Bodleian library.—Middleton's Biograph. Evân.

ABBOT, (GEORGE, D. D., brother of Robert,) archbishop of Canterbury and primate of England, was born 1562. Their father was a clothier. George, as well as Robert, was educated at Oxford. There in 1598 he published a Latin work, which did him great honor, and was reprinted in Frankfort by the celebrated Scultetus. His talents were very soon known, and he became a celebrated preacher in the university. In 1597 he was made doctor of divinity, and the same year was chosen master of University college. Here the first difference began between him and the intolerant Dr. Land; a difference which continued through life. Dr. Abbot being at all times the firm and enlightened friend both of civil and religious liberty.

In 1599, he was installed dean of Winchester; and in 1600 vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford. This year he published his sermons on the prophet Jonah, which were received with great applause.

In 1604, Dr. Abbot was the second of eight learned divines at Oxford, chosen by king James, to whom the care of translating all (but the Epistles of the New Testament) was committed. In 1608, he assisted in a design to unite the churches of England and Scotland; in which his prudence and moderation raised him high in the favor of the king, who bestowed upon him successively the bishoprics of Litchfield, and of London. In 1610, his majesty elevated him to the see of Canterbury, the highest dignity in the church. In this elevated station, he showed himself the temperate yet zealous friend of the Protestant cause against the Romanists, and of Calvinism against the Arminians; while he adorned his place by learning, piety, eloquence, and indefatigable diligence.

His enemies had imputed his promotion to his flattering the king; but archbishop Abbot had the courage to displease the king, by opposing the Book of Sports, the divorce of the Countess of Essex, and the Spanish Match—exhibiting certainly a rare instance of conscientious magnanimity in a courtly prelate. In perfect consistency of character, he, nine years after, ventured the displeasure of Charles I. by refusing to license a slavish sermon, which Dr. Sibthorpe had preached, to justify one of Charles's unconstitutional proceedings. For this last honorable act he was suspended from his functions, but was soon, though not willingly, restored to them. Laud and Buckingham were his inveterate enemies; but the good archbishop pursued his course of Christian duty, as in the sight of God to the last, without favor or fear.

A cause of deep sorrow to him in his latter days, was his having accidentally, while aiming at a deer, shot one of lord Touch's keepers. In consequence of this he kept a monthly fast while he lived, and settled an annuity of twenty pounds on the widow. He died in 1633, at the age of 71; and was buried at Guildford, his native town, for which he ever retained a strong regard, and where he had generously endowed a hospital for the poor.

He published a number of works, but the most important are the three already named.—Middleton; Daventport; Ency. Amer.

ABBOT, (SAMUEL,) one of the founders of the theological seminary, Andover, (Mass.) Most of his life he was a merchant in Boston. He was a humble, conscientious, pious man; remarkable for prudence, sincerity, and uprightness; charitable to the poor, and zealous for the interests of religion. He gave several thousand dollars to poor ministers of the gospel, and other objects of charity. His donation for establishing the seminary Aug. 31, 1807, was 20,000 dollars; he also bequeathed to it more than 100,000 dollars.—He died in Andover, his native town, April 30, 1812, aged 80; leaving a widow with whom he had lived more than 50 years, and one son. It was a maxim with Mr. Abbot, to 'praise no one in his presence, and to dispraise no one in his absence.' In his last sickness he enjoyed a peace which the world cannot give. 'I desire to live,' he said, 'if God has any thing more for me to do, or to suffer.' When near his end he said, 'There is enough in God. I want nothing but God!'—Allen's Amer. Biog.

ABBOT, (AELI, D. D.) minister in Beverly, (Mass.) He was born at Andover, Aug. 17, 1770, and graduated at Cambridge, 1787, with an unsullied character and elevated scholarship. After assisting in the academy at Andover, and studying theology with Mr. French, he was settled in 1794, at Haverhill. Here he continued eight years, when an inadequate support for his family induced him reluctantly to take a dismission, and he removed to Beverly, where he succeeded Mr. McKeen, (who had been chosen president of Bowdoin college,) in 1802.—In 1827 he visited the south for his health, and passed the winter in Charleston. Early the following spring he embarked for Cuba, where he remained three months, and recorded the fruits of his inquiries and observations in letters to his family and friends. He died on his return, January 7, 1828, just as the vessel came to anchor at the quarantine ground near New-York, and was buried on Staten island.

Dr. Abbot was very courteous and interesting in social intercourse, and eloquent as a preacher. His biographer says that "he belonged to no sect, but that of good men." Happy are all who truly belong to that sect! who "are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works!"—His interesting and valuable letters from Cuba were published after his death, 8vo., Boston, 1829. He published also, an Artillery Election Sermon, 1802; Sermon to Mariners, 1812; Address on Intemperance, 1815; Sermon before the Salem Missionary Society, 1816; before the Bible Society of Salem, 1817; Convention Sermon, 1827.—*Allen's Am. ABBREVIATIONS, (called by the Romans nota, hence notarius, a shorthand writer.) The desire of saving time and space, or of secrecy, led to the invention of abbreviations in writing.—Every written language has them. Many of them are indeterminate and uncertain, and the contents of many old writings and inscriptions remain on that account ambiguous. These abbreviations often give rise to different readings.—They have been much less used since the invention of printing. ABEDNEGO; the Chaldean name given to Azariah, one of the three noble Hebrew youths, who, animated by an unshaken attachment to the true religion, refused to render homage to the idol of Nebuchadnezzar. They were therefore cast into the fiery furnace, heated through the wrath of the tyrant seven times hotter than usual.—The splendid miracle by which it pleased God to honor this consistent and fearless piety, together with its powerful effect upon the mind of the Chaldean monarch, is recorded in the third chapter of Daniel.—There is a circumstance connected with the change of name, which is worthy of attention. It has been thought that the motive of the Chaldeans in giving the new name, was, in fact, more religious than political. The Hebrew and the Chaldean languages were very similar. The Chaldeans perfectly understood the Hebrew names. And they knew, also, how tenacious Hebrew parents were to give names to their children, which bore some relation to JEHOVAH, the God of their fathers. In changing their names, therefore, did they not design to make them forget their beloved Jerusalem, and all the patriotic feelings which were associated with their vernacular tongue? and yet more, to detach them from the remembrance of JEHOVAH, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? The name before us is a striking example. The Hebrew Azariah, or more literally Azar-Jah, denotes, My help is JEHOVAH; from Azar, help, and Jah, JEHOVAH. But the Chaldean Abed-nego signifies the servant of Nego; Abed or Obed being the Chaldee for servant, and Nego, the sun or morning star, so called from its brightness, and hence adored among the idolatrous Chaldeans as a god. So that from being reminded, as often as he heard himself called, that JEHOVAH was his help, he was now to be brought into remembrance whenever he heard his name, that he is the servant of an idol, in whom there is no help. If such were the design of this new appellation, its ultimate end was in the case of Azariah most mercifully defeated; but the design itself will serve to set in a more striking light the danger alluded to by the Psalmist (Psalm 106: 35) of "mingling with the heathen, and learning their works." See DANIEL; SHADRACH; NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

ABEL; he was the second son of Adam and Eve, and born probably in the second or third year of the world.—His name signifies mourning, and might be given either because our first parents now began so to feel the emptiness and vanity of all earthly things, that the birth of another son reminded them painfully of it, although in itself a matter of joy; or it was imposed under prophetic impulse, and obscurely referred to his premature death. His employment was that of a shepherd; Cain followed the occupation of his father—and was a tiller of the ground. "At the end of the days;"—which is a more literal rendering than "in process of time," as in our translation, that is, on the Sabbath,—both brothers brought an offering to the Lord. Cain "brought of the fruit of the ground;" Abel "the firstlings of his flock, and the fat thereof."—"And the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering; but unto Cain and his offering he had not respect." The respect which God was pleased to bestow to Abel's offering, appears from the account to have been sensibly declared; for Cain must have known by some token that the sacrifice of Abel was accepted, the absence of which sign to his own offering, showed that it was rejected.—Whether this was by fire going forth from the presence of the Lord," to consume the sacrifice, as in later instances recorded in the Old Testament, or in some other way, it is in vain to inquire,—that the token of acceptance was a sensible one is however an almost certain inference.—The effect of this upon Cain was not to humble him before God, but to excite anger against his brother; and being in the field with him, or as the old version has it, having said to him, "Let us go out into the field," "he rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him;" and for that crime, by which the first blood of man was shed by man upon the earth, a murder aggravated by the relationship, and the "righteous" character of the sufferer, and having in it also the nature of religious persecution, he was pronounced by the Lord, "cursed from the earth."

2. As the sacrifice of Abel is the first on record, and has given rise to some controversy, it demands particular attention. It was offered, says St. Paul, "in faith," and it was "a more excellent sacrifice" than that of Cain.—Both these expressions intimate that it was expiatory, and prefigurative.

As to the matter of the sacrifice, it was an animal offering. Cain brought of the fruit of the ground; and Abel also brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof; or, more literally, "the fat of them," that is, according to the Hebrew idiom, the fattest or best of his flock; and in this circumstance consisted its specific character as an act of faith. This is supported by the import of the phrase, "pleiona thesion," used by the apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews, when speaking of the sacrifice of Abel.—Our translators have rendered it, "a more excellent sacrifice." Wickliffe translates it, as Archbishop Magee says, uncouthly, but in the full sense of the original, "a much more sacrifice;" and the controversy which has arisen on this point is, whether this epithet of "much more" or "fuller," refers to quantity or quality; whether it is to be understood in the sense of a more abundant, or of a better, a more excellent sacrifice. Dr. Kennicott takes it in the sense of measure and quantity, as well as quality; and supposes that Abel brought a double offering, of the firstlings of the flock, and of the fruit of the ground also.

His criticism has been very satisfactorily refuted by archbishop Magee. The sacrifice of Abel was that of animal victims, and it was indicative not of gratitude but of "faith;" a quality not to be made manifest by the quantity of an offering, for the one has no relation to the other.

3. This will more fully appear if we consider the import of the words of the apostle,—“By FAITH Abel offered unto God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was RIGHTEOUS, God testifying of his gifts; and by it, he, being dead, yet speaketh.”—Now what is the meaning of the apostle, when he says that it was witnessed or testified to Abel that he was righteous? His doctrine is that men are sinners; that all consequently need pardon; and to be declared, witnessed, and accounted righteous, are, according to his style of writing, the same as “to be justified, pardoned, and dealt with as righteous.” Thus he argues that Abraham believed God, “and it was accounted to him for righteousness,”—“that he received the sign of circumcision, a real, a visible confirmatory, declaratory, and witnessing work of the righteousness which he had by faith.” In these cases we have a similarity so striking, that they can scarcely fail to explain each other. In both, sinful men are placed in the condition of righteous men; the instrument, in both cases, is faith; and the transaction is, in both cases also, publicly and sensibly witnessed,—as to Abraham, by the sign of circumcision; as to Abel, by a visible acceptance of his sacrifice, and the rejection of that of Cain.

Abel had faith, and he expressed that faith by the kind of sacrifice he offered: It was in this way that his faith “pleased God;” it pleased him as a principle, and by the act to which it led, which act was the offering of a sacrifice to God different from that of Cain. Cain had not this faith, whatever might be its object; and Cain, accordingly, did not bring an offering to which God had “respect.” That which vitiated the offering of Cain was the want of this faith; for his offering was not significant of faith: that which “pleased God,” in the case of Abel, was his faith; and he had “respect” to his offering, because it was the expression of that faith; and, upon his faith so expressing itself, God witnessed to him “that he was righteous.” So forcibly do the words of St. Paul, when commenting upon this transaction, show, that Abel’s sacrifice was accepted, because of its immediate connection with his faith, for by faith he is said to have offered it; and whatever it might be, which made Abel’s offering differ from that of Cain, whether abundance, or kind, or both, this was the result of his faith. So evident also is it from the apostle, that Abel was witnessed to be “righteous,” not with reference to any previous “habit of a religious life,” as some say, but with reference to his faith; and to this faith as expressing itself by his offering “a more excellent sacrifice.”

4. If, then, the faith of Abel had an immediate connection with his sacrifice; and both, with his being accepted as “righteous,”—that is justified, in St. Paul’s use of the term,—to what had his faith respect? The particular object of the faith of the elders, celebrated in Hebrews 11, is to be deduced from the circumstances mentioned by St. Paul as illustrative of the existence and operation of this great principle, and by which it manifested itself in them. Let us explain this, and then ascertain the object of Abel’s faith also from the manner of its manifestation,—from the acts in which it embodied and rendered itself conspicuous.

Faith, in this chapter, is taken in the sense of affiance and trust in God, and, as such, it can only be exercised towards God, as to all its particular acts, in those respects in which we have some warrant to confide in him. This supposes revelation, and, in particular promises or declarations on his part, as the ground of every act of affiance. When, therefore, it is said that “by faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death,” it must be supposed that he had some promise or intimation to the effect, on which, improbable as the event was, he nobly relied; and in the result God honored his faith in the sight of all men. The faith of Noah had immediate respect to the threatened flood, and to the promise of God to preserve him in the ark which he was commanded to prepare. The chapter is filled with other instances, expressed or implied; and from the whole, as well as from the nature of things, it will appear, that, when the apostle speaks of the faith of the elders in its particular acts, he represents it as having respect to some promise, declaration, or revelation of God.

This revelation was necessarily antecedent to the faith; but it is also to be observed, that the acts by which the faith was represented, whenever it was represented by particular acts, and when the case admitted it, had a natural and striking conformity and correspondence to the previous revelation. So Noah built the ark, which indicated that he had heard the threat of the world’s destruction by water, and had received the promise of his own preservation, and that of his family, as well as that of a part of the beasts of the earth. When Abraham went into Canaan at the command of God, and upon the promise that that country should become the inheritance of his descendants, he showed his faith by taking possession of it for them in anticipation, and his residence there indicated the kind of promise he had received. Thus these instances show, that when the faith that the apostle commends exhibited itself in some particular act, that act had a correspondence to the previous promise or revelation which was the ground of faith. We must therefore interpret the acts of Abel’s faith so as to make them also correspond with an antecedent revelation. His faith had respect to some previous revelation, and the nature of the revelation is to be collected from the significant manner in which he declared his faith in it.

Now that which Abel did “by faith,” was generally to perform an act of solemn worship, in the confidence that it would be acceptable to God. This supposes a revelation, immediate or by tradition, that such acts of worship were acceptable to God, or his faith could have had no warrant, and would not have been faith, but fancy. But the case must be considered more particularly. His faith led him to offer “a more excellent sacrifice” than that of Cain; but this as necessarily implies, that there was some antecedent revelation to which his faith, as thus expressed, had respect, and upon which that peculiarity of his offering, which distinguished it from the offering of Cain, was founded; a revelation which indicated that the way in which God would be approached acceptably, in solemn worship, was by animal sacrifices. Without this, the faith to which his offering, which was an offering of the firstlings of his flock, had a special fitness and adaptation, could have had no warrant in divine authority. But this revelation must have included, in order to its being the ground of faith, as “the substance of things hoped for,” a promise of a benefit to be conferred, in which promise Abel might confide. But if so, then this promise must have been connected, not with the worship of God in general, or performed in any way whatever indifferently, but with his worship, by animal oblations; for it was in this way that the faith of Abel specially and distinctively indicated itself. The antecedent revelation was, therefore, a promise of a benefit to be conferred, by means of animal sacrifice; and we are taught what this benefit was, by that which was actually received by the offerer,—“He obtained witness that he was righteous,” which must be interpreted in the sense of a declaration of his personal justification and acceptance as righteous by the forgiveness of his sins.

The reason of Abel’s acceptance and of Cain’s rejection is hereby made manifest; the one, in seeking the divine favor, conformed to his established and appointed method of being approached by guilty men; and the other not only neglected this, but profanely and presumptuously substituted his own inventions.

5. It is impossible, then, to allow the sacrifice of Abel, in this instance, to have been an act of FAITH, without supposing that it had respect to a previous revelation, which agreed with all the parts of that sacrificial action by which he expressed his faith in it. Had Abel’s sacrifice been eucharistic merely, it would have expressed gratitude, but not faith; or if faith in the general sense of confidence in God that he would receive an act of grateful worship, and reward the worshippers, it did not more express faith than the offering of Cain, who surely believed these two points, or he would not have brought an offering of any kind.—The offering of Abel expressed faith which Cain had not;

and the doctrinal principles which Abel's faith respected were such as his sacrifice visibly embodied. If it was not an eucharistic sacrifice, it was an expiatory one; and in fact, it is only in a sacrifice of this kind, that it is possible to see that faith exhibited which Abel had, and Cain had not. If then we refer to the subsequent sacrifices of expiation appointed by Divine authority, and their explanation in the New Testament, it will be obvious to what doctrines and principles of an antecedent revelation the faith of Abel had respect, and which his sacrifice, the exhibition of his faith, proclaimed: confession of the fact of being a sinner,—acknowledgment that the demerit and penalty of sin is death,—submission to an appointed mode of expiation,—animal sacrifice offered vicariously, but, in itself, a mere type of a better sacrifice, "the Seed of the woman," appointed to be offered at some future period,—and the efficacy of this appointed method of expiation to obtain forgiveness, and to admit the guilty into the divine favor.

"Abel," Dr. Magee justly says, "in firm reliance on the promise of God, and in obedience to his command, offered that sacrifice which had been enjoined as the religious expression of his faith; whilst Cain, disregarding the gracious assurances that had been vouchsafed, or at least disdaining to adopt the prescribed mode of manifesting his belief, possibly as not appearing to his reason to possess any efficacy or natural fitness, thought he had sufficiently acquitted himself of his duty in acknowledging the general superintendence of God, and expressing his gratitude to the Supreme Benefactor, by presenting some of those good things which he thereby confessed to have been derived from his bounty. In short, Cain, the first-born of the fall, exhibits the first fruits of his parents' disobedience, in the arrogance and self-sufficiency of reason rejecting the aids of revelation, because they fell not within its apprehension of right. He takes the first place in the annals of deism, and displays, in his proud rejection of the ordinance of sacrifice, the same spirit, which, in later days, has actuated his enlightened followers, in rejecting the sacrifice of Christ."

Abel was killed about the year of the world, 130. His death was that of a martyr. His case presents the first example of persecution for conscience sake; a point of view in which it is held up to us, both by our Lord, and his beloved disciple. Mat. 23: 35. 1 John 3: 12. This was the divine prediction apparent from the beginning, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed;" a constitution of things which has been made manifest in every age of the world, and which continues to this day. John 15: 18—20. "If ye were of the world," said our Savior to his disciples, "the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, THEREFORE the world hateth you." 2 Tim. 3: 12.—Watson; Jones.

ABEL-MIZRAIM, the mourning of the Egyptians; a name given to the threshing floor of Atad, in consequence of the lamentations which attended the burial of the patriarch Jacob, in which all the nobles of Egypt united with Joseph. Gen. 50: 11. Jerome places it between Jericho and the Jordan, three miles from the former and two from the latter, where Bethgala afterwards stood.

ABEL, the plain; a prefix to several Hebrew names.—Thus, 1. ABEL-BETH-MAACHA, or plain of the temple of Maacha—the same as Abel, or Abila, a city in the tribe of Manasseh, north-west of Damascus, between Libanus and Antilibanus. It was the capital of the tetrarchy of Abilene, under the government of Lysanias. Luke 3: 1.—See ABILA.

2. ABEL-CARMAIN, of the plain of the Vineyards, a village of the Ammonites, about six miles north-west of Philadelphia, or Rabbath-Ammon. Judges 11: 33.

3. ABEL-MAIM, the same as Abel-beth-Maachah. 1 Kings 16: 20. 2 Chron. 16: 4.

4. ABEL-MEHOIAE, or ABEL-MEA, the birthplace of Elisha. It was about sixteen miles south of Scythopolis, (1 Kings 4: 12.) and celebrated for Gideon's victory over the Midianites. Judg. 7: 22.

5. ABEL-SHITIM, was in Moab about eight miles east of the Jordan, and opposite Jericho. Eusebius says it was in the neighborhood of Mount Peor. It is often called Shittim only: Shittim probably being the name of the town, and Abel of the plain on which it stood. Here Moses encamped, Num. 25: 1. 33: 49. Here, seduced by Balak, the people fell into idolatry, and worshipped Baal Peor: for which they were severely punished. Num. 25.

6. ABEL-BOHAN, the boundary between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah. Josh. 18: 17. So named from Bohan, a descendant of Reuben.

ABELA; a city in Peraca, on the Batanaca, in the half tribe of Manasseh, about twelve miles east of Gadara. 2 Sam. 20: 14.

ABELARD, (PETER), the author of what has long been known under the name of the "Scholastic Theology," was born in Palais, near Nantes, in France, in 1079. "He was a man," says Mosheim, "of the most subtle genius, whose public lectures in philosophy and divinity had raised him to the highest summit of literary renown." His lectures were attended by more than three thousand pupils of all nations. He was successively canon of Paris, and monk, and abbot of Ruys. His character however is stained by his treatment of his patron's niece, the celebrated Heloise. He was impugned by St. Bernard, for various errors, before the councils of Soissons, 1121, and Lens, 1140, and was in consequence condemned as a heretic, though it cannot be doubted that in talent and erudition he was superior to any one of his judges; and that, like men of extraordinary and erring genius in all ages, he mixed up with his crude fancies some bold and brilliant truths.

Unhappily the fame which Abelard acquired by his new method of treating theological truths, engaged many ambitious divines to adopt it; and hence the race of scholastic or philosophical divines, who multiplied so prodigiously not only in France, but also in England and Italy; and in whose hands the pure and peaceable wisdom of the gospel, was perverted into a science of mere sophistry and chicanery. The method of the scholastics exhibited an imposing aspect of learning; and as they seemed to surpass their adversaries in sagacity and genius, they excited the admiration of the studious youth, who flocked to their schools in multitudes; while the more simple Biblici, or "doctors of the sacred page" as they were called, had the mortification and grief to behold their auditories unfrequented, and almost deserted. The "subtle doctor" meanwhile continued in high repute in all the European colleges until the time of Luther.

The life of Abelard, taken in connection with the history of Christianity, affords a most instructive lesson.—His latter days were embittered by personal and domestic trials, as well as by persecution; and he closed a tedious existence at the monastery of St. Marcellus, near Châlons, in 1142, aged 63 years.

ABELIANS, or ABELONIANS, a sect in the diocese of Hippo in Africa, who professed to regulate marriage after the example of Abel, who they pretended was married, but lived in a state of continence: they therefore allowed each man to marry one woman, but enjoined them to live in the same state. To keep up the sect, when a man and woman entered into this society, they adopted a boy and girl, who were to inherit their goods, and to marry upon the same terms of not having children, but of adopting two of different sexes. As might be supposed, a sect, originating on principles so false, and opposed to the divine institution of marriage, was not of long continuance. It arose in the reign of Arcadius, and ended in that of Theodosius; but its memory remains among the proofs of human weakness, when affecting to be wiser and purer than the revealed wisdom and purity of the word of God.—Buck. Williams.

ABERNETHY, (JOHN,) an eminent Protestant divine, was born in Coleraire, Ireland, in 1680. He was the son of a dissenting minister in that town. He continued to enjoy the care of his pious parents until he was nine years of age; when he was carried by a relation into Scotland. By this event he providentially escaped the hardships of the siege of Derry, in which Mrs. Abernethy lost all her other children. After three years he was restored to his parents at Coleraire. At thirteen he entered the College at Glasgow, where he resided till he had taken his degree of master of arts. His first inclination was to the study of physic, but being dissuaded from that by his friends, he determined to apply himself to divinity; in pursuance of which design he went to the university of Edinburgh, and was sometime under the care of professor Campbell.—He prosecuted his studies with such success, that he was licensed to preach before he was one and twenty. In 1703, being invited to settle in Antrim, Dublin, and Coleraire, the synod decided in favor of Antrim, where he was accordingly ordained.

The native Irish in the neighborhood were almost universally of the popish persuasion; a great field was therefore opened for his diligence and zeal, beyond the bounds of his immediate flock. Into this field he entered; he visited, conversed, and lectured among them, in a manner which showed how much his heart was set upon their conversion to God and truth; and although his success was not equal to his hopes, yet his labors were not in vain.—Numbers renounced popery, and several gave permanent evidence of sincere piety, as well as of the adoption of the Protestant faith.

At the time the Bangorian controversy raged in England, a considerable number of ministers, and others in the north of Ireland, formed themselves into a society for mutual improvement: Their professed object was to bring things to the test of reason and scripture, without servile regard to any human authority. Abernethy went into this plan with much zeal, and constantly attended their meetings at Belfast, whence it was called the Belfast society. The discussions here took a range which ended in a rupture with the general synod, in 1726. Even the reputation of Abernethy was no security for him. Some of his people forsook his ministry, and such was the rapid increase of disaffection, that a distinct congregation was erected, and a minister settled over them, by the synod. Being about this time invited by the congregation of Wood-street, Dublin, to become their pastor, he accepted. In Dublin he applied himself to his studies with renewed energy, and for ten years labored with increasing reputation. But while from the strength of his constitution, and his great temperance, his friends promised themselves a longer enjoyment of him, he was attacked by the gout to which he had been subject, in a vital part, and died December, 1740, in the 60th year of his age.

Mr. Abernethy's character justly entitled him to the respect and esteem of all who had the happiness of his acquaintance; for his private and public virtues were equally conspicuous. His piety was manly and rational, fervent and exalted. He was exactly temperate—even to abstemiousness; yet his manners were pervaded by a most amiable cheerfulness, ease, and freedom: so that in his character and deportment it was seen that religion is in reality the very perfection of reason. His disposition was full of sensibility, delicacy and kindness; his wit keen, but chastised; his passions naturally strong, but subdued by wise and constant discipline, into singular meekness and submission to the divine will. In the family his piety was most exemplary. As a preacher his first efforts were very promising; but his subsequent attainments exceeded all the anticipations even of his friends. Indeed, he took uncommon pains to qualify himself for every part of the public service of the sanctuary, and success corresponded to his diligence.

The most celebrated of his works are his "Discourses concerning the Being and Perfections of God," in two volumes; the first of which only was published in his lifetime. They excited general attention and admiration. Four volumes of his posthumous sermons were likewise published; the first two in 1748, and the others in 1757, with a large preface, containing the life of the author.

ABESTA, the name of one of the sacred books of the Persian Magi, when they ascribe to their great founder Zoroaster. The Abesta is a commentary on two others of their religious books, called Zend and Pazend; the three together including the whole system of the Ignicoid, or worshippers of fire.

ABETTORS, ACCESSARIES, ACCOMPLICES, in criminal cases, such as support another in his designs by connivance, encouragement, or help. In these cases the abettors are universally regarded as involved in the guilt of the principal. Ps. 50: 18. Prov. 13: 20. 2 John 11. Abetting evil by connivance is a thing far too common in practical questions of morals and religion. Our Lord has determined a point of great importance in the final judgment of character, and one in which we are deeply interested, when he says "He that is not with me, is against me." (Mat. 12: 30.) i. e. is abetting the evils I came to abolish from the world.

ABIAH, see ABUJAH.

ABIATHAR, the son of Ahimelech, and the tenth high priest among the Jews, being the fourth in descent from Eli. 2 Sam. 8: 17. 1 Chron. 18: 16. When Saul sent to Nob to murder all the priests, Abiathar escaped the massacre, and fled to David in the wilderness. There he continued in the quality of high priest; but Saul out of aversion to Ahimelech, whom he imagined to have betrayed his interests, transferred the dignity of the high priesthood from Ithamar's family into that of Eleazer, by conferring this office upon Zadok. Thus there were at the same time two high priests in Israel, Abiathar with David, and Zadok with Saul. In this state things continued until the reign of Solomon, when Abiathar being attached to the party of Adonijah, was by Solomon divested of his priesthood, A. M. 2989; and the race of Zadok alone performed the functions of that office during the reign of Solomon, to the exclusion of the family of Ithamar, according to the word of the Lord to Eli, 1 Sam. 2: 30, &c.

"A difficulty arises from the circumstance that in 1 Kings 2: 27, Abiathar is said to be deprived of the priest's office by Solomon; while in 2 Sam 8: 17. 1 Chron. 18: 16. 24: 3, 6, 31. Ahimelech the son of Abiathar, is said to be high priest along with Zadok. The most probable solution is, that both father and son each bore the two names Ahimelech and Abiathar; as was not at all unusual among the Jews. In this way also we may remove the difficulty arising from Mark 2: 26, where Abiathar is said to have given David the shew-bread, in allusion to 1 Sam. 21: 1. &c., where it is Ahimelech."—Robinson's Bible Dictionary; Horne's Introduction, Vol. I. p. 538.

AFIB, the name of the first month in the Jewish sacred year. Exod. 13: 4. This month was afterwards called Nisan; it contained thirty days, and answered to our March. It signifies green ears, and was so named because grain, particularly barley, was in ear at that time. It was an early custom to give names to months from the appearances of nature; and the custom is still in force among many nations. The year among the Jews commenced in September, and consequently their jubilees and other civil matters were regulated in that way, Lev. 25: 8—10; but their sacred year began in Abib, according to the divine command, Exod. 12: 2. "This shall be to you the beginning of months." See MONTHS.

ABIDE, this word in the scriptures means more than mere passive or temporary residence. It is used for voluntary vital attachment, dependence and adherence, the result of the most intimate and permanent union. Thus John 15: 4. our Savior says, "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine; so neither can ye, except ye abide in me." See also 2 Tim. 2: 13. 1 John 2: 17, 28. John 15: 4, 9. 14: 16; but particularly, Col. 2: 6, 7. Christians often speak of living near to Christ; the Bible speaks of living in Him.—What force is there in this idea! "Return unto thy rest in Him, O my soul."

If this term then be used to signify a settled residence, how awful is that passage, John 3: 36. "He that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God

ABIDESTH on him." Withering idea! that a human soul should be a home for the residence of the wrath of God!

ABIGAIL, a woman of excellent understanding, and of great beauty, the wife of Nabal, the Carmelite, and afterwards of David, 1 Sam. 25: 14—42. Her son by the latter marriage, is called in one place Chiliab, and in another Daniel, (2 Sam. 3: 3. 1 Chron. 3: 1.) and is one example among many, of the same person bearing two names; a fact which solves several seeming contradictions in the Old and New Testament. 2. A sister of David, and mother of Amasa. 1 Chron. 2: 16, 17.

ABIHU, one of the sons of Aaron, who with his brother Nadab, was destroyed by fire from God for presuming to offer incense to Him with strange fire, instead of that from his altar. Lev. 10: 1, 2. This awful event occurred only eight days after their consecration: and their sin seems to have been occasioned by wine, which was afterwards forbidden to priests, when about to minister in the sanctuary. A punishment so sudden and severe, was designed to impress all God's ministers with the immense importance of fidelity in discharging the duties of their office; observing his will in every particular, that He may be glorified.—But had it not also a deeper meaning? May it not be regarded as a standing example of that divine wrath which shall consume all who pretend to serve God, except with incense kindled from the one altar and offering by which he forever perfects them that are sanctified?—Jones.

ABIJAH, or ABIA, a priest of the posterity of Aaron, and founder of a family. When the priests were divided into twenty-four classes, the eighth was called from him the class of Abia. 1 Chron. 24: 10. Luke 1: 5.

ABILA, or ABELA, called by the Greeks Leucadia, that is, "white rock town," the capital of Abilene, Luke 3: 1. It was situated in a plain adjacent to the river Croisorrhos, or Abana. Several medals, still extant, serve to identify its site, and to show that it was a place of considerable magnitude and importance. Two of these are given by Calmet. Some antiquities and inscriptions are mentioned by Pococke as still remaining in the neighborhood, which confirm the fact of its former consequence.—It is now called Bellinas.

ABILENE; a province of Caelosyria, between the two Libani, of which Lysanias was tetrarch.

ABILITY; see INABILITY.

ABIMELECH, My father the King: from Abi, my father, and Melech, king. 1. The title of the kings of Philistia, as Cæsar was of the Roman emperors, and Pharaoh of the sovereigns of Egypt. Two kings under this name are mentioned in Genesis, one of whom appears to have been the son of the other. Gen. 20. Gen. 26.

In regard to the first, it has been thought strange that a miraculous interference should have been necessary (as in the case of Pharaoh, Gen. 12: 14—20.) to convince him of his criminality in detaining the wife of Abraham; and equally strange that Abraham could not procure Sarah's release by proper application and request. But such thoughts arise only from ignorance of the customs of the east. Whenever a woman is taken into the harem of an eastern prince with the design of making her his wife, she is secluded without a possibility of coming out, at least during the life of the prince on the throne. Nor is communication with women in the harem in ordinary cases to be obtained. The late editor of Calmet has given an affecting instance in the case of colonel Pitt, an officer of the Russian army, whose wife and daughter, both beautiful women, fell into the hands of the Tartars, and were presented to the grand signior at Constantinople. The efforts of the distracted father and husband to procure their release, only resulted in his own imprisonment in a dungeon, with the dreadful assurance that when any of the sex were once taken into the seraglio, they were never suffered to quit it more. Critical Review, vol. iii. p. 332. This anecdote places the propriety of some exertion of Providence in behalf of Abraham in the strongest light. It seems also to explain the fears of both Abraham and Isaac, arising from the remarkable beauty of Sarah and Rebecca, and tempting them both to use culpable dissimulation.—The life of a husband, it may be easily understood, had but a small chance of being preserved when it stood in the way of despotic indulgence. Yet the Abimelechs of Gerar, at that time seem to have retained something of the fear of God. A. M. 2200. B. C. 1804.

2. The son of Gibeon, a usurper and murderer, to expose whose infamous character to the infatuated people of Israel, Jotham pronounced his celebrated fable of the trees. Judg. 9: 1—54. This is the oldest fable on record, and shows with what power the reason and conscience can be addressed through the medium of the imagination. A. M. 2771. B. C. 1233.

ABISHAG; the young and beautiful wife of David, selected to cherish him in his old age. After David's death, his son Adonijah demanded her in marriage; but Solomon justly supposing that this was only a step towards his assumption of the regal power, refused his solicitation, and punished his treasonable design with death. 1 Kings 1: 3. 2: 13—27.

ABISHAI, son of Zuri and Zeruiah, David's sister, was one of the most valiant men of his time and a chief general in David's armies. Some of his exploits are mentioned in 2 Sam. 21: 16. and 23: 18. He was brother to Joab and Asahel; but in his character and services to his uncle the king, he seems to have surpassed them both, and to have been through life David's favorite general and friend. 1 Sam. 26: 7—11. 2 Sam. 2: 18, 24. 10: 10. 16: 9. 18: 2. 20: 6. 21: 16. 23: 18. 1 Chron. 11: 20, 21. 18: 12. 19: 11, 15.

ABISHUA, the son of Phineas. He was the fourth in succession who filled the office of high priest among the Hebrews. The Chronicon of Alexandria places him in the days of Ehud, judge of Israel. Judg. 3: 1 Chron. 6: 50. Josephus calls him Abiezor.

ABLUTION, a ceremony in use among the ancients, and still practised in several parts of the world. It consisted in washing the body, which was always done before sacrificing, or even entering their houses. Ablutions appear to be as old as any ceremonies, and external worship itself. Moses enjoined them, the heathens adopted them, and Mahomet and his followers have continued them. The Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Jews, all had them. The ancient Christians had their ablutions before communion, which the Romish church still retain before their mass, and sometimes after. The Syrians, Copts, &c. have their solemn washings on Good Friday; the Turks also have their ablutions, their Ghost, their Wodon, Aman, &c.—Buck.

ABNER, the son of Ner, uncle to king Saul, and general of his armies. After the death of Saul, he supported Ishbosheth for seven years; but conceiving himself injured by him, he went over to David. He was treacherously slain by Joab under the pretence of his being a spy; but more probably either from jealousy of his influence, or to revenge the death of his brother Asahel. David highly disapproved the conduct of Joab, (see JOAB.) and composed an elegy on the death of Abner. 2 Sam. 2d and 3d chs.—A. M. 2956.

ABOMINATION, or ABOMINABLE; these terms always denote things which are hateful and detestable to the last degree. Genesis 43: 32. Lev. 7: 18. Deut. 7: 25, 26. They are the strongest terms the language affords. Hence,

1. SIN IN GENERAL, being the reverse of the divine perfections and law, and the object of God's most awful and unchangeable displeasure, is frequently styled an ABOMINATION. Prov. 3: 32. 8: 7. 17: 15. Jer. 7: 10. 44: 22. To be holy as he is holy, we must penitently view it in the same light; and hate, avoid, and oppose it, with the same inflexible constancy. This is in fact the precise sense of the precept, (Rom. 12: 9.) "Let love be without dissimulation: ABOR THAT WHICH IS EVIL; cleave to that which is good." That is, the proof of the sincerity of your love, whether to God or man, lies in its being invariably attended with a lively abhorrence of sin, and an ardent attachment to holiness.

2. PARTICULAR SINS are in various passages of scripture stigmatized as ABOMINATIONS. For example, pride, Prov. 16: 5. Lawlessness, or a contentious, unteachable, ungodly spirit, Prov. 3: 32. False doctrine, Rev. 17: 4. Hypocrisy, Prov. 15: 5. 21: 27. 28: 9. Scorning, 24: 9. False swearing or perjury, Jer. 7: 9, 10. Murder; adultery, and theft, Jer. 7: 9, 10. Falsehood, Prov. 12: 22: Things that are highly esteemed among men, particularly covetousness, Luke 16: 14, 15. Idolatry, with all its instruments and appendages, Ex. 8: 26. Deut. 17: 2—7. 12: 31. 18: 9—14.

3. VARIOUS FORMS OF PARTICULAR SINS, especially when of a very gross description, are marked out as ABOMINATIONS—as, offering blemished or deformed sacrifices, Deut. 17: 1.; eating forbidden kinds of food, Lev. 11.; every species of unchastity, Lev. 18: 29, 30.; wearing the dress of the opposite sex, Deut. 22: 5.; a false balance, false weights, and measures, Prov. 11: 20. 20: 10, 23.; a proud look, a lying tongue, murderous hands, a heart of wicked imaginations, feet swift to mischief, a false witness, and he that soweth discord among brethren, Prov. 6: 16—19.

4. EMPHASES, or distinctive uses of the term. To "make an abomination," is to make an idol, Deut. 27: 15.; to "commit abomination," is to practise idolatry, or unnatural crimes, Ez. 16: 50. Rev. 21: 27. "Abominable works," are actions tainted and corrupted by impiety, Ps. 14: 1. "The abominable," mentioned as a distinct class, Rev. 21: 8. are probably such as arc guilty of unnatural crime; a character mournfully prevalent throughout the heathen world. Rom. 1: 26—32. 1 Cor. 5: 9—11.

In reference therefore not to idolatry alone, but to every sin, in every form, and especially the sin that most easily besets us, let us act as though we heard perpetually those most affecting words, ever uttered by the All Holy, Oh, do not this abominable thing which I hate.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION; this phrase seems to be used (Dan. 11: 31.) as a general designation, for whatever denotes the triumph of idolatrous power over the sanctuary of God. Its more particular reference in the New Testament, is to the Roman armies under Titus. Dan. 9: 27. 12: 11. compared with Mat. 24: 15. The images of their gods and emperors were delineated on the ensigns of the Romans; and the ensigns themselves, especially the eagles which were carried at the heads of the legions, were objects of worship; and therefore, according to the style of scripture, an abomination. The horror with which the Jews regarded them, sufficiently appears from two facts mentioned by Josephus—Pilate's attempt to put his troops in winter quarters at Jerusalem, and Vitellius' proposing to march through Judea to attack Aretas, king of Petra. The people supplicated and remonstrated against both, on religious accounts, to such a degree, that Pilate was obliged to remove his army, and Vitellius to march his troops another way. Jerome informs us that the Jews themselves applied, Dan. 9: 27. to the Romans. The appearance of their idolatrous banners therefore at Jerusalem, was the prophetic sign that "the desolation thereof was nigh." The evangelists Matthew and Mark add to our Lord's prediction in a parenthesis, "Whoso readeth, let him understand;" hereby intimating that this event was approaching, though yet future when their histories were published, and that the reader who consulted his own safety, would do well to retire seasonably from the devoted city. Mat. 24: 15. Mark 13: 14.—In forty years from the time "the Messiah was cut off" by wicked hands, (to use the sublime language of Bossuet,) "the Roman eagle descended, and Judea was no more."

ABORIGINES; the earliest inhabitants of a country; those of whom no original can be traced. It is used among us in this country, to denote the Indian tribes, in distinction from the present civilized inhabitants who are of European descent.

Upon this country, it has been said with equal eloquence and truth, rests a responsibility in relation to the Indian tribes, of deep and tremendous import. Sovereigns from time immemorial of the interminable forests which overshadow this vast continent, this injured race have gradually been driven within the limits of their present precarious possessions. One after another of their favorite rivers has been reluctantly abandoned, until the range of the hunter is bounded by lines prescribed by his invader, and the independence of the warrior is no more. Of the innumerable tribes which, a few centuries since, roamed fearless and independent their native forests, how many have been swept into oblivion, and are with the generations before the flood! Of others not a trace remains but in tradition, or in the person of some solitary wanderer, the last of his tribe, who hovers like a ghost among the sepulchres of his fathers—a spark still faintly glimmering in the ashes of an extinguished race! Alas! shall the corrupt arts of avarice, or the strong arm of civilized power still pursue this unhappy people? Shall the increasing and relentless force of emigration drive them from forest to forest, until the last remnant struggling for existence, shall fall on the verge of the western ocean, or perish in its flood? Will not the voice of humanity prompt us to arrest this unremitting progress of extermination? But how? Not certainly by breaking down the restrictions on Indian trade; for this would let loose upon them a horde of selfish and unprincipled adventurers. But continue and enforce those restrictions, and at the same time encourage and increase the missionary institutions of our country; and the time is not far distant, when the savage shall be converted into the citizen, and the hunter be changed into the agriculturist and mechanic; when throughout that vast extent of country from the Mississippi to the Pacific, the red man and the white man shall be found in every place, mingling in the same society, cherishing the same benevolent and friendly views, fellow citizens of the same social and religious community, and fellow heirs to one eternal inheritance in the kingdom of heaven.

For particulars respecting the Aborigines of this country, and the efforts now in progress for their Christianization, see the Missionary Gazetteer, in the latter part of this volume.

ABOUND; the peculiar force of this emphatic word has never yet been sufficiently illustrated. It is generally taken to be equivalent with to increase, or to be full; but if so, why does so accurate a writer as St. Paul, in 1 Thess. 3: 12. add the word abound to the word increase, and in Phil. 4: 18. after saying, "I have all," immediately subjoin, "and abound?" This use of the word evidently implies, that, in the apostle's own mind, it conveyed some additional, or stronger idea. What that idea is, may be ascertained by turning to Prov. 8: 24. where the word first occurs, in a connection that clearly unfolds its exact meaning, "fountains abounding with water." This peculiarly rich and beautiful idea of the exuberant and overflowing fulness of a fountain, a fulness rising and spreading from deep and inexhaustible springs, is the appropriate meaning of this word, as any one may perceive who will carefully consult all the passages where it occurs in the bible. In this light what new force is added to our conceptions of such expressions as the following.

Rom. 5: 20. "Moreover the law entered that the offence might abound." This may be taken either positively, or in relation to our conceptions; since the introduction of clearer light, by the written law, did not only manifest with more distinctness the extent, the power, the criminal nature, pollution, and punishment of sin; but by encountering the opposition of the human heart, and operating as a test of its sinfulness, did occasion an incalculable increase in the number and aggravations of human transgression. In its light, sin seemed already to have overflowed the whole world, like the waters of the deluge when the fountains of the great deep were broken up; pervading, filling, overflowing every human heart, lip, and life; while new disobedience to its commands, new violations of its restrictions, new excuses, evasions or blasphemous objections to its threatened penalties, continually rising into existence, swelled yet more and more the appalling and apparently endless flood of guilt and ruin.

"But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." Even where the introduction of the written law had charged human guilt with its heaviest aggravations, had so immensely extended men's conceptions of the universality and evil of sin, and proved its power to be beyond the influence of any light, authority, or sanctions of mere law to repress and subdue; there the introduction of the gospel unfolded a depth of contrivance, power, and compassion in the Divine Mind, fully and abundantly adequate to the exigencies of the case. He therefore who receives and relies upon the gospel of Christ, though the very chief of sinners, shall find that the grace of God therein revealed as flowing through the cross, infinitely exceeds his most enlarged conceptions, wants, and desires; that springing from sources not only apparently, but absolutely even inexhaustible, "the unsearchable riches of Christ," it overflows, prevails, and triumphs over all his aggravated guilt, corruption, and unworthiness; not only pardoning, but purifying, not only saving from endless ruin, but exalting to endless joy! "That as sin had reigned" under the administration of law "UNTIL DEATH," even so under the administration of the gospel, "might grace reign through righteousness UNTO ETERNAL LIFE by Jesus Christ our Lord."

Eph. 1: 8. "Wherein he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence." The apostle here suggests to us that God, in the method of dispensing the riches of his grace, has pursued a course in which his prudence and wisdom appear equally conspicuous as his unfathomable love—in bestowing his grace on sinners only through a redeeming mediation, lest the law should be dishonored and made of no effect, Rom. 3: 31.; in selecting the only fit person to be a mediator between God and man, John 3: 16. 1 Tim. 2: 5.; in appointing him his proper work, its several offices, and periods, Gal. 4: 4, 5. Isa. 53: 10—12. Heb. 3: 1, 2. 8: 6—12.; in arranging the circumstances of his incarnation, sufferings, and glory, Isa. 42: 1—4. 52: 13—15. John 10: 18. 12: 49, 50. 14: 31. Acts 4: 27, 28.; in the time, instruments, and manner of publishing the gospel, Eph. 3: 1—11. 4: 7—16.; in the measure and ministers of its success, and the glory of its ultimate issues, 1 Cor. 1: 26—31. 3: 5—9. 2 Cor. 2: 12—16. Gal. 3: 8. 1 John 3: 8. Rev. 11: 15. 20: 1—6. 21: 1—27.; and lastly, in ordering all the allotments, advantages, afflictions, and deliverances of individual believers, so as to work out their spiritual and everlasting good. Rom. 8: 28—39. 1 Cor. 3: 21—23. 2 Cor. 4: 15.

Rom. 3: 7. "If the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" In this objection to the doctrine of human responsibility, the truth of God is represented under the image of a perennial and majestic stream, whose depth and force become more visible by means of the obstructions raised against it; which, however formidable in appearance, it surmounts with the utmost ease in consequence of its own overflowing fullness. This objection—commonly urged on the admitted fact, that the declarations of God in his word touching human depravity, are seen to be true with more abundant evidence in every fresh instance of sin, and especially in the false assumptions of those who deny the divine testimony—is repelled by the apostle, by appealing to its monstrous consequences. The principle of the objection is, that whatever conduct serves in any way, even by way of contrast, to illustrate the glory of the divine attributes, cannot be criminal, and worthy of punishment. The apostle says, if such a principle be true, (inasmuch as it is certain that the divine perfections will appear more glorious by opposition to human depravity, and the very lie of him who denies it, but confirms the truth of that God who affirms it,) then that depravity might be justified and indulged to any extent, under the specious pretext of "doing evil that good might come"—an abominable maxim, confounding the very distinction between good and evil, scorning every restraint of virtue, sanctioning every crime, and subverting the moral government of God from its foundation.—The apostle therefore pronounces the final condemnation of such as adopt it, to be just.

Prov. 29: 22. "A furious man aboundeth in transgression;" and Mat. 24: 12. "because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold." In both these passages we may remark the allusion to an overflowing fountain or stream, which breaks over its ordinary limits, and spreads and deepens on every side.

1 Cor. 15: 58. "Always abounding in the works of the Lord." The addition of the word "always," adds to the beautiful idea of this passage the utmost force and magnificence. This, then, is the only scriptural measure, that we be continually rising above measure; not resting in present attainments or usefulness; not satisfied with the standard of our predecessors and contemporaries; but as circumstances supply opportunity, and experience gives facility, pleasure and skill, breaking away from the limits of the past, and seeking a wider sphere of action in the future, in the fullness of a heart exuberant with zeal and affection, and "always overflowing in the work of the Lord."—Philippians 1: 9—11. 1 Thessalonians 4: 1. 2 Corinthians 9: 8.

ABRAHAM, originally called ABRAM, the son of Terah, born at Ur, a city of Chaldee, A. M. 2008, only two years after the death of Noah, though there were nine generations between them. He descended from that patriarch in the line of Shem, upon whose family the promised blessing of giving birth to the Messiah appears to have been entailed by his father's prophecy, and was the tenth person from him in lineal descent, Gen. 9: 26. His history claims the attention of the biographer under two distinct points of view; first, as the founder of the Jewish nation, God's peculiar people, who all descended from his loins, and are termed Israel after the flesh; and secondly, as "the father of the faithful," or head of the true Israel, that innumerable company consisting of both Jews and Gentiles, who imitate his faith, and are consequently made participators of that blessedness wherewith Abraham himself was blessed, Rom. 2: 28, 29. 9: 4—8.

1. A word upon the call of the patriarch. Chaldee, the native country of Abraham, was inhabited by a pastoral people, who were almost irresistibly invited to the study of the motions of the heavenly bodies, by the peculiar serenity of the heavens in that climate, and their habit of spending their nights in the open air in tending their flocks. The first rudiments of astronomy, as a science, are traced to this region; and here, too, one of the earliest forms of idolatry, the worship of the host of heaven, usually called Tsbaism, first began to prevail. During the three hundred and fifty years which elapsed between the deluge and the birth of Abraham, this and other idolatrous superstitions had greatly corrupted the human race, perverted the simple forms of the patriarchal religion, and beclouded the import of its typical rites.—The family of Abraham was idolatrous, for "his fathers served other gods beyond the flood," that is, the great river Euphrates; but whether he himself was in the early period of his life an idolater, we are not informed by Moses. The Arabian and Jewish legends speak of his early idolatry, his conversion from it, and of his zeal in breaking the images in his father's house; but these are little to be depended on. Whilst Abraham was still sojourning in Ur, "the God of glory" appeared to him, and said unto him, "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred, and go into the land which I shall show thee;" and so firm was his faith in the providence and care of God, that although the place of his future abode was not indicated, nor any information given of the nature of the country, or the character of its inhabitants, he nevertheless promptly obeyed, "and went out not knowing whither he went." Terah his father, Nahor his brother, and Lot his nephew, the son of Haran, his deceased brother, accompanied him; a circumstance which indicates that if the family had formerly been idolatrous, it had now received the faith of Abraham. They first migrated to Haran, or Charan, in Mesopotamia, a flat, barren region westward of Ur; and after a residence there of a few years, during which Terah had died, Abraham left Haran to go into Palestine, taking with him Sarah his wife, who had no child, and Lot, with his paternal property. Nahor appears to have been left in Haran. To this second migration also he was incited by a divine command, accompanied by the promise of a numerous issue, that his seed should become a great nation, and, above all, that "in him all the families of the earth should be blessed;" in other words, that the Messiah, known among the patriarchs as the promised "seed of the woman," should be born in his line. Palestine was then inhabited by the Canaanites, from whom it was called Canaan. Abraham, leading his tribe, first settled at Sechem, a valley between the mountains Ebal and Gerizim, where God appeared to him and promised to give him the land of Canaan, and where, as in other places where he remained any time, he built an altar to the Lord. He then removed to a hilly region on the north of Jericho; and, as the pastures were shortened, migrated southward, till a famine drove

Abraham and his sons, show the manner in which the earth was gradually covered with people. In those ages, some cities had been built, and the country to some extent about them cultivated; but wide spaces of unoccupied land lay between them. A part of society following therefore the pastoral life, led forth their flocks, and, in large family tribes, of which the parent was the head, uniting both the sovereign power and the priesthood in himself, and with a train of servants attached to the tribe by hereditary ties, pitched their camps wherever a fertile and unappropriated district offered them pasture. A few of these nomadic tribes appear to have made the circuit of the same region, seldom going far from their native seats; which would probably have been the case with Abraham, had he not received the call of God to depart to a distant country. Others, more bold, followed the track of rivers, and the sweep of fertile valleys, and at length some built cities and formed settlements in those distant regions; whilst others, either from attachment to their former mode of life, or from necessity, continued in their pastoral occupations, and followed the supplies afforded for their flocks by the still expanding regions of the fertile earth. Wars and violences, droughts, famines, and the constant increase of population, continued to impel these innumerable, but, at first, small streams of men into parts still more remote. Those who settled on the seacoast began to use that element, both for supplying themselves with a new species of food, and as a medium of communication by vessels with other countries, for the interchange of such commodities as their own lands afforded, with those offered by maritime states more or less distant. Thus were laid the foundations of commerce, and thus the maritime cities were gradually rendered opulent and powerful. Colonies were in time transported from them by means of their ships, and settlers on the coasts of still more distant and fertile countries. Thus the migration of the three principal families proceeded from the central regions of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria; and in succession they established numerous communities,—the Phenicians, Arabians, Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Lybians, southward;—the Persians, Indians, and Chinese, eastward;—the Scythians, Celts, and Tartars, northward;—and the Goths, Greeks, and Latins, westward, even as far as the Peruvians and Mexicans of South America, and the Indians of North America.

3. Abraham, knowing the dissolute character of the Egyptians, directed Sarah to call herself his sister, which she was, although by another mother; fearing that if they knew her to be his wife, they would not only seize her, but kill him. This circumstance indicates the vicious state of morals and government of Egypt at this early period. In this affair Abraham has been blamed for want of faith in God; but it was perhaps no more than an act of common prudence, as the seraglio of the Egyptian monarch was supported by any means, however violent and lawless. Sarah, upon the report of her beauty, was seized and taken into his harem; and God sent great plagues upon his house, which, from their extraordinary character, he concluded to be divine judgments. This led to inquiry, and on discovering that he was detaining another man's wife by violence, he sent her back, and dismissed Abraham, laden with presents.

4. After the famine, Abraham returned to Canaan, and pitched his tents between Bethel and Hai, where he had previously raised an altar. Here, as his flocks and herds, and those of Lot, had greatly increased, and strifes had arisen between their herdsmen as to pasturage and water, they peaceably separated, Lot returning to the plain of the Jordan, which, before the destruction of Sodom, was "as the garden of God;" and Abraham to Mamre, near Hebron, after receiving a renewal of the promise, that God would give him the whole land for a possession. The separation of Abraham and Lot still further secured the unmingled descent of the Abrahamite family. The territories of the kings of the cities of the plain, were a few years afterward invaded by a confederacy of the petty kings of the Euphrates and the neighboring countries, and Lot and his family were taken prisoners. This intelligence being brought to Abraham, he collected the men of his tribe, three hundred and eighteen, and falling upon the kings by night, near the fountains of Jericho, he defeated them, retook the spoil, and recovered Lot. On his return, passing near Salem, supposed to be the city afterwards called Jerusalem, he was blest by its king Melchisedek, who was priest of the most high God; so that the knowledge and worship of Jehovah had not quite departed at that time from the Canaanitish nations. To him Abraham gave a title of the spoil. The rest he generously restored to the king of Sodom, refusing, in a noble spirit of independence, to retain so much as "a shoe latchet," except the portion which, by usage of war, fell to the young native sheiks, Aner, Eschel, and Mamre, who had joined him in the expedition.

5. After this he had another encouraging vision of God, Gen. 15: 1; and to his complaint that he was still childless, and that his name and property would descend to the stranger Eliezer, who held the next rank in his tribe, the promise was given, that he himself should have a son, and that his seed should be countless as the stars of heaven. And it is emphatically added, "He believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness." He was then fully assured, that he stood before God, a pardoned and accepted man, "whose iniquities were forgiven" and to whom "the Lord did not impute sin." Still the fulfilment of the promise of a son was delayed; and Sarah, perhaps despairing that it would be accomplished in her person, and the revelation which had been made merely stating that this son should be the fruit of Abraham's body, without any reference to her, she gave to him, according to the custom of those times, one of her handmaids, an Egyptian, to be his secondary wife, who brought forth Ishmael. Children born in this manner had the privileges of legitimacy; but, fourteen years afterwards, when Abraham was a hundred years old, and Sarah ninety, the Lord appeared to him again, established his covenant with him and with his seed, changed his name to Abraham, "the father of many nations," promised that Sarah herself should bring forth the son to whom the preceding promises had referred, instituted circumcision as the sign of the covenant; and changed the name of his wife from Sarai, my princess, to Sarah, the princess, that is, of many people, to descend from her.

6. At this time Abraham occupied his former encampment near Hebron. Here, as he sat in the door of his tent, three mysterious strangers appeared. Abraham, with true Arabian hospitality, received and entertained them. The chief of the three renewed the promise of a son to be born from Sarah, a promise which she received with a laugh of incredulity, for which she was mildly reproved. As Abraham accompanied them towards the valley of the Jordan, the same Divine Person, for so he manifestly appears, announced the dreadful ruin impending over the licentious cities among which Lot had taken up his abode. No passage, even in the sacred writings, exhibits a more exalted view of the divine condescension, than that in which Abraham is seen expostulating on the apparent injustice of involving the innocent in the ruin of the guilty: "Shall the city perish, if fifty, if forty-five, if forty, if thirty, if twenty, if ten righteous men be found within its walls?" "Ten righteous men shall avert its doom." Such was the promise of the Celestial Visitant; but the guilt was universal, the ruin inevitable; and the violation of the sacred laws of hospitality and nature, which Lot in his horror attempted to avert by the most revolting expedient, confirmed the justice of the divine sentence.

7. Sarah having conceived, according to the divine promise, Abraham left the plain of Mamre, and went south, to Gerar, where Abimelech reigned; and again fearing lest Sarah should be forced from him, and himself be put to death, her beauty having been, it would appear, preternaturally continued, notwithstanding her age, he here called her, as he had done in Egypt, his sister. Abimelech took her to his house, designing to marry her; but God having, in a dream, informed him that she was Abraham's wife, he returned her to him with great presents. This year Sarah was delivered of Isaac; and Abraham circumcised him according to the covenant stipulation; and when he was weaned made a great entertainment. Sarah, having observed Ishmael, son of Hagar, mocking her son Isaac, said to Abraham, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son, for Ishmael shall not be heir with Isaac." After great reluctance Abraham complied; God having informed him that this was according to the appointments of his providence, with respect to future ages. About the same time, Abimelech came with Phicol, his general, to conclude an alliance with Abraham, who made that prince a present of seven ewe lambs out of his flock, in confirmation that a well he had opened should be his own property; and they called the place Beersheba, or "the well of swearing," because of the covenant there ratified with oaths. Here Abraham planted a grove, built an altar, and for some time resided, Gen. 20. and 21.

8. More than twenty years after this, (A. M. 2133,) God, for the final trial and illustration of Abraham's faith, directed him to offer up his son Isaac. Abraham took his son and two servants, and went towards mount Moriah. When within sight of the mountain, Abraham left his servants, and ascended it with his son only; and there having bound him, he prepared for the affecting sacrifice; but when he was about to give the blow, an angel from heaven cried out to him, "Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing to him. Now I know that thou fearest God, since thou hast not withheld thine only son from me." Abraham turning, saw a ram entangled in the bush by his horns; and he offered this animal as a burnt-offering, instead of his son Isaac. This memorable place he called by the prophetic name, Jehovah-Jirch or, the Lord will see—or provide, (Gen. 22: 1—14.) having respect, no doubt, to the true sacrifice, which, in the fulness of time, was to be offered for the whole world upon the same mountain.

9. Twelve years afterwards, Sarah, wife of Abraham, died in Hebron. Abraham came to mourn and to perform the funeral offices for her. He addressed the people at the city gate, entreating them to allow him to bury his wife among them; for, being a stranger, and having no land of his own, he could claim no right of interment in any sepulchre of that country. He, therefore, bought of Ephron, one of the inhabitants, the field of Machpelah, with the cave and sepulchre in it, at the price of four hundred shekels of silver, about forty-five pounds sterling. And here Abraham buried Sarah, with due solemnities, according to the custom of the country, Gen. 23. This whole transaction impressively illustrates the dignity, courtesy, and honor of those ancient chiefs; and wholly disproves the notion that theirs was a rude and unpolished age.

10. Abraham having grown old, sent Eliezer, his steward, into Mesopotamia, with directions to obtain a young woman of his own family, as a wife for his son Isaac. Eliezer executed his commission with fidelity, and brought back Rebecca, the daughter of Bethuel, granddaughter of Nahor, and consequently Abraham's niece, whom Isaac married. Abraham afterwards married Keturah, by whom he had six sons, Zimran, Jokshao, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah; who became heads of different people, which dwelt in Arabia and around it. He died, aged an hundred and seventy-five years, and was buried with Sarah, his wife, in the cave of Machpelah, which he had purchased of Ephron, Gen. 24. and 25. A. M. 2163, before Christ, 1821.

11. Abraham himself, with his family, may be regarded as a type of the church of God in future ages. They indeed constituted God's ancient church. Not that many scattered patriarchal and family churches did not remain: such was that of Melchisedek; and such probably was that of Nahor, whom Abraham left behind in Mesopotamia. But a visible church relation was established between Abraham's family and the Most High, signified by the visible and distinguishing sign of circumcision, and followed by new and enlarged revelations of truth. Two purposes were to be answered by this,—the preservation of the true doctrine of salvation in the world, which is the great and solemn duty of every branch of the church of God,—and the manifestation of that truth to others. Both were done by Abraham. Wherever he sojourned he built his altars to the true God, and publicly celebrated his worship; and, as we learn from St. Paul, he lived in tents in preference to settling in the land of Canaan, though it had been given to him for a possession, in order that he might thus proclaim his faith in the eternal inheritance, of which Canaan was a type; and in bearing this testimony, his example was followed by Isaac and Jacob, the "heirs with him of the same promise," who also thus "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims," and that "they looked" for a continuing and eternal city in heaven. So, also, now is the same doctrine of immortality committed to the church of Christ; and by deadness to the world ought its members to declare their own faith in it.

12. The numerous natural posterity promised to Abraham, was also a type of the spiritual seed, the true members of the church of Christ, springing from the Messiah, of whom Isaac was the symbol. Thus St. Paul expressly distinguishes between the fleshly and the spiritual seed of Abraham; to the latter of which, in their ultimate and highest sense, the promises of increase as the stars of heaven, and the sands of the seashore, are to be referred, as also the promise of the heavenly Canaan.

13. The intentional offering up Isaac, with its result, was probably that transaction in which Abraham, more clearly than in any other,—"saw the day of Christ, and was glad." He received Isaac from the dead, says St. Paul, "in a figure." This could be a figure of nothing but a resurrection of our Lord; and, if so, Isaac's being laid upon the altar was a figure of his sacrificial death, scenically and most impressively represented to Abraham. The place, the same ridge of hills on which our Lord was crucified; the person, an only son, who dies for no offence of his own; the sacrificer, a father; the receiving back, as it were, from death to life; the name impressed upon the place, importing, the Lord will provide, in addition to Abraham's own words to Isaac, "The Lord will provide a lamb for a burnt-offering;" all indicate a mystery, or at least supply an illustration of that which Abraham, as the reward of his obedience, was permitted to behold. "The day" of Christ's humiliation and exaltation was thus opened to him; and served to keep the great truth in mind, that the true burnt-offering and sacrifice for sin was to be something higher than the immolation of lambs and bulls and goats,—any, something more than what was merely human.

14. The transaction of the expulsion of Hagar was also a type. It was an allegory in action, by which St. Paul teaches us to understand that the son of the bondwoman represented those who are under the law; and the child of the freewoman those who by faith in Christ are supernaturally begotten into the family of God. The bondwoman and her son being cast out, represented also the expulsion of the unbelieving Jews from the Church of God, which was to be composed of true believers of all nations, all of whom, whether Jews or Gentiles, were to become "fellow-heirs."

15. Abraham is also exhibited to us as the representative of true believers; and in this especially, that the true nature of faith was exhibited in him. This great principle was marked in Abraham with the following characters:—An entire, unhesitating belief in the word of God;—an unflinching trust in all his promises;—a steady regard to his almighty power, leading him to overlook all apparent difficulties and impossibilities in every case where God had explicitly promised; and habitual and cheerful and entire obedience. The apostle has also described faith in Heb. 11: 1; and that faith is seen living and acting in all its energy in Abraham.

A few miscellaneous remarks are suggested by some of the circumstances of Abraham's history:—

1. The ancient method of ratifying a covenant by sacrifice is illustrated in the account given in Gen. 15: 9, 10. The beasts were slain and divided in the midst, and the persons covenanting passed between the parts. Hence, after Abraham had performed this part of the ceremony, the symbol of the Almighty's presence, "a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp, passed between the pieces," verse 18, and so both parties ratified the covenant.

2. As the beauty of Sarah, which she retained so long as quite to conceal her real age from observers, attracted so much notice as to lead to her forcible seizure, once by Pharaoh, in Egypt, and again by Abimelech, in Palestine, it may appear strange that, as in the east, women are generally kept in seclusion, and seldom appear without veils, she exposed herself to observation. But to this day the Arab women do not wear veils at home in their tents; and Sarah's countenance might have been seen in the tent by some of the officers of Pharaoh and Abimelech, who reported her beauty to their masters.

3. The intentional offering up of Isaac, is not to be supposed as viewed by Abraham an act sanctioning the pagan practice of human sacrifice. The immolation of human victims, particularly of that which was most precious, the favorite, the first-born child, appears to have been a common usage among many early nations, more especially the tribes by which Abraham was surrounded. It was the distinguishing rite among the worshippers of Moloch; it was in unison with the character of the religion, and of its deity. It was the last act of a dark and sanguinary superstition, which rose by regular gradation to this complete triumph over human nature. The god, who was propitiated by these offerings, had been satiated with more cheap and vulgar victims; he had been glutted to the full with human suffering and human blood. In general, it was the first work of the subjugation of the rational mind to an inhuman and domineering priesthood. But the Mosaic religion held human sacrifices in abhorrence; and the God of the Abrahamic family, uniformly beneficent, had imposed no duties which entailed human suffering, had demanded no offerings which were repugnant to the better feelings of our nature. The command to offer Isaac as "a burnt-offering," was, for these reasons, a trial the more severe to Abraham's faith. He must therefore have been fully assured of the divine command; and he left the mystery to be explained by God himself. His was a simple act of unhesitating obedience to the command of God; the last proof of perfect reliance on the certain accomplishment of the divine promises. Isaac, so miraculously bestowed, could be as miraculously restored; Abraham, such is the comment of the Christian apostle, "believed that God could even raise him up from the dead."

4. The wide and deep impression made by the character of Abraham upon the ancient world, is proved by the reverence which people of almost all nations and countries have paid to him, and the manner in which the events of his life have been interwoven in their mythology, and their religious traditions. Jews, Magians, Sabians, Indians, and Mahometans, have claimed him as the patriarch and founder of their sects; and his history has been embellished with a variety of fictitious. One of the most pleasing of them is the following, but it proceeds upon the supposition that he was educated in idolatry: "As Abraham was walking by night from the grotto where he was born, to the city of Babylon, he gazed on the stars of heaven, and among them, on the beautiful planet Venus, 'Behold,' said he within himself, 'the God and Lord of the universe,' but the star set and disappeared, and Abraham felt that the Lord of the universe could not thus be liable to change. Shortly after, he beheld the moon at the full: 'Lo,' he cried, 'the Divine Creator, the manifest Deity,' but the moon sank below the horizon, and Abraham made the same reflection as at the setting of the evening star. All the rest of the night he passed in profound rumination; at sunrise he stood before the gates of Babylon, and saw the whole people prostrate in adoration. 'Wondrous orb,' he exclaimed, 'thou surely art the Creator and Ruler of all nature; but thou, too, settest like the rest to thy setting! neither then art thou my Creator, my Lord, or my God.'" — Calmet; Jones; Watson.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; a figurative mode of describing the happiness of heaven. Luke 16: 22. The allusion is to a magnificent feast, at which the redeemed out of every nation, are represented as sitting down in the kingdom of God. Matt. 8: 11. Luke 13: 29. To be, or lie on one's bosom, refers to the oriental mode of reclining at table. In this manner, John, as the disciple whom Jesus loved, is said to have leaned on his bosom. John 13: 23.

ABRAHAMITES; an order of monks exterminated for idolatry by Theophilus, in the ninth century. Also the name of another sect of heretics, who had adopted the errors of Paulus. See PAULICIANS.

ABSALOM; the son of David by Maccab, daughter of the king of Geshur; distinguished for his fine person, his vices, and his unnatural rebellion. Of his open revolt; his conduct in Jerusalem; his pursuit of the king his father; his defeat and death; see 2 Sam. 16—18. at large.

ABSALOM'S PILLAR. Absalom, like many other vain mortals, was ambitious of posthumous fame. At an early period of life, he caused a pillar to be erected in the king's valley for the purpose of perpetuating his name; "for" said he, "I have no son, and this shall be my monument." 2 Sam. 18: 18. It seems he either lived to have three sons and a daughter, 2 Sam. 14: 27. after that time, or they were all dead when he erected the pillar, which is not very probable. True glory has been said to consist "in doing what deserves to be written, or in writing what deserves to be read." Absalom's reputation has indeed survived him; and it will continue while time shall last; but if estimated by that standard, it would be difficult to fix upon any recorded action of his life that would stand the test.

ABSOLUTION signifies acquittal. It is taken also from that act whereby the priest declares the sins of such as are penitent remitted. The Romanists hold absolution a part of the sacrament of penance, and the council of Trent, and that of Florence, declare the form or essence of the sacrament to lie in the words of absolution. "I absolve thee of thy sins." According to this, no one can receive absolutions without the privacy, consent, and declaration of the priest; except, therefore, the priest be willing, God himself cannot pardon any man. This is a doctrine as blasphemous as it is ridiculous. The chief passage on which they ground their power of absolution is that in John 20: 23: "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." But this is not to the purpose; since this was a special commission to the apostles themselves, and the first preachers of the Gospel, and most probably referred to the power he gave them of discerning spirits. By virtue of this power, Peter struck Ananias and Sapphira dead, and Paul struck Elymas blind. But, supposing the passage in question to apply to the successors of the apostles, and to ministers in general, it can only import that their office is to preach pardon to the penitent, assuring those who believe that their sins are forgiven through the merits of Jesus Christ; and that those who remain in unbelief are in a state of condemnation. Any idea of authority given to fallible, uninspired men to absolve sinners, different from this, is unscriptural; nor can I see much utility in the terms, ministerial, or declarative absolution, as adopted by some divines, since absolution is wholly the prerogative of God; and the terms above-mentioned may, to say the least, have no good influence on the minds of the ignorant and superstitious.—Buck.

ABSTEMII; a name given to such persons as could not partake of the cup of the eucharist, on account of their natural aversion to wine.

ABSTINENCE; in a general sense, is the act of refraining from something to which we are accustomed, or in which we find pleasure. It is more particularly used for fasting or forbearing of customary food. Among the Jews, various kinds of abstinence were ordained by their law. Among the primitive Christians, some denied themselves the use of such meats as were prohibited by that law; others looked upon this abstinence with contempt: as to which Paul gives his opinion, Rom. 14: 1, 3. The council of Jerusalem, which was held by the apostles, enjoined the Christian converts to abstain from meats strangled, from blood, from fornication, and from idolatry, Acts 15. Upon this passage, Dr. Doddridge observes, "that though neither things sacrificed to idols, nor the flesh of strangled animals, have, or can have, any moral evil in them, which should make the eating of them absolutely and universally unlawful; yet they were forbidden to the Gentile converts, because the Jews had such an aversion to them, that they could not converse freely with any who used them. This is plainly the reason which James assigns in the very next words, the twenty-first verse, and it is abundantly sufficient. This reason is now ceased, and the obligation to abstain from eating these things ceases with it. But were we in like circumstances again, Christian charity would surely require us to lay ourselves under the same restraint."

The spiritual monarchy of the western world introduced another sort of abstinence, which may be called ritual, and consists in abstaining from particular meats at certain times and seasons, the rules of which are called rogations. If I mistake not, the impropriety of this kind of abstinence is clearly pointed out in 1 Tim. 4: 3.—In England, abstinence from flesh has been enjoined by statute, even since the reformation; particularly on Fridays and Saturdays, on vigils, and on all days commonly called fish days. The like injunctions were renewed under queen Elizabeth; but at the same time it was declared, that this was done, not out of motives of religion, as if there were any difference in meats, but in favor of the consumption of fish, and to multiply the number of fishermen and mariners, as well as to spare the stock of sheep.

A more important abstinence, is that referred to by the apostle, Thess. 5: 22. "Abstain from all appearance of evil." How much more then, from every thing which is proved to be really evil; as some things are, in which, alas, many indulge! See FASTING; ANIMALS; BLOOD.

ABSTINENTS, or ABSTINES; a set of heretics that appeared in France and Spain, about the end of the third century. They are supposed to have borrowed part of their opinions from the Gnostics and Manichæans, because they opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Ghost in the class of created beings.—Buck.

ABUMA; the same as Rumah, 2 Kings 23: 36.

ABUNDANCE; an overflowing fullness. See ABOUND.* Those who receive the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness, Rom. 5: 17. are such as in cordial faith and love, accept the Gospel of Christ, and receive free justification thereby; not excluding, however, the fact, that faith and love are themselves, wherever they are found, "the fruits of the Spirit," and therefore "the gift of God." Gal. 5: 22. Ephes. 2: 8.

ABUSE; to use things or persons from wrong motives to wrong ends, in a sinful or dishonorable manner. Judg. 19: 25. Children abuse their parents, when by disobedience of any kind, or, by neglecting to support or comfort them, they shorten or embitter their existence. Such as do these things are called murderers of fathers, and murderers of mothers. 1 Tim. 1: 9. Men abuse the world when they use the good things of it to dishonor God, and gratify their own lusts, forgetful of eternity. 1 Cor. 7: 31.

ABYSS, or DEEP, without bottom. The chaos; the deepest parts of the sea; and, in the New Testament, the regions of the dead, Rom. 10: 7. also the place of punishment. The devils besought Jesus that he would not send them into the abyss, a place they evidently dreaded. Luke 8: 31. where it seems to mean that part of Hades in which wicked spirits are in torment. See HELL.

In the conception of the ancient Hebrews, and of the generality of eastern people at this day, the abyss, the sea, or waters, encompassed the whole earth. This was supposed to float upon the abyss, of which it covered a small part. According to the same notion, the earth was founded on the waters, or at least, its foundations were on the abyss beneath. Ps. 24: 2. 136: 6. Under these waters, and at the bottom of this abyss, they represented the wicked as groaning, and suffering the punishment of their sins. The Rephaim were confined there, those old giants, who, whilst living, caused surrounding nations to tremble, Prov. 9: 18. 21: 16, &c. Lastly, in these dark dungeons, the kings of Tyre, Babylon, and Egypt, are described by the prophets as suffering the punishment of their pride and cruelty. Jer. 26: 14. Ezek. 28: 10, &c.

The Abyss is represented in the book of Revelation, as the abode of evil spirits, and powers opposed to God: "I saw," says St. John, "a star fall from heaven unto the earth, and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of it, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. And there came out of the smoke, locusts upon the earth. And they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit," Rev. 9: 1—11. See ABANDON. In another place, the beast is represented as ascending out of the bottomless pit, and waging war against the two witnesses of God, Rev. 11: 7. Lastly, St. John says, "I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; and after that he must be loosed a little season." Rev. 20: 1—3. The original word is abyss.

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH. Very little is known of the present state of Christianity among the oriental nations, and for this little we are chiefly indebted to various travellers, who were far from making it an immediate object of research: of course our information on this subject must be attended with some degree of uncertainty. The seven churches of Asia, existing in the primitive times, appear to have vanished from the page of history, without leaving scarcely a vestige behind; and nothing remains in their place but the various mutilated forms of Christianity. See SEVEN CHURCHES.

Abyssinia, or Ethiopia Superior, is an ancient kingdom of Africa, whose inhabitants are supposed to have received the Gospel from the Ethiopian eunuch, or prime minister of their queen Candace, though their general conversion was not effected before the middle of the fourth century. Their emperor, who is nominally a Christian, exercises a kind of supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, and confers all benefices, except that of their chief prelate.

The Abyssinians boast themselves to be of Jewish extraction, and assume to imitate the service of the tabernacle and temple of Jerusalem; so that their doctrines and ritual form a strange compound of Judaism, Christianity, and superstition. They practise circumcision, and are said to extend the ceremony to females as well as males. They observe both the first and the seventh day as a Sabbath, and eat no meats prohibited by the law of Moses. They take off their shoes, before they enter their churches, and sit on the bare floor. Their worship is said wholly to consist in reading the Scriptures, administering the eucharist, and hearing some homilies of the fathers. They read the whole of the four Gospels every year in their churches, beginning with Matthew, and proceeding to the rest in their order. And when they speak of any event, they say, "It happened in the days of Matthew;" that is, while they were reading Matthew's Gospel in their churches. They observe four fasts in a year with much severity; and on their grand festivals they begin their music and dancing before daylight, in imitation of David, who danced before the ark. They pray for the dead, have a great veneration for the Virgin Mary, invoke saints and angels, and have at least as many miracles and legends of saints as the church of Rome.

The supreme ruler of the Abyssinian church is a bishop, who receives his appointment from the patriarch of Alexandria; but the inferior clergy are appointed by the emperor. The primate has an order of men under him, whom they style Kyinos. Every parochial church has one of these, who is a kind of arch-priest, and has all the inferior priests and deacons, as well as the secular affairs of the parish, under his care and government. The office of the inferior priests is to supply that of the kyinos in their absence, and to assist them in the public service. They have another order of ecclesiastics, called Debtaris, who are a kind of Jewish Levites or chanters, and assist at the public offices of the church. All these orders are allowed to marry, even after they have been ordained priests; and, which is more singular, even some of their religious orders or monks, who are numerous, are allowed the same privilege; but those who observe celibacy, are commonly in greater esteem.

The distinguishing doctrine of the Abyssinian church, relates to the person of Christ. They maintain that the divine and human nature are united in him, without either confusion or mixture; yet though the nature of Christ is really one, it is at the same time twofold and compound. They disown the pope's supremacy, and transubstantiation, though they believe the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. They believe in a middle state, in which departed souls must be purged from their sins; use confession, and receive penance and absolution from the priests.

Various attempts have been made to bring this church under the papal yoke, but without success. The Portuguese having opened a passage into Abyssinia in the fifteenth century, an emissary was sent to extend the influence and authority of the Roman pontiff, clothed with the title of Patriarch of the Abyssinians. The same important commission was afterwards given to several Jesuits, when some circumstances seemed to promise them a successful and happy ministry; but the Abyssinians stood so firm to the faith of their ancestors, that towards the end of the sixteenth century the Jesuits had lost nearly all hope in that quarter.

About the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Portuguese Jesuits renewed the mission to Abyssinia, when the emperor created one of them patriarch; and not only swore allegiance to the Roman pontiff, but also obliged his subjects to forsake the rites and tenets of their ancestors, and to embrace the doctrine and worship of the Romish church. At length the emperor became so exasperated at the arrogant and violent proceedings of the patriarch, in subverting the established customs of the empire for the purpose of confirming the pope's authority, especially in imposing celibacy on some and requiring divorce of others who had married more than one wife, that he annulled the orders formerly given in favor of popery, banished the missionaries from his dominions, and treated with the utmost severity all who had any connection with the undertaking. From this period the very name of Rome, its religion, and its pontiff, have all along been objects of peculiar aversion among the Abyssinians; and so lately as about the middle of the last century, the edict prohibiting all Europeans to enter into Ethiopia was still in force, and executed with the greatest rigor. The present state of the church of Abyssinia, however, is such, that little besides the name of Christianity is to be found among them. Their religion is a motley collection of traditions, tenets, and ceremonies, derived partly from Judaism and partly from Christianity in its most corrupted form. In their ritual of worship the former seems to predominate; but, like the Catholics, they have festivals and saints innumerable. One day is dedicated to Baalam's ass; another to Pontius Pilate and his wife,—to Pilate, because he washed his hands before he pronounced sentence on Christ;—to his lady, because she warned him to have nothing to do with the blood of that just person. In legends and miracles, too, they are scarcely inferior to the church of Rome. And, upon the whole, it may truly be affirmed, that the religion of the Abyssinians is a monstrous compound of superstitions, unworthily dignified with the name of Christianity.—Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History; Bruce's Travels to discover the Source of the Nile; Jones's Dictionary of Religious Opinions.

ACACIANS; a sect of heretics in the fourth century; so named from Acacius, bishop of Caesarea, who denied the Son to be of the same substance with the Father, though some of them allowed that he was of a similar substance. Also, the name of another sect, named after Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, in the fifth century, who favored the opinions of Eutychus. See EUTYCHIANS.

ACADEMICS; a name given to such philosophers as adopted the doctrines of Plato. They were called so from the Academia, a grove near Athens, where they frequently indulged their contemplations. Academia is said to derive its name from one Academus, a god or hero, so called. Thus Horace,—Atque inter sylvas Academæ querere verum.

The Academies are divided into those of the first academy, who taught the doctrines of Plato in their original purity; those of the second or middle academy, who differed materially from the first, and inclined to scepticism; and those of the new academy. The middle school laid it down as a principle, that neither our senses, nor our reason, are to be trusted; but that in common affairs we are to conform to received opinions. The new academy maintained, that we have no means of distinguishing truth, and that the most evident appearances may lead us into error; they granted the wise man opinion, but denied him certainty. They held, however, that it was best to follow the greatest probability, which was sufficient for all the useful purposes of life, and laid down rules for the attainment of felicity. The difference between the middle academy and the new seems to have been this; that though they agreed in the imbecility of human nature, yet the first denied that probabilities were of any use in the pursuit of happiness; and the latter held them to be of use in such a design; the former recommended a conformity with received opinions, and the latter allowed men an opinion of their own. In the first academy Sprusippus filled the chair; in the second, Arcefilaus; and in the new or third academy, Caneades.

Among the Academics, the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, the preferableness of virtue to vice, were all held as uncertain. This sect, and that of the Epicureans, were the chief that were in vogue at the time of Christ's appearance, and were embraced and supported by persons of high rank and wealth. A consideration of the principles of these two sects, (see EPICUREANS.) will lead us to form an idea of the deplorable state of the world at the time of Christ's birth; and the necessity there was of some divine teacher to convey to the mind true and certain principles of religion and wisdom. Jesus Christ, therefore, is with great propriety called the Day Spring from on High, the Sun of Righteousness, that arose upon a benighted world to dispel the clouds of ignorance and error, and discover to lost man the path of happiness and heaven. But as we do not mean to enlarge much upon these and some other sects, which belong rather to philosophy than theology, we shall refer the reader to Buddaeus' Introduction to the History of Philosophy; Stanley's Lives; Brucker's History of Philosophy, or (which is more modern) Enfield's Abridgment; Buck's Theological Dictionary; Watson's do.

ACCAD; one of the four cities built by Nimrod, the founder of the Assyrian empire. Gen. 10: 10. It was contemporary with Babylon, and was one of the first four great cities of the world. Jerome and others say it is the same as Nisibis, and the Targums read Nisibin. It is not mentioned under its ancient name by any profane author. But modern travellers inform us, that about six miles from Bagdad is a gigantic pile of ruins, called, by the Arabs and Turks, the Hill of Nimrod; in which the materials and style of building are so perfectly similar to those of ancient Babylon, as to make it certain that here was the site of one of the four cities built by Nimrod. It was not Babylon; it was not Erech; it was not Calneh. The unavoidable inference, is, that it was Accad; an inference strengthened by the name of the place Akarkouff, especially when it is recollected that the Syrian name for Accad was Achar.—Calmet; Watson.

ACCEPT, ACCEPTABLE, ACCEPTED. To accept is not only to receive, but to receive with pleasure and kindness. Gen. 32: 20. It stands opposed to reject, which is a direct mode of refusal, and implies a positive sentiment of disapprobation. Jer. 6: 30. 7: 29. To receive, says Crabbe, is an act of right, we receive what is our own; to accept, is an act of courtesy, we accept what is offered by another. Hence, "an acceptable time," or "accepted time," Ps. 69: 13. 2 Cor. 6: 2. signifies, the molliora tempora fandi, a favorable opportunity, a time when acceptance is granted, and favors are bestowed.

Luke 4: 24. "No prophet is accepted in his own country." That is, his countrymen do not value and honor him as they ought; as we say, "familiarity breeds contempt."

Luke 22: 21. "Neither acceptest thou the person of any." The word person, here, and in similar connections, signifies the outward appearance, in distinction from inward character. See RESPECTER OF PERSONS.

ACCEPTANCE WITH GOD; a point of Christian doctrine, which is of such great importance, that indeed it may be said to lie at the foundation of all revealed religion; and probably, if the subject were fully investigated, it would be found that most of the erroneous systems which prevail in the religious world, originate in mistaken views respecting the Scripture doctrine of a sinner's acceptance with God. The term "accept" in its original import, implies to receive favorably, and indicates that divine regard which stands opposed to "hiding of the face, or the divine frown," but to have a proper view of the subject, we must keep in mind the Scripture doctrine of the fall of man; his natural alienation from God; the consequent loss of the divine favor through sin; and the revealed medium of his restoration. See ADAM; FALL OF MAN; ORIGINAL SIN.

This general view of things is always supposed, in whatever the Scriptures teach regarding man's acceptance with God. The mediation of the Son of God is founded upon it; and the Gospel of divine grace has no meaning but in reference to it. Had there been no revelation of mercy to sinners, no call to repentance, or to return to God, no proclamation of pardon to guilty rebels, there is too much reason to believe that all the posterity of fallen Adam would have proceeded, like the angels that fell, in one undeviating course of rebellion against God, without manifesting a wish to be reconciled to their offended Sovereign, or seeking to be restored to his favor. But, "there is forgiveness with Him, that He may be feared," Ps. 130: 4. The great proof of this delightful truth, is the mission of his Son into the world, John 3: 16, with the declared ends of his incarnation and death. 1 John 3: 5—8. ch. 4: 9—14. the good pleasure of God in his work, manifested by raising him from the dead, 1 Pet. 3: 19—21. and the numerous calls and invitations of the Gospel, wherever it comes, to men of all ranks and degrees, to sinners of all descriptions, to every one that hears it; to forsake their evil ways and return unto God, who will have mercy upon and abundantly pardon them. Isa. 55: 1—9. But though the Gospel be glad tidings of great joy to all who hear it; though it gives the fullest revelation of the divine character, and displays all the perfections of Deity, as gloriously harmonizing in the economy of redemption; though it presents the most powerful inducements for sinners to return to God, by promising the full remission of sins, and eternal life to every one who believes the testimony of God concerning his Son; it must ever be carefully kept in view, that Jesus Christ alone, is "the way, the truth, and the life;" and that no man cometh unto God but by Him, John 14: 6. He is the "beloved Son of God, in whom the Father is well pleased," Matt. 3: 17. ch. 17: 5. In him, "the beloved," sinners are accepted, Eph. 1: 6. they have redemption in his blood, verse 7. their sins are forgiven them only for his name's sake, 1 John 2: 12. The sacrifice he offered when he gave himself for them, is to God a sweet smelling savor, Eph. 5: 2. And "he is made of God unto us, wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption, that, according as it is written, he that glorifieth, let him glory in the Lord." 1 Cor. 1: 30, 31. The virtue of this perfect sacrifice of the Son of God, by which alone sin is put away, extended back to the first age of the world; and will continue its efficacy until all the elect of God are called into his kingdom, Rom. 3: 25. Heb. 9: 15. The promise of this sacrifice, which was made to our first parents immediately after the fall, was the great thing that encouraged them to return to God and hope in his mercy, Gen. 3: 15. Sacrifices were instituted to prefigure it; but it was only with such as were offered in the faith of this great atonement effected by the High Priest of our profession, that Jehovah had any delight, or that he deigned to accept; and Abel, Noah, Abraham, and the rest of the Old Testament saints, obtained acceptance before God only through faith in the divine promise, that, in the fulness of time, God would raise up unto Israel a Savior, Heb. 11. And now that the promise is fulfilled, and the work of human redemption fully accomplished, sinners can only find acceptance with God, for their persons, their prayers, and their imperfect services, through faith in the all perfect sacrifice of the Son of God, for in that alone the Father is well pleased. See JUSTIFICATION.

It is no objection to the statement now given of the doctrine of acceptance with God, that the apostle Peter hath said, "In every nation, he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him," Acts 10: 35. because it is never supposed in the Scriptures, that any truly fear God and work righteousness, who are not regenerated by the Holy Spirit, 1 John 2: 29. and influenced thereunto by hope in the divine mercy; which hope can only arise from faith in the divine testimony, or promise. Such indeed is the explanation that Peter himself gives of the subject, verse 36—43. Accordingly, it is written, "The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy." Ps. 147: 11. The subject is beautifully illustrated by Christ himself, in the Parable of the Prodigal Son, who left his father's house, took his journey into a far country, and there, having wasted his patrimony in riotous living, was at last ready to perish with hunger, Luke 15: 11. He indeed returned to his father's house, and met with the most welcome reception; but then the motive or spring of his conduct was a persuasion of the abundant stores that were there to be found, answerable to all his exigencies; and that even the hired servants of his father had bread enough and to spare, while he was perishing with hunger. We have also another striking illustration of the subject, in the Parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. The pharisees, who despised the Gospel, trusted in themselves that they were righteous; and in all their approaches to God, had respect to the excellency of their characters over other men; vainly presuming, that what entitled them to distinction among their fellow-creatures, would also avail them in the divine presence. But Christ showed them that, in this instance, they were greatly deceiving themselves. "Ye are they that justify yourselves before men," said the Savior, "but God knoweth your hearts; for that which is highly esteemed among men, is an abomination in the sight of God." Luke 16: 15. And in the parable just mentioned, while the pharisee, confidently advancing with his prayers to the divine throne, would thank God that he was not as other men, who were extortioners, unjust, or adulterers; that he was not like the publican; that he even fasted twice in a week, and gave tithes of all he possessed: the publican, guilty and self condemned, stood afar off, scarcely daring to hit up his eyes towards heaven, but, smiting upon his breast, implored the divine clemency, saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner," Luke 18: 9, 14. The persuasion that there is mercy with God, through the propitiatory sacrifice of his beloved Son, encouraged him to draw nigh, and, praying in faith, he was heard and accepted; for he went down to his house justified, while the pharisee was rejected.—Jones's Biblical Cyclopedia.

We mistake the terms of acceptance with God, when we trust in, 1. The superiority of our virtues to our vices, Rom. 3: 20. James 2: 10. 2. A faith in Christ which does not produce good works, James 2: 14. 3. The atonement, without personal repentance from sin, Luke 13: 5. 4. The hope of future repentance, or conversion on a dying bed, Prov. 1: 24—31.

ACCESS; the privilege of approaching a superior, with freedom. It is distinguished from admittance, thus: "we have admittance where we enter; we have access to him whom we address. There can be no access where there is no admittance; but there may be admittance without access. Servants or officers may grant us admittance into the palaces of princes; the favorites of princes only have access to their persons."—Crabbe's Synonymes.

In Scripture this important word occurs but three times, and always in connection with our reconciliation to God through Christ. In Romans 5: 2. where it first occurs, it signifies our introduction into a state of settled friendship with God; a state in which we are permitted to enjoy the freest intercourse and communion with him, and can rejoice in hope of his eternal glory, through his Son as our Mediator. "In whom," says the apostle, in that exquisite passage, Eph. 3: 12. "WE HAVE BOLDNESS, AND ACCESS WITH CONFIDENCE, BY THE FAITH OF HIM."

Under the law, the High Priest alone had access to the divine presence within the mysterious veil of the Holy of Holies; but when at the death of Christ the veil of the temple was rent in twain, it was declared that a new and living way of access was laid open to every true worshipper. By his death, also, the middle wall of partition was broken down, and God became equally accessible to Gentile and to Jew; whereas before, the Gentiles had no nearer access in the temple worship than to the gate of the court of Israel. Thus the grace and privileges of the Gospel are alike bestowed on true believers of all nations.

The apostle Paul, in one short but comprehensive verse, not only explains this most fully; but at the same time shows how, in the economy of redemption, each glorious person of the GODHEAD executes a harmonious part in this most sweet and gracious transaction, Eph. 2: 18. FOR THROUGH HIM, (the Son of God) WE (Jewish and Gentile believers) BOTH HAVE ACCESS, BY ONE SPIRIT, UNTO THE FATHER. Here we see, in the clearest manner, how fundamental to the Christian faith, is the view which it reveals to us of the sacred Trinity; since it is only by the conduct of the Holy Spirit, through the mediation of the Son, that we are enabled to approach the Father, seated on the throne of grace. And it beelieves us further to remark the blessedness of this access to God. For we are not simply introduced by Christ, but beheld and accepted also in Christ. He is our peace: the author both of our access and acceptance: for to the praise of the glory of his grace, God hath made us "ACCEPTED IN THE BELOVED." Eph. 1: 6. 1 Pct. 3: 18. And those words of our Lord cannot be too well remembered, John 14: 6. "I am the way, the truth, and the life; NO MAN COMETH UNTO THE FATHER BUT BY ME."—Watson; Hawker; Watts's Sermons.

ACCHO, a seaport of Palestine; (Josh. 19: 25. Judg. 1: 31.) called afterwards Ptolemais, (Acts 21: 7.) from the first of the Ptolemies, who enlarged and beautified it. Its site enjoys, says Dr. Wells, all possible advantage by sea and land. It is situated on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, thirty miles south of Tyre, on the north angle of a bay to which it gives its name, and which extends in a semicircle of three leagues, as far as the point of mount Carmel. The town was originally surrounded by triple walls, and a fosse, or ditch cut of the rock, from which, at present, it is a mile distant. On the north and east, was a spacious and fertile plain. On the south and west sides it was washed by the sea; and Pococke thinks that the river Belus, which flows from Carmel into the Mediterranean, was brought through the fosse, which ran along the ramparts on the north; thus making the city an island.

In the first partition of the Holy Land under Joshua, Accho belonged to the tribe of Ashur; but it proved to be one of the places out of which the Israelites could not drive the primitive inhabitants. Accho, and all beyond it northwards, was considered as the heathen land of the Jews. When Syria was subjected by the Romans, it was made a colony by the emperor Claudius.

Mr. Taylor has collected several medals of Accho, or Ptolemais. Those bearing its Phœnician name, Ok or Akko, have dates, of the era of Alexander; whence it may be inferred that it received favors from that prince, probably at the time he was detained in Syria by the siege of Tyre. From others it appears, that the city assumes the privilege of asylum and of sanctity, and that it possessed a temple of Diana. Establishments for the purposes of commerce, seem also to have been formed here by merchants from Antioch; not unlike the English factories in Smyrna, and other cities of the east, at the present. There was also a bath of Venus here, of great antiquity.

Such was Ptolemais in the days of the apostles. Christianity was planted here at an early period, and here Saint Paul visited the saints in his way to Jerusalem. Acts 21: 7.

This city, now called Acre, which, from the convenience of its port, is one of the most considerable on the Syrian coast, was during almost two centuries (A. D. 1000, to A. D. 1290,) the principal theatre of the holy wars, and the frequent scene of the perfidies and treacheries of the crusaders. By them it was named Acre, or St. John of Acre, from a magnificent church which was built within its walls, and dedicated to St. John. It was the last fortified place wrested from them by the Turks; who, exasperated by the length of the siege, wreaked a dreadful vengeance in its desolation and ruin.

From this fatal overthrow it has never, under the government of the Turks, been able fully to recover; though since the time of its memorable siege by Buonaparte, in 1799, it has been considerably improved and strengthened, and may now be considered the strongest place in Palestine. Vast ruins of churches, palaces, monasteries, forts, &c., may be seen extending more than half a mile in length; in all which, says Dr. Wells, you may discern such marks of strength, as if every building in the city had been contrived for war and defence.

Mr. Buckingham, who visited Acre in 1816, says, "Of the Canaanitish ruins, it would perhaps be thought idle to seek for remains: yet some presented themselves to my observation, so peculiar in form and materials, and of such antiquity, as to leave no doubt in my own mind, of their being the fragments of buildings constructed in the earliest ages.

"Of the splendor of Ptolemais no perfect monument remains, but throughout the town are seen shafts of red and gray granite, and marble pillars. The Saracenic remains are only to be partially traced in the inner walls of the town; which have themselves been so broken down and repaired as to leave little visible of the original work; and all the mosques, fountains, bazaars, and other public buildings, are in a style rather Turkish than Arabic, excepting only an old, but regular and well built khan, or caravan-sera, which might, perhaps, be attributed to the Saracenic age. The Christian ruins are altogether gone, scarcely leaving a trace of the spot on which they stood.

Acre now contains about ten thousand inhabitants; about three thousand of whom are Turks, and the remainder chiefly Catholics.—Calmet; Wells; Watson.

ACCLAMATIONS, ecclesiastical, were shouts of joy which the people expressed by way of approbation of their preachers. It hardly seems credible to us that practices of this kind should ever have found their way into the church, where all ought to be reverence and solemnity. Yet so it was in the fourth century. The people were not only permitted, but sometimes even exhorted, by the preacher himself, to approve his talents by clapping of hands, and loud acclamations of praise. The usual words they made use of were, "Orthodox," "Third apostle," &c. These acclamations being carried to excess, and often misplaced, were frequently prohibited by the ancient doctors, and at length abrogated. Even as late, however, as the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, we find practices that were not very decorous; such as loud humming, frequent groaning, strange gestures of the body, &c. See articles DANCERS, SHAKERS.—Buck.

ACCOMMODATION. A technical term in theology, used in relation to several different subjects.

1. ACCOMMODATION TO POPULAR PREJUDICES. A theory adopted by certain modern writers, and applied to the interpretation of the New Testament. It supposes (what has never been proved) that our Lord in his teaching connived at many false notions, prevalent among the Jews, and derived by them originally from intercourse with the heathen, without designing to sanction them by his own infallible authority. Among these false notions some reckon the existence and influence of good and evil angels, demoniacal possession, &c., while others include in the same class of popular prejudices, the immortality of the soul, its separate existence in the unseen world, a future state of retribution, &c. It is sufficient to say of this theory, by whomsoever advanced, and by whatsoever show of learning imposed upon the uninformed, 1. That it is unproved. 2. That its application is perfectly unsettled and arbitrary, and therefore it can determine nothing; besides being liable to the worst abuses. 3. That those who adopt it, in the use of it contradict one another. 4. That could it be proved, it would ruin the character of our Lord, as a safe and infallible guide to truth; since, if he taught any thing clearly, he taught clearly the doctrines which are produced as examples of mere accommodation. And 5. That this theory is at total variance with every thing recorded of our Lord's freedom of speech, sincerity, and fidelity. So far was he indeed from accommodating his sentiments to the errors of his age, that he is distinguished not only, as Dr. Paley remarks, by a perfect freedom from popular errors himself, unparalleled by any other teacher of any nation and age; but by the unshrinking and martyr courage with which he perpetually confronts and censures them. Hence, on one occasion, when informed that his exposure of a popular error had given offence to the leading sect among his countrymen, he unfolded the great maxim of his ministry, in these decisive words, "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up." Matt. 15: 13.

2. ACCOMMODATION OF PHRASES. A species of sophism, in which there is an artful employment of Scripture terms and phraseology, in a sense very different from that which they usually have in the Scriptures, or in the minds of men, in order to give sanction and currency to the individual opinions of the writer. It seems to be this practice which St. Paul in 2 Cor. 2: 17. stigmatizes as corrupting or adulterating the Word of God; a practice which violates the fundamental laws of sound interpretation; and by evaporating the vital truths and spirit of the divine oracles, and substituting human theories in its stead, tends directly to subvert and ruin the souls of men. The most pernicious errors have been made in this way to glide into treacherous conjunction with Christianity; retaining their own quality under the sanction of its name, and reducing it to surrender every thing distinctive of it, but that dishonored name. An intimate acquaintance with every part of the sacred volume will, however, generally enable the humble and pure hearted believer to detect the fundamental fallacies which such writers would impose upon the world, for the faith once delivered to the saints. The writings of Dr. Taylor, of Norwich, (England,) especially his "Key to the Apostolic Writings," are shown by Dr. Magee to be full of this subtle species of sophism, by which the learned author perhaps deceived himself, as much as he has his numerous and misguided followers. For a thoroughly learned and masterly exposure of this seductive school, see Magee's Discourses and Dissertations on Atonement and Sacrifice.

3. ACCOMMODATION OF SCRIPTURE, the application of certain passages, not according to their literal meaning, but to something analogous by way of illustration. Preachers who are fond of doing this, in the choice of texts, are religiously bound to state clearly, in the first place, the literal sense of the passage; lest they fall under the condemnation of "handling the word of God deceitfully," and train their hearers to habits of arbitrary and fanciful interpretation.

"We may observe, however," says the profound Foster, "that it seems to the honor of religion, that so many things can be accommodated to its illustration, without any recourse to that perverted ingenuity which fancifully describes or invents resemblances. It is an evident and remarkable fact, that there is a certain principle of correspondence to religion, throughout the economy of the world. Things bearing an apparent analogy to its truths, sometimes more prominently, sometimes more abstrusely, present themselves on all sides, to a thoughtful mind. He that made all things for himself, appears to have willed that they should be a great system of emblems, reflecting or shadowing that system of principles, which is the true theory concerning Him, and our relations to Him. So that religion, standing up in grand parallel to an infinity of things, receives their testimony and homage, and speaks with a voice which is echoed by the creation."

ACCORD; the consent of different parts to one result. The word is borrowed from music, and literally denotes the tuning together of the strings of an instrument, to produce a "concord of sweet sounds." Thus, when all the desires and emotions of the soul harmonize in one purpose, without foreign inducements, a man is said to act of his own accord. 2 Cor. 8: 17. Whatever moves without the application of external or visible force, is hence said to move of its own accord. Acts 12: 10. The Christian church at Jerusalem is said to have been "of one accord," that is, the different members, amidst all the variety of age, sex, endowments, &c., &c., were actuated by the same spirit, and brought into a most perfect and delightful harmony of judgment, views, aims, and affections. Acts 1: 14. 2: 46. 5: 12.

ACCOUNTABILITY; the obligation under which every man lives of giving an account of himself to God, in order to future retribution. Rom. 14: 12. 2 Cor. 5: 10. The wisdom of God in this constitution of things, may be understood by a very little reflection. There manifestly wants some husbanding and equalizing power, to make the faculties of man turn to the most account. Powers are slumbering for want of a call, instruments rusting for want of an occupation, and energies of every kind are lavished upon idle or evil doing, that should be occupied in doing good. A full conviction of accountability to God, firmly seated in the soul, would change the aspect of the world. See RESPONSIBILITY.

ACCUBATION; the posture used at table, by the ancients. The old Romans sat at meat as we do, till the Grecian luxury and softness had corrupted them. The same custom of lying upon couches at their entertainments, prevailed among the Jews, also, in our Savior's time; for having been lately conquered by Pompey, they conformed in this, and many other respects, to the example of their masters. The manner of lying at meat among the Romans, Greeks and more modern Jews, was the same in all respects. The table was placed in the middle of the room, around which stood three couches, covered with cloth or tapestry, according to the quality of the master of the house; upon these they lay, inclining the superior part of their bodies upon their left arms, the lower part being stretched out at full length, or a little bent. Their heads were supported and raised with pillows. The first man lay at the head of the couch; the next man lay with his head toward the feet of the other, from which he was defended by the bolster that supported his own back, commonly reaching over to the middle of the first man, and the rest after the same manner. The most honorable place was the middle couch—and the middle of that. Favorites commonly lay in the bosom of their friends; that is, they were placed next below them: see John 13: 23. where St. John is said to have lain in our Savior's bosom. The ancient Greeks sat at the table; for Homer observes, that when Ulysses arrived at the palace of Alcinoüs, the king dispatched his son Laodama, to seat Ulysses in a magnificent chair. The Egyptians sat at table anciently, as well as the Romans, till towards the end of the Punic war, when they began to recline at table.—Watson's Bibb. and Theo. Dictionary.

ACCURSED; the word in Hebrew is CHEREM, in Greek ANATHEMA, and always denotes, in Scripture, something devoted; but generally, things devoted to destruction. Among the ancient Hebrews, every thing that was idolatrous, was a CHEREM, that is, it was "devoted to destruction." Not only were idols themselves an abomination to the Lord, but whatever had been employed in idolatrous worship, became so detestable to the Divine Majesty, that he would not have it converted to any ordinary or common use; even the silver and gold which had belonged to idols, the Jews were not permitted to bring into their houses, or convert to any private purpose. It was to be regarded as a cursed thing, Deut. 9: 26. which no person might meddle with, ch. 13: 17. if he did, he himself became a cursed thing, that is, he became devoted to destruction. This was exemplified in the case of Achan, who took a wedge of gold, and a Babylonish garment, to his own private use, when it had been made accursed (cherem) by express divine command; on which account he was stoned to death. Compare Jash. 6: 17, 18. with ch.

7: 21—26. The cities of king Arad, the seven nations of Canaan, and the sacrifices of idols, were accursed. Num. 21: 2, 3. Deut. 7: 2, 26. Exod. 22: 19. This sufficiently explains the general acceptation of the term; there is, however, an exception to it, which must be noticed. The Hebrew word cherem, is sometimes used to denote any sacred gift, which was devoted to God or to holy purposes, as in Levit. 27: 28. "No devoted thing that a man shall devote to the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold, or redeemed; every devoted thing (cherem) is most holy unto the Lord." Again, we find that although the city of Jericho was a cherem, (devoted to destruction,) Josh. 6: 17, yet the metals in it were a cherem, that is, sacred to the Lord, and set apart to holy purposes. Let it be remembered, however, that this use of the word is very rare, and forms an exception to its general signification.

It has been considered very difficult to decide in what sense Paul uses this term, in Rom. 9: 3, where he says, according to our version, I could "wish that myself were accursed from Christ." A more exact version of the original will perhaps remove this difficulty. The verb euchomen, rendered "I could wish," is in the indicative, imperfect tense, and is used, Acts 27: 29, where it is properly translated, "and wished for day." The pronoun autos, rendered myself, is in the nominative case, and is not governed by euchomen, as it must be, according to the present translation. The whole grammatical construction, therefore, requires that the passage should be translated, "For I myself did wish a curse from Christ." We must regard him, therefore, as expressing, not the present purpose or wish of his mind, but what it formerly was, while he was a mad and furious persecutor of Christ in his members. Upon this latter principle, the words will run thus: "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart, on account of my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, (for I myself once imprecated a curse from Christ,) that is, I myself was formerly actuated by the same spirit of opposition to Christ, that now actuates them; and therefore I know how to pity their blindness, ignorance, and enmity towards the Savior. Possibly he might refer to that dreadful imprecation of our Lord's murderers, "His blood be upon us and on our children," Matt. 27: 25. It would appear from the above view, that we are to understand the language of the apostle, Gal. 1: 8, 9, as a solemn form of malediction pronounced with apostolical authority, and not merely a sentence of excommunication after the manner of the Jews. "But, though we or an angel from heaven preach any other Gospel than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." And how are our conceptions of the awful criminality of perverting the Gospel heightened by the apostle's repetition of this sentence in the next verse. "As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." See ANATHEMA MARANATHA; CURSE.

ACCUSE; to charge with a crime, Dan. 3: 8, in a formal or solemn manner. The word literally signifies to bring to trial. An accusation is made for the sake of ascertaining the fact, or bringing to punishment. Luke 19: 8. 1 Tim. 5: 19. Men's thoughts accuse them when their conscience charges their sins on them, and fills them with pain, shame, and fear, on account thereof. Rom. 2: 15. Moses accused the Jews in Christ's time; his law pointed out and condemned them for their transgressions, and for their unbelief in the promised Messiah. John 5: 45.

ACCUSER OF THE BRETHREN; a title given to Satan, in Rev. 12: 10, because he without ceasing, in every age, accuses the saints of manifold crimes towards God, mankind, and their own consciences.

ACELDAMA; a piece of ground said to have lain on the south of Jerusalem, just north of the rivulet SILEOAN. It is said to have been the same with the fuller's field, where they whitened their cloth. Isa. 7: 3. It is certain it was the potter's field, whence they digged their materials. Its soil being quite exhausted by them, it was of very small value. When Judas brought back the thirty pieces of silver, which he had gotten for betraying his master, the high priest and rulers pretended that it was not lawful to cast it into the sacred treasury, as it was the price of blood, and purchased with it this field, to bury strangers in; and so it came to be called Aceldama, or Hokeldama, the field of blood. Zech. 11: 12, 13. Matt. 27: 8. Acts 1: 18. Travellers assure us that it is now covered with an arched roof, and will consume a corpse in two or three days. Maundrell, however, says that this grave does not make that quick dispatch with the corpses committed to it, which is commonly reported. The Armenians have the control of the burying-place, and also of a magnificent convent on Mount Zion.

ACEPHALI; such bishops as were exempt from the discipline and jurisdiction of their ordinary bishop or patriarch. It was also the denomination of certain sects; 1. of those who, in the affair of the council of Ephesus, refused to follow either St. Cyril or John of Antioch; 2. of certain heretics in the fifth century, who at first followed Peter Mongus, but afterwards abandoned him, upon his subscribing to the council of Chalcedon, they themselves adhering to the Eutychnian heresy; and, 3. of the followers of Severus of Antioch, and of all, in general, who held out against the council of Chalcedon.—Buck.

ACEPSIAUS; a Christian martyr of some eminence in Persia, who suffered death for refusing to worship the sun, in the beginning of the fourth century, under the reign of the emperor Sapor.—Fox.

ACHAIA; a province of ancient Greece, now called Peloponnesus, of which Corinth was the capital. Paul not only preached the Gospel in the latter city, where he collected a numerous Christian church; but, during the eighteen months that he was stationed there, he made excursions throughout the province, and converted many to the faith of Christ. Comp. Acts 18: 1, 9—11. In writing his second epistle to the Corinthian church, he includes "the saints in all Achaia," among those to whom he addressed it, 2 Cor. 1: 1, and ch. 11: 10. "It is worthy of remark," says Calmet, "that Luke, Acts 18: 12, calls Gallio the deputy, that is, the proconsul, of Achaia, which indeed was the proper title for the chief magistrate there, at the time he wrote; but it had not long been so, nor did it long continue to be the case. The propriety of the application, however, confirms, in no small degree, the authenticity of his narrative." Achaia, taken in a larger sense, comprehended the whole region of Greece, or Hellas, now called Livadia. See GREECE.

ACHAN; the son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, who purloined a costly Babylonian garment, an ingot of gold, and two hundred shekels of silver, from among the spoils of Jericho, against the express injunction of God, who had accursed, devoted to utter destruction, the city and all that it contained, Josh. 6: 17. On being taken by lot, he was condemned to be stoned to death. The whole history is recorded, Josh. 7, and is a perpetual warning against the spirit of covetousness. It would appear that Achan's family were also stoned; for they were led out with him, and all his property, "And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones." Some of the critics have made efforts to confine the stoning to Achan, and the burning to his goods; but not without violence to the text. It is probable, therefore, that his family were privy to the theft, seeing he hid the accursed things which he had stolen, in the earth, in his tent. By concealment, they therefore became partakers of his crime, and so the sentence was justified. A. M. 2553. B. C. 1451.—Calmet; Taylor; Watson; Jones.

ACHMETHA. See ECBATANA.

ACHOR, valley of, between Jericho and Ai, so called from the trouble brought upon the Israelites by the sin of Achan; Achor, in the Hebrew, denoting trouble.

ACHSAH; the daughter of Caleb. Josh. 15.

ACHSHAPH; the same as Achzib, Josh. 12: 20. ch. 19: 25.

ACHISH; king of Gath, the protector of David. 1 Sam. 21: 19.

ACHZIB; a city on the coast of the Mediterranean, in the tribe of Asher, and one of the cities out of which that tribe did not expel the inhabitants, Judg. 1: 31. It was called Eedippa by the Greeks, and is at present termed Zib. It is situated about ten miles north of Acco, in Ptolemais. Mr. Buckingham, who passed by this place saying that it is small, and situated on a hill near the sea; having a few palm trees showing themselves above its dwellings.

ACKNOWLEDGE; to own, or confess. Gen. 38: 26. To observe, take notice of. Isa. 33: 13. To esteem and respect. Isa. 61: 9. 1 Cor. 16: 18. To approve of. 2 Cor. 1: 13. Philm. 6. To recognise, worship, profess, and own as a God. Dan. 11: 39. We acknowledge the Lord in all our ways, when in every matter we request and wait for his direction and assistance; when we observe what direction or encouragement his word and providence afford us in our affairs, temporal or spiritual. Prov. 3: 6. "I call it atheism by establishment," says Burke, "when any state, as such, shall not acknowledge the existence of God, as the moral governor of the world."—Crabbe.

ACQUAINT; to get a familiar knowledge and intimacy. Ps. 139: 3. To acquaint one's self with, or accustom to God, is by repeated endeavors to get spiritual knowledge of, and intimacy with him. Job 22: 20.—Brown.

ACOEMETÆ, or ACOEMETI; an order of monks at Constantinople, in the fifth century, whom the writers of that and the following ages called Akoimetai, that is, Watchers, because they performed divine service day and night without intermission. They divided themselves into three classes, who alternately succeeded one another, so that they kept up a perpetual course of worship. This practice they founded upon that passage—"pray without ceasing," 1 Thess. 5: 17.—Buck.

ACOLYTHI, or ACOΛYTHI; young people who, in the primitive times, aspired to the ministry, and for that purpose continually attended the bishop. In the Romish church, Acolythi were of longer continuance; but their functions were different from those of their first institution. Their business was to light the tapers, carry the candlesticks and the incense pot, and prepare the wine and water. At Rome there were three kinds; 1. those who waited on the pope; 2. those who served in the churches; 3. and others, who, together with the deacons, officiated in other parts of the city.—Buck.

ACRA, a citadel. King Antiochus built a citadel at Jerusalem, north of the temple, on an eminence, which commanded the holy place; and for that reason was called Acra. Josephus says that this eminence was semicircular, and that Simon Maccabeus, having expelled the Syrians, who had seized Acra, demolished it, and spent three years in levelling the mountain on which it stood; that no situation in future should command the temple. On mount Acra were afterwards built the palace of Helena; Agrippa's palace, the place where the public records were lodged; and that where the magistrates of Jerusalem assembled.

ACRABATENE; a district of Judea, extending between Shechem (now Napolose) and Jericho, inclining east. It was about twelve miles in length. The Acrabatene had its name from a place called Alkrabbim, about nine miles from Shechem, eastward. This was also the name of another district of Judea, on the frontier of Idumea, towards the northern extremity of the Dead Sea.

ACRE. The English acre is four thousand eight hundred and forty square yards; the Scotch, six thousand one hundred and fifty and two fifths; the Roman, three thousand two hundred; and the Egyptian aoura, three thousand six hundred and ninety-eight and seven eighths; but the Hebrew tzemed, appears to mean what one plough tilled at one time. Ten acres of vineyard yielding one bath, and the seed of a homer an ephah, import excessive barrenness; that the best ground should scarce produce the tenth part of the seed. Isa. 5: 10.—Brown.

ACROSTIC. See POETRY OF THE HEBREWS.

ACT OF FAITH; (Auto da Fe), in the Romish church, is a solemn day held by the Inquisition for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of the innocent accused.

They usually contrive the Auto to fall on some great festival, that the execution may pass with the more awe; and it is always on a Sunday. The Auto da Fe may be called the last act of the inquisitorial tragedy: it is a kind of jail-delivery, appointed as often as a competent number of prisoners in the inquisition are convicted of heresy, either by their own voluntary or extorted confession, or on the evidence of certain witnesses. The process is this:—In the morning they are brought into a great hall, where they have certain habits put on, which they are to wear in the procession, and by which they know their doom. The procession is led up by Dominican friars, after which come the penitents, being all in black coats without sleeves, and barefooted, with a wax candle in their hands. These are followed by the penitents who have narrowly escaped being burnt, who, over their black coats have flames painted, with their points turned downwards. Next come the negative and relapsed, who are to be burnt, having flames on their habits pointing upwards. After these come such as profess doctrines contrary to the faith of Rome, who, besides flames pointing upwards, have their picture painted on their breasts, with dogs, serpents, and devils, all open-mouthed, about it. Each prisoner is attended with a familiar of the Inquisition; and those to be burnt have also a Jesuit on each hand, who are continual ly preaching to them to abjure. After prisoners, comes a troop of familiars on horseback; and after them the inquisitors, and other officers of the court, on mules: last of all, the inquisitor-general on a white horse, led by two men with black hats and green hatbands. A scaffold is erected big enough for two or three thousand people; and one end of which are the prisoners, at the other the inquisitors. After a sermon, made up of encomiums of the inquisition, and invectives against heretics, a priest ascends a desk near the scaffold, and having taken the abjuration of the penitents, recites the final sentence of those who are to be put to death, and delivers them to the secular arm, earnestly beseeching at the same time the secular power not to touch their blood, or put their lives in danger!!! The prisoners being thus in the hands of the civil magistrate, are presently loaded with chains, and carried first to the secular jail, and from thence, in an hour or two, brought before the civil judge; who, after asking in what religion they intend to die, pronounces sentence on such as declare they die in the communion of the church of Rome, that they shall be first strangled, and then burnt to ashes; or such as die in any other faith, that they be burnt alive. Both are immediately carried to the Ribera, the place of execution, where there are as many stakes set up as there are prisoners to be burnt, with a quantity of dry furze about them. The stakes of the professed, that is, such as persist in the heresy, are about four yards high, having a small board towards the top for the prisoners to be seated on. The negative and relapsed being first strangled and burnt, the professed mount their stakes by a ladder, and the Jesuits, after several repeated exhortations to be reconciled to the church, part with them; telling them that they leave them to the devil, who is standing at their elbow, to receive their souls, and carry them with him to the flames of hell. On this a great shout is raised; and the cry is, "Let the dogs' beads be made!" which is done by thrusting flaming furzes fastened to long poles against their faces, till their faces are burnt to a coal, which is accompanied with the loudest acclamations of joy. At last, fire is set to the furze at the bottom of the stake, over which the professed are chained so high, that the top of the flame seldom reaches higher than the seat they sit on; so that they rather seem roasted than burnt. There cannot be a more lamentable spectacle; the sufferers continually cry out, while they are able, "Pity, for the love of God!" Yet it is beheld, by all sexes and ages, with transports of joy and satisfaction. O merciful God! is this the benign, humane religion thou hast given to men? Surely not. If such were the genius of Christianity, then it would be no honor to be a Christian. Let us, however, rejoice that the time is coming, when the demon of persecution shall be banished out of this our world, and the true spirit of benevolence and candor pervade the universe; when none shall hurt or destroy, but the earth be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea! See INQUISITION.

ACTION FOR THE PULPIT. See DECLAMATION: ELOQUENCE OF THE PULPIT.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. This book in the very beginning, professes itself to be a continuation of the Gospel of St. Luke; and its style bespeaks it to be written by the same person. The external evidence is also very satisfactory; for besides allusions in earlier authors, and particularly in Clement of Rome, Polycarp, and Justin Martyr, the Acts of the Apostles are not only quoted by Irenæus, as written by Luke the evangelist, but there are few things recorded in this book which are not mentioned by that ancient father. This strong testimony in favor of the genuineness of the Acts of the Apostles, is supported by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Jerome, Eusebius, Theodore, and most of the later fathers. It may be added, that the name of St. Luke is prefixed to this book in several ancient Greek manuscripts of the New Testament, and also in the old Syriac version.

2 This is the only inspired work which gives us any historical account of the progress of Christianity after our Savior's ascension. It comprehends a period of about thirty years, but it by no means contains a general history of the church during that time. The principal facts recorded in it are, the choice of Matthias to be an apostle in the room of the traitor Judas; the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of pentecost; the preaching, miracles, and sufferings of the apostles at Jerusalem; the death of Stephen, the first martyr; the persecution and dispersion of the Christians; the preaching of the Gospel in different parts of Palestine, especially in Samaria; the conversion of St. Paul; the call of Cornelius, the first Gentile convert; the persecution of the Christians by Herod Agrippa; the mission of Paul and Barnabas to the Gentiles, by the express command of the Holy Ghost; the decree made at Jerusalem, declaring that circumcision and a conformity to other Jewish rites and ceremonies, were not necessary in Gentile converts; and the latter part of the book is confined to the history of St. Paul, of whom St. Luke was the constant companion for several years.

3. As this account of St. Paul is not continued beyond his two years' imprisonment at Rome, it is probable that this book was written soon after his release, which happened in the year 63; we may therefore consider the Acts of the Apostles as written about the year 64.

4. The place of its publication is more doubtful. The probability appears to be in favor of Greece, though some contend for Alexandria in Egypt. This latter opinion rests upon the subscriptions at the end of some Greek manuscripts, and of the copies of the Syriac version; but the best critics think, that these subscriptions, which are also affixed to other books of the New Testament, deserve but little weight, and in this case they are not supported by any ancient authority.

5. It must have been of the utmost importance in the early times of the Gospel, and certainly not of less importance to every subsequent age, to have an authentic account of the promised descent of the Holy Ghost, and of the success which attended the first preachers of the Gospel, both among the Jews and Gentiles. These great events completed the evidence of the divine mission of Christ, established the truth of the religion which he taught, and pointed out in the clearest manner the comprehensive nature of the redemption which he purchased by his death.

Ecumenius calls the Acts, the "Gospel of the Holy Ghost;" and St. Chrysostom, the "Gospel of our Savior's resurrection," or the Gospel of Jesus Christ risen from the dead. Here, in the lives and preaching of the apostles, we have the most miraculous instances of the power of the Holy Ghost; and in the account of those who were the first believers, we have received the most excellent pattern of the true Christian life.—Watson.

ACTS OF PILATE; a relation sent by Pilate to the emperor Tiberius, concerning Jesus Christ, his death, resurrection, ascension, and the crimes of which he was convicted before him. It was a custom among the Romans, that the proconsuls and governors of provinces should draw up acts or memoirs of what happened in the course of their government, and send them to the emperor and senate. The genuine acts of Pilate were sent by him to Tiberius, who reported them to the senate; but they were rejected by that assembly, because not immediately addressed to them; as it is testified by Tertullian, in his Apol. cap. 5, and 20, 21. The heretics forged acts in imitation of them; but both the genuine and the spurious are now lost.

ADAD RIMNON, or HADAD RIMNON; a city in the valley of Jezreel, where the fatal battle between Josiah, king of Judah, and Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, (2 Kings 23: 29. Zech. 12: 11.) was fought. Adad Rimnon was afterwards called Maximianopolis, in honor of the emperor Maximian. It is seventeen miles from Cæsarea, in Palestine, and ten miles from Jezreel.

ADALBERT; bishop of Prague, a martyr of the tenth century. He was a native of Bohemia. His parents were of high rank and great wealth, but sincere piety. From the early exhibition of talent given by Adalbert, his parents conceived the hope that he might become an ornament to his family, and determined to do all in their power, by giving him the advantages of education. For this purpose they sent him to Magdeburg, to the archbishop of that city, who completed his education, and confirmed him in piety and virtue. At the death of the archbishop, he returned to his own country, and entered himself among the clergy of Prague. The bishop of Prague died soon after, and Adalbert, though very young, had gained such reputation for piety and learning, that he was elected to fill the vacant see. He was inducted into this office, in 983, and received at Prague with all possible demonstrations of joy. He divided the revenue of his see into four parts. The first was employed in the fabric and ornaments of the church; the second, in the maintenance of the clergy; the third, in relieving the poor; and the fourth, in supporting his own family, which was always made to consist of twelve poor persons. He was very faithful in the performance of his duty; but there were some things customary among the people, which gave him great uneasiness, but which he could not remedy; he therefore determined to leave them and spend the remainder of his days in a monastery. In this, however, he was disappointed, for after being absent five years, he was ordered by the pope to return to Prague, but had permission to leave the people if they proved as incorrigible as before. The inhabitants of Prague received him with great joy, and promised reformation; but they soon forgot those promises, and returned to their vices, which obliged him again to leave them. The archbishop of Mentz sent another deputation to Rome, to request of the pope that he might again be ordered back to his diocese. The Bohemians, however, had now begun to look upon him as the cause of their faults, and threatened him with death upon his arrival. They actually murdered several of his friends. Adalbert hearing of these things, thought it prudent, before going there, to find how he should be received; but all the answer he could get was, "that they were sinners, hardened in iniquity; and Adalbert a saint, and consequently not fit to live among them." He now felt himself discharged from all obligation to them, and turned his attention to the conversion of the infidels. For this purpose he went to Dantzic, where he converted and baptized many; but this enraged the pagan priests, who killed him with darts, the 23d of April, 997.—Fox.

ADAM; the name of the first man, the progenitor of the human race. It is derived from Adamah, which, in Hebrew and in all the oriental languages, originally signifies vegetable earth, or mould; and there seems to be an allusion to this derivation, in 1 Cor. 15: 47—49, where, in relation to the two great heads of the human race, the natural and the supernatural, the apostle says, "The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven."

The history of Adam, especially to us his descendants, is full of intense, and, from incidental circumstances, melancholy interest. It is given with great simplicity in the first four chapters of Genesis. In reading them, it is of the utmost importance to remember that we are reading a history, not an allegory,—an outline of events, not an exposition. The veil of time is removed by the spirit of revelation, and the past appears just as it once appeared; but the vision is distant, and therefore dim. We see the surface of the scene, not the interior, the prominent points, not all the particulars. No explanations are offered, though our curiosity is often ready to ask them: facts of the most interesting character, and of deepest import, are stated without the slightest coloring of emotion; and we are left to judge of causes from their effects, of principles from actions, just as we judge of the qualities of a soil from the aspect of its productions. Many subsequent allusions of the inspired writers, however, serve to throw additional light upon the history; and give greater definiteness and certainty to our conclusions, while they operate as a check upon the tendency to be wise above what is written.

In reviewing the concise history of Adam, several things appear worthy of particular remark.

1. The time at which he was created, is strongly expressive of the importance of his character. It has been pertinently remarked concerning the Divine Providence in the creation of the world, (which indeed is true of every human plan, concerted with wisdom and foresight,) that what was first in intention, was last in execution. Man, for whom all other things were made, was himself made last of all. In the Mosaic narrative, the only rational account that was ever given of the origin of things, we are taught to follow the heavenly Artist, step by step, first in the production of the inanimate elements, next of vegetables, and then of animal life, till we come to the masterpiece of the creation, man endowed with reason and intellect. The house being built, its inhabitant appeared, the feast being set forth, the guest was introduced; the theatre being decorated, and lighted up, the spectator was admitted to behold the splendid and magnificent scenery in the heavens above and the earth beneath; to view the bodies around him, moving in perfect order and harmony, and every creature performing the part allotted it in the universal drama; that seeing he might understand, and, understanding, adore its Supreme Author and Director.

2. The manner in which the creation of Adam is narrated, indicates something peculiar and eminent in the being to be formed. Not that it could be a matter of more difficulty to Omnipotence to create man, than any thing besides; but principally, it is probable, because he was to be the lord of the whole, and therefore himself accountable to the original proprietor; and was to be the subject of another species of government, a moral administration; and to be constituted an image of the intellectual and moral perfections, and of the immortality of the common Maker. Every thing, therefore, as to man's creation, is given in a solemn and deliberative form, and contains, also, an intimation of a Trinity of Persons in the Godhead, all equally possessed of creative power, and therefore Divine; to each of whom, man was to stand in relations the most sacred and intimate:—"And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion," &c.

3. It may be next inquired, in what that image of God, in which man was made, consists.

It is manifest from the history of man, that human nature has two essential constituent parts, the NOBILIS, formed out of pre-existent matter, the earth; and a LIVING SOUL, breathed into the body by an INSPIRATION from God. "And the Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils (or face) the breath of life, (ives), and man became a living soul." Whatever was thus imparted to the body of man, already "formed," and perfectly finished in all its parts, was the only cause of life; and the whole tenor of Scripture shows that this was the rational spirit itself, which, by a law of its Creator, was incapable of death, even after the body had fallen under that penalty.

The "image" or likeness of God, in which man was made, has by some been assigned to the body; by others, to the soul. It has, also, been placed in the circumstance of his having "dominion" over the other creatures. As to the body, it is not necessary to prove that in no sense can it bear the image of God; that is, be like God. An upright form has no more likeness to God, than a prone or reptile one; God is incorporeal, and cannot be the archetype of any thing material.

Equally unfounded is the notion that the image of God in man, consisted in the "dominion" which was granted to him over this lower world. Limited dominion may, it is true, be an image of large and absolute dominion; but man is not said to have been made in the image of God's dominion, which is an accident merely, for, before creatures existed, God himself could have no dominion:—he was made in the image and likeness of God himself. Still further, it is evident that man, according to the history, was made in the image of God, in order to his having dominion, as the Hebrew particle imports; and, therefore, his dominion was consequent upon his formation in the "image" and "likeness" of God, and could not be that image itself.

The notion that the original resemblance of man to God must be placed in some one essential quality, is not consistent with holy Writ, from which alone we can derive our information on this subject. We shall, it is true, find that the Bible partly places it in what is essential to human nature; but that it should comprehend nothing else, or consist in one quality only, has no proof or reason; and we are, in fact, taught that it comprises also what is so far from being essential, that it may be both lost and regained. When God is called "the Father of spirits," a likeness is suggested between man and God, in the spirituality of their nature. This is also implied in the striking argument of St. Paul with the Athenians: "Forasmuch as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device;" plainly referring to the idolatrous statues by which God was represented among the heathen. If likeness to God in man consisted in bodily shape, this would not then be an argument against human representations of the Deity; but it imports, as Howe well expresses it, that "we are to understand that our resemblance to him, as we are his offspring, lies in some higher, more noble, and more excellent thing, of which there can be no figure; as who can tell how to give the figure or image of a thought, or of the mind or thinking power?" In spirituality, and consequently immateriality, this image of God in man, then, in the first instance, consists. Nor is it any valid objection to say, that immateriality is not peculiar to the soul of man; that we have reason to believe that the inferior animals are actuated by an immaterial principle. This is as certain as analogy can make it: but though we allow a spiritual principle to animals, its kind is obviously inferior; for that spirit which is incapable of induction and moral knowledge, must be of an inferior order to the spirit which possesses these capabilities; and this is the kind of spirit which is peculiar to man.

The sentiment expressed in Wisdom 2: 23, is an evidence that, in the opinion of the ancient Jews, the image of God in man comprised immortality also. "For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of his own eternity;" and though other creatures were made capable of immortality, and at least the material human frame, whatever we may think of the case of animals, would have escaped death, had not sin entered the world; yet, without admitting the absurdity of the "natural immortality" of the human soul, that surely must have been constituted immortal, in a high and peculiar sense, which has ever retained its prerogative of continued duration, amidst the universal death, not only of animals, but of the bodies of all human beings. There appears, also, a manifest allusion to man's immortality, as being included in the image of God, in the reason which is given in Genesis, for the law which inflicts death on murderers: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man." The essence of the crime of homicide is not confined here, to the putting to death the mere animal part of man; and it must, therefore, lie in the peculiar value of life to an immortal being, accountable in another state for the actions done in this, and whose life ought to be specially guarded for this very reason, that death introduces him into changeless and eternal relations, which were not to be left to the mercy of human passions.

To these we are to add the intellectual powers, and we have what divines, in perfect accordance with the Scriptures, have called, "the NATURAL image of God in his creatures," which is essential and ineffacable. Man was made capable of knowledge, and he was endowed with liberty of will. This natural image of God was the foundation of that MORAL image, by which also man was distinguished. Unless he had been a spiritual, knowing, and willing being, he would have been wholly incapable of moral qualities.

To discover wherein such image and likeness consisted, we can adopt no safer course than to inquire, wherein the Scriptures fix that divine image and likeness, in which man is created anew, through the redemption which came by Christ Jesus. The image restored, was the image lost; and the image lost, was that in which Adam was created. The expressions used by the apostle Paul, clearly point out to us this method of proceeding. Hence we read of "the new man, which after God is created;" and also of man "being renewed after the image of him that created him." Ephes. 4: 24. Col. 3: 10. This application of the term created, refers us to man's first creation, and leads us to form a parallel between that and his renovation, or new creation, by which he, in a measure, re-obtains those excellencies, of which Adam was possessed before the fall. And these are summed up in "knowledge, in righteousness, and in true holiness." The divine image, then, is to be found in the mind, that is, in the understanding, the will, and the affections. In Adam's understanding there was no error; nor was there any obliquity in his will. His knowledge was according to truth, and all the affections of his soul moved in the pursuit and practice of it.

Man, therefore, in his original state, was sinless, both in act and in principle. Hence it is said that "God made man upright." That this signifies moral rectitude, cannot be doubted; but the import of the word is very extensive. It expresses, by an easy figure, the exactness of truth, justice, and obedience. Such, then, was the condition of primitive man; there was no obliquity in his moral principles, his mind, or affections; none in his conduct. He was perfectly sincere and exactly just, rendering from the heart all that was due to God and the creature. Tried by the exactest plummet, he was upright; by the most perfect rule, the law of God, he was faultless.

The soul of the first man was also possessed of spiritual enjoyment. By this is intended, that enjoyment which springs from affections, harmonizing with the conscience, and with each other. In such a soul, every affection is delightful; and all its views, purposes, and pursuits are just, benevolent, and lovely. Love, the controlling affection, however varied may be its exercises, is only a succession of varied pleasure. Its two great constituents are, delight in the objects beloved, and a desire to do them good. The more excellent, dignified, and enduring the objects are, the more noble, pure, and rapturous is the enjoyment which it derives from them. Love to God, therefore, to transcendently the greatest and most excellent of all objects, is capable of becoming in itself, and in its consequences, higher enjoyment than any other. At the same time, every other affection is, in such a mind, perfectly accordant with the commanding one. Other objects are all duly loved, and every exercise of the heart is attended by the delightful sense of rectitude. This is, indeed, the proper life of man. And thus the happiness which dwells in the blessed God, was reflected upon man, and formed a trait of that divine likeness in which he was created.

A modern writer, Mr. H. Ballou, in his "Treatise on Atonement," has advanced a different theory respecting the image of God, in which man was created, and made it the foundation of his scheme of universal salvation. Because Christ is in the New Testament called emphatically "the image of the invisible God," Mr. Ballou contends that this is the meaning of the phrase in the first chapter of Genesis. Hence he derives the conclusion, that all mankind are in Christ, because, according to his theory, Adam was created in Christ. The reader will easily see that this theory is founded on a gross misconception of the language of Moses; and is in absolute opposition to all those passages which speak of men in an unconverted state, as "without Christ," (Ephes. 2: 12. Rom. 16: 7. 8: 9.) and of being "in Christ," as the distinguishing characteristic of real Christians, (Rom. 8: 1. 12: 5. 1 Cor. 15: 18. 2 Cor. 12: 2. 1 Thess. 4: 16.) especially to the decisive declaration of St. Paul, 2 Cor. 5: 17. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." After such a specimen of Mr. Ballou's skill in interpretation as the above, judicious minds will appreciate, at their just value, his claims to guide his fellows to the correct knowledge of the Word of God. But (to use the cutting language of the apostle, 1 Cor. 14: 38.) if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

4. In the complex constitution of Adam, the soul, bearing as it did the divine image, was united to a far inferior element, the body. Yet, even in this, whether we consider its materials, or its organization, we find much which merits attention, much which marks the superiority of man over the other animal races around him. The human body was not made of the celestial elements, light and air; but of the more gross terrestrial matter, as being designed to receive and communicate notices of terrestrial objects, through the medium of organs similar to them. "The Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground;" he moulded or modelled him as a potter does the clay under his hand; we see the work, as it were, upon the wheel, gradually rising and growing under the hands of the divine Artificer; and at length producing, from the dust of the ground, a frame superior in rank and dignity to the heavens and all their host. They whose profession has led them to examine the structure of this astonishing piece of mechanism, contemplate the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the formation of the human body. An examination of its parts, and the admirable skill with which they are disposed, brought Galen upon his knees in adoration of the wisdom with which the whole is contrived, and incited him to challenge any one, upon a hundred years' study, to show how the least fibre or particle, could be more commodiously placed, either for use or beauty. And while the world shall last, genius and diligence will be producing fresh proofs that we are "fearfully and wonderfully made;" that "marvellous are the works;" and, above all, this capital work of the Almighty, demonstrating that the hand which made it must indeed be divine. See PHYSIOLOGY.

Adam differed from all his descendants in this particular, that he was not to attain the maturity of his intellectual powers, by a gradual process from infancy, but came into being in full stature and vigor of mind, as well as body. He found creation, likewise, in its prime; it was morning with man and the world. How long he was allowed to make his observations upon the different objects with which he found himself surrounded, we are not told; but it should seem, either that sufficient time was allowed him for that purpose, or that he was enabled, in some extraordinary manner, to pervade their nature, and discover their properties. For we are informed, that God brought the creatures to him, that he might impose upon them suitable names. The use of names is to express the nature of the things named; but in the knowledge of those natures, at the beginning, God, who made them, must have been man's instructor. Without such an instructor, indeed, it is not likely that man could ever have formed a language at all, since it is a task that requires much thought, and the great masters of reason seem to be agreed, that without language we are incapable of thinking to any purpose. However this may be, from the original imposition of names, by our first parent, we may infer that his knowledge of natural objects must have been very eminent and extensive; nothing inferior, we may suppose, to that of Solomon, who "spoke of trees from the cedar to the hyssop, and of beasts, and fowls, and creeping things, and fishes." It is, therefore, probable, that Plato asserted no more than the truth, when, according to the traditions he had gleaned up in Egypt and the east, he affirmed that the first man was, of all men, "the greatest philosopher."

But Adam was made for nobler ends than merely to rule over the creatures of the lower world. He was formed for the contemplation of God here, and for the enjoyment of him hereafter. We cannot, therefore, suppose that his knowledge would terminate on earth, though it took its rise there. Like the patriarch's ladder, its foot was on earth, but its top reached to heaven. His mind ascended from the creatures to the Creator, and descended from the Creator to the creatures. It was the golden chain which connected matter and spirit, preserving a communication between two worlds.

To point out to us the munificence of heaven towards his favorite creature, it is said, "The Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and there he placed the man whom he had formed." Gen. 2: 8. When we think of paradise, we think of it as the seat of delight. Its very name, EDEN, which signifies PLEASURE, authorizes us so to do. The garden of Eden had, doubtless, all the perfection it could receive from the hands of him, who ordained it to be the residence of the noblest of his works. We may reasonably presume it to have been the earth in miniature; and to have contained specimens of all natural productions, as they appeared without blemish, in an unfallen world; disposed, too, in admirable order for the purposes intended. And it may be observed, that when, in after-times, the penmen of the Scriptures have occasion to describe any remarkable degree of fertility and beauty, of grandeur and magnificence, they take their similitudes from the garden of Eden. Gen. 13: 10. Joel 2: 3. Ezek. 28: 12.

To complete the happiness of man, God created him with a social nature; and this not only for the multiplication of his species, but also for the interchange of those amiable affections, and those offices of kindness, which arise from the parental and filial relations, as well as from the inherent diversity of character in the sexes. In the emphatical language of the Scriptures, they were made for each other; and were designed to furnish, mutually, a social and superior happiness, of which solitude is incapable. A more delicate and beautiful form was united in the woman, to a mind, possessing gentler and lovelier affections, a more refined taste, and more elegant sentiments. In the man, a firmer and stronger frame was joined to a mind more robust, more patient of toil, and more equal to difficulties. In each, the other was intended to find that which was wanting in itself; and to approve, love, and admire, both qualities and actions, of which itself was imperfectly capable; while in their reciprocations of tenderness, and good-will, each beheld every blessing mightily enhanced, and intensely endeared.

From the circumstances related by Moses, concerning the placing of Adam in the garden of Eden; from his causing the creatures to come before him; from his bringing Eve to him; and from his communicating to him a law which he was strictly to observe, we may judge of the familiar intercourse to which the blessed God condescendingly admitted him. He conversed with him, probably, under some visible appearance, as he afterwards did with Moses, "as a man converseth with his friend;" no doubt, instructing him, as far as was necessary, in the knowledge of his Maker, of his own immortal spirit and destiny, of the temptations he had to encounter, of the consequences to which disobedience would subject him, and probably of those invisible glories, a participation of which was to be the reward of his obedience.

5. The trial of Adam, by a special prohibition, it has been justly remarked, was singularly adapted to the end proposed. To conform to his Creator's will, he must be trained to habits of implicit obedience; satisfied in abstaining from a thing, on the mere ground of its being forbidden of God, though he were unable to perceive the reason of his being required so to do. It was, in reality, that he might continue in the sweet spirit of a child of God, that should have no will of his own! and this is still the spirit of true religion.

In considering the trial, temptation, and fall of Adam, the greatest difficulty is, to divest ourselves of ideas received from the present state of things. We cannot sufficiently dismiss from our minds, that knowledge, (rather that subtlety;) which we have acquired by experience. We should, nevertheless, remember, that however Adam might be a man in capacity of understanding, yet, in experience, he could be but a child. He had no cause to distrust any, except what he found in the warning voice of his Heavenly Father. Had he still relied on that warning voice, he could not have been deceived by an artful combination of appearances; by fraud and guile, exerted against it. The same remark is true, also, of Eve. The subtlety of the tempter beguiled her away from her confidence in her Heavenly Father; and relying on her own judgment, instead of His Word, she fell. Adam, indeed, the apostle assures us, "was not deceived." 1 Tim. 2: 14. Against his better knowledge, he yielded to his social affections.

The sin of both was voluntary, and therefore inexcusable. It was nothing less than "PREFERRING THE CREATURE TO THE CREATOR, WHO IS BLESSED FOREVERMORE." Rom. 1: 25. This, this is the bitter root of all the evil in creation! Because, as was man's situation, such was the test given to him. It was not an active, but a passive duty; not something to be done, but something to be forborne; a negative trial. Nor did it originally regard the mind, but the appetite; nor was that appetite without fit, yea, much fitter supply, in abundance all around it. Ungrateful distrust of God, unwarrantable presumption, unrestrained desire, liberty extended into licentiousness, were the first principles of human transgression. And observe, they neglected PRAYER!

The aggravating circumstances of the offence may well be adduced from the tremendous consequences which followed. Gen. 3: 22—24. Rom. 5: 12—21.

6. It has been remarked by commentators, that the threatening denounced on the serpent, does not so much respect the person of the grand adversary of God and man, as it does his cause and kingdom in this world. He will be personally punished at the appointed time; but this respects the manifestation of the Son of God, to destroy his works. It contains an intimation that Satan's cause shall be ruined, and that its ruin shall be accomplished by one in human nature; by the Seed of the Woman; which must have been not a little mortifying to his pride. And more especially will this latter appear to be the case, if we consider, what the Scriptures strongly intimate, that his own fall was the effect of envy, at the rejoicings of eternal wisdom over man, when first made known in heaven, and that his present attempt to ruin the human race, was an act of revenge. John 8: 44. 1 John 3: 8—12.

The breaking of a beautiful vase, may afford some idea of Adam after his sin. The integrity of his mind was violated; the first compliance with sin opened the way to future compliances; grosser temptations might now expect success; and thus spotless purity becoming impure, perfect uprightness becoming warped, lost that integrity which had been its glory. Hereby, Adam relinquished that distinction, which had fitted him for immediate communion with supreme holiness, and was reduced to the necessity of soliciting such communion, mediately, not immediately; by another, not by himself; in prospect, not instant; in hope, not in possession; in time future, not in time present; in another world, not in this.

It is worthy of notice, how precisely the principles which infatuated Adam, have ever governed his posterity; how suitable to the general character of the human race, was the nature of that temptation, by which their father fell! Who is not self-convicted of lust and pride? Surely when Adam in after-ages was giving advice to his descendants; when his sacred hands, stained with the blood of the victim recently offered to Jehovah, were extended in benediction over his worshipping family, he would say, "My sons, behold in me the sad example of disobedience to restraint; had I constantly honored that simple prohibition, I had been happy: how many restraints, now necessary for human welfare, had never been known! Now is man restrained from this—because to this he is prone; and from that—because that seems good to him; but, under seeming good, lurks real evil. Such was the character of my temptation! It offered pleasure, but I found it anguish; it allured the sense, but the sense was depraved by it; before I sinned, I was serene, delighted, happy; afterwards, I was gloomy, turbulent, miserable. Wherefore? Because I violated the divine restraint; because, having abundance, I craved superfluity; because, being a man, I must needs wish to be as God; because, knowing only good, I would know evil also,—good lost, and evil got!"

It is presumable that only, or chiefly, in the garden of Paradise, were the prime fruits and herbage in perfection. The land around the garden might be much less finished, and only fertile to a certain degree. To promote its fertility, by cultivation, became the object of Adam's labor; so that in the sweat of his brow, he himself did eat bread. But the sentence passed on our first parents, doubtless, regarded them as the representatives, the very concentration of their posterity, the whole human race; and attaching to themselves, it seems, prophetically also, to suggest the condition of the sexes in future ages. "The female sex, which has been the means of bringing death into the world, shall also be the means of bringing life—posterity—to compensate the ravages of death;—and, to remind the sex of its original transgression, that which shall be its greatest honor and happiness, shall be accompanied by no slight inconveniences. But the male sex shall be under the necessity of laboring for the support, not of itself only, but of the female and her family: so that if a man could, with little exertion, provide for himself, he should be stimulated to far greater exertions, to toil, to sweat, for the advantage and support of those to whom he has been the means of giving life."

Death, the wages of sin, closes the sentence passed on mankind; and the dread privation it involves, is common to Adam, and to all his descendants.

"The poison in your blood, though slow, is sure; though latent, yet it will operate in time. I do not think proper to exert my Almighty power in curing this malady directly; I shall remedy its effects another way; I leave you uncertain of when you may die; every day brings you nearer to the period at which you must die: be this anxious suspense the commencement of your punishment; it is one of the bitterness of death. But this is not all. Paradise, the tree of life, your happy immortality, all is forfeited! Having sinned, you have come short of the glory of God; the hope of which, nothing but mercy can restore. (Comp. Rom. 3: 23. with Rom. 5: 1, 2.) The privation of all your primitive and prospective felicity—not of immortal existence, but of all that makes immortal existence happy and desirable—this is the full import of your sentence—DEATH!" But see how the mercy of God mitigates the consequences announced in this whole sentence! It inflicts pain on the woman, but that pain is connected with the dearest comforts, and with the great Restorer of the human race! it assigns labor to the man, but then that labor is to support himself, and others dearer to him than himself, repetitions of himself! it denounces death, but death indefinitely postponed, and to the believer the path to life! It may be well to remark, that the Hebrew expression, in the day, which is used in the threatening announced to man, is of a rather loose and general signification; much like our English expressions, when speaking of time, long past, or long to come, as "the people of that day," meaning of that time, with great latitude. There is another phrase which expresses a fixed or instant day, but that is not used here.

7. Our first parents were divinely clothed with skins: no doubt ONE SKIN SERVED THEM BOTH, for the word is in the singular form. They had endeavored to cover themselves with fig leaves; but the intertwining, the plaiting of leaves, of boughs or branches, recalled no image of death; it shed no blood; it expressed nothing that included the idea of restitution or atonement, and therefore it was rejected. The skin of an animal, however, was not to be procured, without first taking away the life of the animal; and the life of the animal could not be taken away, without reminding Adam of the penalty threatened—DEATH! What a subject does this offer to the imagination! What a scope might it not here take! How would Adam tremble, when he first selected the creature to be slain; when he led it towards the place appointed for its death; with what heavy reluctance, what hesitation, would he bind it, wreath around it the confining twigs, and then proceed to slaughter it! What would be his reflections when its blood streamed, when its limbs quivered, and at length, when they ceased to quiver! Its last gasp would thrill through his soul, and give him to feel, by sympathy, what death was. How would the penitential tears stream from his eyes, to think that to this he must eventually submit; that to this he had subjected his descendants to the very latest posterity! What, then, could be the import of sacrifice, but a memorial, a representation of death—deserved by the principal, but transferred, for merciful purposes, to a substitute! See EDEM; DEATH; LANGUAGE; FALL OF MAN; SACRIFICE.

8. The Rabbinical and Mahometan traditions and fables, respecting the first man, are as absurd as they are numerous. Some of them, indeed, are monstrous, unless we suppose them to be allegories, in the exaggerated style of the orientals. Some say that he was nine hundred cubits high; whilst others, not satisfied with this, affirm that his head touched the heavens. The Jews think that he wrote the ninety-first Psalm, invented the Hebrew letters, and composed several treatises; the Arabians, that he preserved twenty books which fell from heaven; and the Mussulmen, that he himself wrote ten volumes.

9. That Adam is a type of Christ, is plainly affirmed by St. Paul, who calls him "the figure of him, who was to come." Hence our Lord is sometimes called, not inapty, the second Adam. 1 Cor. 15: 45—49. This relation stands sometimes in similitude, sometimes in contrast. Adam was formed immediately by God, as was the humanity of Christ. In each, the nature was spotless, and richly endowed with knowledge and true holiness. Both are seen invested with dominion over the earth and all its creatures; and this may explain the eighth Psalm, where David seems to make the sovereignty of the first man over the whole earth, in its pristine glory, the prophetic symbol of the dominion of Christ over the world restored. Beyond these particulars, fancy must not carry us; and the typical contrast must also be limited to that which is stated in Scripture, or supported by its allusions. Adam and Christ were each a public representative, a federal head, to all in connection with them; but the connection in the first case, is that of nature, in the last, it is of grace, through faith. 1 Cor. 1: 30. The one was the fountain of sin and death, the other of righteousness and life, Rom. 5: 12—19. The first man communicated a living soul to all his posterity; the other imparts to his, that quickening Spirit, which restores them now to newness of life, and will raise them up at the last day. Rom. 8: 1—11. 1 Cor. 15: 22. By the communication of his fatally injured nature, death reigned, even over those who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression; and through the righteousness of the second Adam, and the communication of a new and divine nature, by the Holy Spirit, whom He sends forth, grace shall much more abound, and reign in Christ's true followers unto eternal life. Rom. 5: 19—21.—Colmet; Jones; Watson; Dwight's Theology, vol. i. Sermons, xxvi. to xxxiv. See DEPRIVITY OF MAN.

ADAMAH. See ADMAH.

ADAMANT; a stone of impenetrable hardness. Sometimes this name is given to the diamond; and so it is rendered, Jer. 17: 1. But the Hebrew word, rather means a very hard kind of stone, probably the smiris, which was also used for cutting, engraving, and polishing other hard stones and crystals. The word occurs, also, Ezek. 3: 9. and Zech. 7: 12. In the former place, the Lord says to the prophet, "I have made thy forehead as an adamant, firmer than a rock;" that is, endued thee with undaunted courage. In the latter, the hearts of wicked men are declared to be as adamant; neither broken by the threatenings and judgment of God, nor penetrated by his promises, invitations, and mercies. See DIAMOND.

ADAMITES; a sect that sprang up in the second century. Epiphanius tells us, that they were called Adamites, from their pretending to be re-established in the state of innocence, such as Adam's was at the moment of his creation, whence they ought to imitate him in going naked. They detested marriage; maintaining that the conjugal union would never have taken place upon earth, had sin been unknown. This obscure and ridiculous sect did not last long. It was, however, revived with additional absurdities in the twelfth century. About the beginning of the fifteenth century, these errors spread in Germany and Bohemia: it found also some partisans in Poland, Holland, and England. They assembled in the night; and, it is said, one of the fundamental maxims of their society was contained in the following verse:

Jura, perjura, secretum prodere noli.
Swear, forswear, and reveal not the secret.

But Lardner doubts their existence in ancient, and Beauobre in modern times.

ADAIR, (JAMES;) a trader with the Indians of the southern states, who, in 1775, published a "History of the American Indians," in which he points out various customs of the Indians, having a striking resemblance to those of the Jews. His arguments to prove them descended from the Jews, are founded on their division into the tribes; their worship of Jehovah; their festivals, fasts, and religious rites; their daily sacrifice; their prophets and high priests; their cities of refuge; their marriages and divorces; their burial of the dead, and mourning for them; their language, and choice of names adapted to circumstances; their manner of reckoning time; and various other particulars. Some distrust, says president Allen, seems to have fallen upon his statements, although he himself says, that his account is "neither disguised by fable nor prejudice." Dr. Boudinot, in his "Star in the West," has adopted the opinions of Adair, in—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ADAMS, (ELIHALET;) an eminent minister of New London, Connecticut, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1694. Ordained, February, 1709, and died April, 1753. Dr. Chauncey speaks of him as a great Hebrician. His publications were chiefly sermons.—Allen.

ADAMS, (JOHN;) a poet and preacher of the Gospel, was the only son of Hon. John Adams, of Nova Scotia, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1721. He died at Cambridge, in 1740. He was much distinguished for his learning, genius, and piety. He was master of nine languages. A small volume of his poems was published at Boston, in 1745.—Allen.

ADAMS, (MATTHEW;) a distinguished writer of Boston. He was a mechanic, but devoted much time to literature, and possessed a handsome library, for access to which, Dr. Franklin acknowledges his obligation. He died poor, in 1753, but with a reputation of more worth than an estate. Rev. John Adams, minister of Durham, New Hampshire, from 1748 to 1778, was his son.—Allen.

ADAMS, (ZABDIEL;) was born in Quincy, 1739. He was graduated at Harvard college, 1759, ordained, 1764, and died, 1801. He was an eminent preacher, and published several sermons.—Allen.

ADAMS, (SAMUEL;) governor of Massachusetts, and a most distinguished patriot of the American revolution, was born in Boston, September 27, 1722, and graduated at Harvard college, 1740. Early distinguished by his talents as a writer, his first efforts are monuments of his filial piety. At this early period, also, he laid the foundation of public confidence and esteem, which he retained through life. He was at first a public collector in the town of Boston. In 1774, he was elected a member of the general congress, in which station, for several years, he rendered the most important services to his country. The act of the British government, dated June 12, 1775, which proscribed only Samuel Adams and John Hancock, is sufficient evidence of what Americans owe to the denounced patriot.

In 1776, he united with J. Adams, Hancock, Franklin, Jefferson, and a host of worthies, in declaring the United States no longer an appendage to a monarchy, but FREE AND INDEPENDENT.

When the constitution of Massachusetts was adopted, he was elected president of the senate. A disturbance rising in the western counties, he was sent to quiet it, and succeeded. He was a member of the convention for examining the constitution of the United States, and had the happiness of seeing it altered in several points, to his views and wishes, in its present excellent form.

In 1789, he was chosen lieutenant-governor, and was in this office till 1794, when he was elected governor, as successor to Mr. Hancock. In 1797, he resigned, from age and infirmity, and retired from public life. He died, October 2, 1803, in the 82d year of his age.

To a majestic countenance, and dignified manners, Mr. Adams added a suavity of temper, which conciliated universal affection; to an unconquerable love of liberty, an integrity, firmness, and decision, which commanded, even from his political opponents, reverence and esteem. Though somewhat reserved among strangers, at home and among his friends, he could readily relax in the pleasures of cheerful conversation, chaste wit, and apposite anecdote, from the severer studies and cares of public life. Relative duties he faithfully discharged. His house was the seat of domestic peace, regularity, and method.

He was poor. While occupied abroad in the most important and responsible duties, the partner of his cares supported the family at home, by her industry. Though his resources were very small, yet, such were the economy and dignity of his house, that those who visited him, found nothing mean, or unbecoming his station.

He was a sage and a patriot. The independence of the United States of America is, perhaps, to be attributed as much to his exertions as to those of any one man. His contemporary, John Adams, the second president of the United States, thus speaks of him: "The talents and virtues of that great man were of the most exalted, though not of the most showy kind. His love of his country, his exertions in her service, through a long course of years, through the administrations of the governors Shirley, Pownall, Barnard, Hutchinson, and Gage, under the royal government, and through the whole of the subsequent revolution, and always in support of the same principles; his inflexible integrity, his disinterestedness, his invariable resolution, his sagacity, his patience, perseverance, and pure public virtue, were not exceeded by any man in America. A collection of his writings would be as curious as voluminous. It would throw light upon American history for fifty years. In it would be found specimens of a nervous simplicity of reasoning and eloquence, that have never been rivalled in America."

Above all, Mr. Adams was a Christian. Christianity was the living spring and law of his virtues, and stamped the character of the saint on the sage and the patriot. It is this fact which gives him a place in the present work, among the glorious band who have been public benefactors of their race on Christian principles. His mind was early imbued with piety, as well as cultivated by science. He early approached the table of the Lord, and the purity of his life witnessed the sincerity of his profession. The Sabbath found him constantly among the worshippers in the house of God, and the retirement of his family circle was hallowed by the steady flame of his morning and evening devotions. His religious sentiments were strictly Calvinistic. The discipline and order of the Congregational churches had his cordial approbation. The last production of his powerful pen, was a letter to Thomas Paine, in defence of that glorious Gospel in the faith of which he lived, and in the enjoyment of whose blessed hopes he died.—Allen's Biog. Dict.; Elliot's do.; Ency. Amer.

ADAMS, (JOHN, LL. D.;) president of the United States, was born at Braintree, Massachusetts, October 30, 1735. His father was a deacon of the church in that town, a farmer and a mechanic. Mr. Adams, while a member of Harvard college, where he was graduated, in 1755, was distinguished for diligence in his studies, boldness of thought, and intellectual power. His subsequent life is too well known to need to be repeated here.

In April, 1756, when deliberating about the choice of a profession, some friends advised him to study theology; but he preferred the profession of law, on grounds which strikingly develop the character of his mind. The substance of them is, that he was more ambitious of being an eminent, honorable lawyer, than (as he expressed it,) of "heading the whole army of orthodox preachers." No one can question, that, in this respect, he gained the object of his ambition. Providence even exceeded the measure of his desires, by enabling him to serve his country for a long series of years in the most conspicuous and able manner. His name will be transmitted to future generations among the very first patriots and sages of this or any other land. Much as it is to be lamented that his mind was so early disposed to regard the evangelical principles venerated by Samuel Adams, with contempt; and to follow the speculations of Dr. S. Clarke, Emlin, &c., as he confessedly did, through a long life filled with public labors; no one can doubt his sincere belief of the divine origination of Christianity. For this reason it seems not improper to enroll his name among those eminently great and useful men, who from age to age have added the weight of their judgment to the truth of the Gospel.

"Perhaps, (it has been well observed,) the religious sentiments of most men become settled at an early period of their lives. If, therefore, the cherished views of Christianity have any relation to practice, and to one's destiny hereafter, with what sobriety, candor, and diligence, and with what earnestness of prayer, for light and guidance from above, ought every young man to investigate revealed truth." Here, as in all other departments of real knowledge, "there is no royal road to learning." Minds of the greatest energy come under the same fixed law—"Except a man receive the kingdom of Heaven as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein." Mr. Adams died, July 4, 1826, aged 90 years.

ADAMS, (Miss HANNAH;) author of the celebrated Dictionary of Religions; was born in Medfield, Massachusetts, 1755. From infancy she had a very slender constitution, and was thereby prevented from acquiring even the little education that was then to be had at a country school. Possessing a great thirst for knowledge, she found means to gratify her taste by extensive reading, though not of the most solid kind. Her natural sensibility was extreme, and it was early aggravated by the influence of poetry and novels. In her tenth year she lost her excellent mother, and soon after a favorite aunt. These events made a deep impression on her sensitive mind. Her father's failure in business a few years later, conspired with the deep melancholy of her feelings to prevent her from entering into general society. Hence arose a timidity and awkwardness of manners which was never wholly removed. Through the kindness of some literary gentlemen, who boarded awhile at her father's, she became acquainted with the Latin and Greek languages, with geography and logic; and pursued these studies with such ardor and success, that she not long after actually fitted three young men for college. One of these young men was the Rev. Pitt Clark, of Norton.

The incident which gave occasion to her dictionary, is thus related by herself. "While I was engaged in learning Latin and Greek, one of the gentlemen who taught me, had by him a small manuscript, from Broughton's Dictionary, giving an account of Arminians, Calvinists, and several other denominations which were most common. This awakened my curiosity, and I assiduously engaged myself in perusing all the books I could obtain, which gave an account of the various sentiments described. I soon became disgusted with the want of candor in the authors I consulted, in giving the most unfavorable descriptions of the denominations they disliked, and applying to them the names of heretics, fanatics, enthusiasts, &c. I therefore formed a plan for myself, made a blank book, and wrote rules for transcribing, and adding to my compilation. But as I was stimulated to proceed, only by curiosity, and never had an idea of deriving any profit from it, the compilation went on but slowly; though I was pressed by necessity to make every exertion in my power for my immediate support."

The first edition of this work was published under the name of a "View of all Religions." This was in 1784, when she was twenty-nine years of age. It was in part transcribed for the press by her oldest sister Elizabeth, whom she calls her "friend, counsellor, and guide." This beloved and pious sister, not long after, sunk into the grave, in a state of mind indicative of the ripeness of her Christian character; constantly expressing her "entire submission to the divine will, and laying all her burdens at the foot of the Cross." Her death involved Miss Adams in the deepest affliction. To use her own language—

"Dearer than life, or aught beneath the skies,
The bright ideas and romantic schemes
Of perfect love and friendship, fancy paints,
In her were realized.

"To describe the excess of my grief would be altogether impossible. Every thing appeared gloomy in my situation. My health was feeble; I was entirely destitute of property; my father's circumstances were very low; and I had no other relation or friend, from whom I might expect to derive assistance. But notwithstanding all the difficulties in my situation, I determined to use every exertion to help myself; considering that if I was unsuccessful in attempting to extricate myself from poverty, my efforts would awaken the activity of my mind, and preserve me from sinking under the weight of affliction I sustained in losing the best of sisters. It was, perhaps, a happy circumstance, that necessity stimulated me to an exertion, in this most gloomy period of my existence."

Those who knew her, might indeed wonder that any motive could at any time induce her to publish a book. Her humility, her diffidence, her want of early advantages, her total ignorance of business, were obstacles that appeared insurmountable. She tried various other methods to earn a subsistence, such as spinning, weaving, making lace, and braiding straw; but in vain. "It was desperation, therefore, and not vanity," said she, "that induced me to publish." Four editions of her "View of Religions," were published in her lifetime in this country; besides an English edition, with improvements, by the excellent Andrew Fuller. These improvements she adopted in her fourth edition; changing the title, and adding much from other sources to the value of the work.

Her next work was the "History of New England." The difficulties she encountered in compiling this work may be estimated by the fact, that at the time "there was not any history of New England extant, except Mather's Magnalia, and Neale's History; and these extended only to an early period in the annals of our country. If there had been only one work which reached to the acceptance of the Federal Constitution, my task had been far less laborious." In executing it, she so injured her eyes as to be threatened with the total loss of sight; but by applying laudanum and sea water several times a day for two years, she recovered so far as to resume her studies; and by the assistance of an amanuensis, the history was got ready for publication, in 1799. About this time she found essential assistance in a pecuniary way from the kind attention of the Rev. Dr. Freeman in making the contract with the publishers of her work.

Soon after she published a concise "View of the Christian Religion," selected from the writings of eminent laymen; a work which deserves to be better known.

Necessity still urging her to write, she, in 1810, entered upon the compilation of her well known "History of the Jews," at Dedham. Here her eyes again failing, she came to Boston for relief; when several benevolent gentlemen united in rewarding and animating her efforts, by settling upon her an annuity for life. She now had a home in Boston, with new literary advantages, and numerous literary friends; among whom, the most distinguished was the Rev. J. S. Buckminster. Without the assistance of his large and valuable library, she says she should never have been able to finish the work. It was published in 1812, a few months only before his death.

After this, Miss Adams continued to reside in Boston until her death, which took place, on a visit to Brookline, November 15, 1831, at the age of 76.

An intimate friend gives the following interesting sketch of her character. "To an almost childlike simplicity and singleness of heart, she united a clear and just conception of character; to a deep and affecting humility, a dignity and elevation of thought, that commanded the respect and veneration of those around her. Amidst many infirmities, she retained the freshness and enthusiasm of youth. Her love of nature was exhaustless. It was her delight to gather around her images of natural and moral beauty. In many respects her mind seemed so truly constituted for enjoyment, that to those who knew her but slightly, she might have appeared to be exempted from that mental discipline, which is gradually leading the pilgrim on to the land of promise. But her friends knew otherwise. They knew how keen was her religious sensibility, how tremblingly alive her conscience, how high her standard of excellence, how great her timidity and self-distrust; and they felt that this was not her haven of rest. Though her faith was fervent and devout, it partook of the constitution of her sensitive mind, rather than gave the tone to it. Yet, amidst moments of doubt and dependency, a passage from Scripture, or a judicious observation, would disperse the clouds that gathered round her, and the brightest sunshine would diffuse itself over her mind and countenance. Many in whom she delighted, had passed away. To those she has gone, and to the Father and Savior whom she loved."

Her life is in many respects full of instruction. Among those who have struggled against peculiar difficulties in the pursuit of knowledge, she deserves a high rank. She became a literary woman, when literature in our country was a rare accomplishment. Her name will hereafter live with those of Mrs. Barbauld and Hannah More; had she enjoyed their advantages, she possibly might have rivalled even them.

Besides the works already mentioned, Miss Adams published an Abridgment of her History of New-England, and Letters on the Gospels.—Memoir of Miss Hannah Adams.

ADAN; the twelfth month of the sacred, and the sixth of the civil, year among the Hebrews. It contains but twenty-nine days, and answers to our February, and sometimes enters into March, according to the course of the moon, by which they regulated their seasons. As the lunar year which the Jews follow in their calculations, is shorter than the solar year by eleven days, which after three years make about a month, they then insert a thirteenth month, which they call Ve-Adan, or a sacred Adan, to which they assign twenty-nine days.

ADD; Gal. 2: 6. They added nothing to me: they gave me no new information or authority which I had not before. To be added to the Lord and to the church, is to be converted and united to the Lord Jesus and his church as new members of his mystical body, both vitally and visibly. Acts 7: 14. 11: 24. 2: 41, 47.

In 2 Peter 1: 5—11. this word occurs twice, in a sense far more significant than is usually apprehended. "The precise value of the principal terms employed in this remarkable passage it is important to understand; our English version is here less happy and exact than usual." The original word (epichoregeseate) is a compound, which conveys the sense of bringing into combination and correspondence the several virtues enumerated, in order to make up the full and harmonious choir of Christian graces. It is an allusion to the chorus of the Grecian theatre. The spirit, beauty, and force of the original, no single word in our language can convey. It is not merely the adding of one virtue to another as so many unconnected items, or as so many new strangers added to a crowd, where nothing depends upon the number or adjustment; but every part in the apostle's enumeration of virtues bears an inseparable relation to any other part, and also to the whole, and the entire effect depends upon their due combination.

It were surely a rude style of exposition, it has been well remarked, to regard the catalogue of virtues now before us, as merely a vague and fortuitous series of moral qualities, each of which, though singly important, is not specifically linked to its neighbor, and does not derive any definite significance from its location in the list. To convey the full sense of the apostolic language, it is necessary to resort to a paraphrase, beginning with the third verse.

"Divinely endowed (says the apostle to all Christian believers) with whatever is important to the life of piety; enriched also with those inestimable promises which insure to us a participation of the Divine Nature in its holiness and happiness, a participation flowing from an intimate knowledge of Him who has called us to so high a glory; and having by the same means gained a freedom from the defilement and weakness of worldly passions, apply all your diligence, my brethren, to this point—the filling up of the defects yet remaining in your Christian character. For this purpose, gather into one harmonious choir the whole train of holy graces of which faith naturally and properly takes the lead; and give to each its due place in your soul, as in the temple of the living God, consecrated to his glory and filled with his praise. Let your FAITH in his inestimable promises, (that it be not pusillanimous,) be always associated with (arete) ENERGY IN HIS SERVICE; let your energy be duly informed by (gnosis) KNOWLEDGE OF EVANGELICAL PRINCIPLES; and let your knowledge be (not abused to licentiousness, but) united with (enkratia) THE CONTROL OF EVERY BODILY APPETITE. This firm self-control will prepare you to suffer whatever God may please to appoint, with (eupomone) THE PATIENCE of humility, meekness and submission. Hence to your patience, (that it be not fanatical, stoical, nor brutal,) you must add (eusebia) PIETY, or the reverential and filial observance of all the means of grace and offices of devotion. Yet remember that your piety is to be, (not unsocial, ascetic or anchoretic, but) fraught with (philadelphia) BROTHERLY AFFECTION; and lastly, that your affection towards your fellow Christians is to be (not sectarian and exclusive, but) ever connected with (agape) CHARITY, the divine and expansive principle of universal love. 1 Cor. 13. For if these virtues be thus united in you, (pleonazonta) filling and overflowing your souls as streams from a fresh and copious fountain, they will render you neither inactive nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. For he in whom these things are wanting is blind, closing his eyes, and has forgotten his having received purification from his former sins. For this reason therefore, brethren, I exhort you the rather to use diligence to make your calling and election sure, that is, past all doubt and danger; for if ye do these things I have recommended, if ye apply yourselves assiduously to the means of perfecting your Christian character, you will never err from the path to heaven; for so shall be furnished you richly, by the glorious choir of saints and angels, in full harmony, an entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

Almost every excellence in the science of morals, says a late eloquent writer, has been attained by sages—except completeness and consistency: the completeness and consistency of its morality is the peculiar praise of the ethics which the Bible has taught. Every one who is conversant with history will readily call to mind abundant illustrations of our meaning. The ancient world often enough displayed (and in some instances which justly demand admiration) a stern subjugation of the animal appetites; or an arrogant fortitude; or a proud public virtue; or an ambitious patriotism; or a bland and gay, but dissolute humanity, and a voluptuous elegance. Or after that Christianity had exploded the philosophic and polytheistic virtues, and had imparted the power and solemnity of the future life to ethics, mankind were called upon to admire a new order of extravagance in morals, while saints and anchorites, instead of heroes and statesmen, ran the course of glory. Meanwhile, the completeness and consistency of true virtue, as taught by the apostles, was wholly lost sight of.

Our own times, though it be after a new model, have shown as notable examples of the brilliancy and vigor that may belong to partial systems of piety and morals; and we have now as great need as ever to resort to the source—the only source of a consistent morality.

The absolute symmetry, the exact counterpoise of parts, in the apostolic ethics, sometimes conspicuous and sometimes occult, is eminently exhibited in the epistles of Peter. And he moreover shows himself, especially in the passage above illustrated, to be master of that PRACTICAL HARMONY OF PRINCIPLES, which, on difficult occasions and under peculiar excitements, adheres to the nice line of moderation, humility, and firmness. Nothing so great had been seen in the world before Christ imparted to his disciples the elements of true magnanimity. We venture to affirm that the passage is fraught, at once, with philosophical justness of classification, and with prophetic truth.—Saturday Evening; Brown's Dict.

ADDER. The adder was known to the ancient Hebrews under various names. It is the opinion of some interpreters, that the word Shachal, which in some parts of Scripture denotes a lion, in others means an adder, or some kind of serpent. Thus, in the ninety-first Psalm, they render it the basilisk, "Thou shalt tread upon the adder and the basilisk, the young lion and the dragon thou shalt trample under foot." Verse 13. Indeed, all the ancient expositors agree, that some species of serpent is meant; and as the term Shachal, when applied to beasts, denotes a black lion; so, in the present application, it is thought to mean the black adder.

The wonderful effect which music produces on the serpent tribes, is confirmed by the testimony of several respectable moderns. Adders swell at the sound of a flute, raising themselves up on the one half of their body, turning themselves round, beating proper time, and following the instrument. Their head, naturally round and like an eel, becomes broad and flat like a fan. The tame serpents, many of which the Orientals keep in their houses, are known to leave their holes in hot weather, at the sound of a musical instrument, and to run upon the performer. Dr. Shaw had an opportunity of seeing a number of serpents keep exact time with the dervishes in their circulatory dances, running over their heads and arms, turning when they turned, and stopping when they stopped. The rattlesnake acknowledges the power of music as much as any of his family; of which the following instance is a decisive proof. When Chateaubriand was in Canada, a snake of this species entered their encampment; a young Canadian, one of the party, who could play on the flute, to divert his associates, advanced against the serpent with his new species of weapon. "On the approach of his enemy, the haughty reptile curled himself into a spiral line, flattened his head, inflated his cheeks, contracted his lips, displayed his envenomed fangs, and his bloody throat; his double tongue glowed like two flames of fire; his eyes were burning coals; his body, swollen with rage, rose and fell like the bellows of a forge; his dilated skin assumed a dull and scaly appearance; and his tail, which sounded the denunciation of death, vibrated with so great rapidity as to resemble a light vapor. The Canadian now began to play upon his flute; the serpent started with surprise, and drew back his head. In proportion as he was struck with the magic effect, his eyes lost their fierceness, the oscillations of his tail became slower, and the sound which it emitted became weaker, and gradually died away. Less perpendicular upon their spiral line, the rings of the fascinated serpent were by degrees expanded, and sunk one after another upon the ground, in concentric circles. The shades of azure, green, white, and gold, recovered their brilliancy on his quivering skin, and slightly turning his head, he remained motionless, in the attitude of attention and pleasure. At this moment, the Canadian advanced a few steps, producing with his flute sweet and simple notes. The reptile, inclining his variegated neck, opened a passage with his head through the high grass, and began to creep after the musician, stopping when he stopped, and beginning to follow him again, as soon as he moved forward." In this manner he was led out of the camp, attended by a great number of spectators, both savages and Europeans, who could scarcely believe their eyes, when they beheld this wonderful effect of harmony. The assembly unanimously decreed, that the serpent which had so highly entertained them, should be permitted to escape.

But on some serpents, these charms seem to have no power; and it appears from Scripture, that the adder sometimes takes precautions to prevent the fascination which he sees preparing for him; for the deaf adder shutteth her ear, and will not hear the voice of the most skillful charmer. Psalm 59: 5, 6. The same allusion is involved in the words of Solomon: "Surely the serpent will bite, without enchantment; and a babblers is no better." Eccl. 10: 11. The threatening of the prophet Jeremiah proceeds upon the same fact; "I will send serpents (cockatrices) among you, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you." Jer. 8: 17. In all these quotations, the sacred writers, while they take it for granted that many serpents are disarmed by charming, plainly admit that the powers of the charmer are in vain exerted upon others. To account for this exception it has been alleged, that in some serpents the sense of hearing is very imperfect, while the power of vision is exceedingly acute; but the most intelligent natural historians maintain, that the reverse is true. The sense of hearing is much more acute than the sense of vision. Unable to resist the force of truth, others maintain, that the adder is deaf not by nature, but by design; for the Psalmist says, she shutteth her ear, and will not hear the voice of the charmer. But the phrase, perhaps, means no more than this, that some adders are of a temper so stubborn, that the various arts of the charmer make no impression; they are like creatures destitute of hearing, or whose ears are so completely obstructed, that no sounds can enter. The same phrase is used in other parts of Scripture, to signify a hard and obdurate heart: "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard." Prov. 21: 13. It is used in the same sense of the righteous, by the prophet: "That stoppeth his ears from the hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil." Isaiah 33: 15. He remains as unmoved by the cruel and sanguinary counsels of the wicked, as if he had stopped his ears.—Calmet; Harris; Abbot.

ADDINGTON, (ISAAC;) secretary of Massachusetts, was born in 1645, and died in Boston in 1715, aged 70. He sustained a high character (says president Allen) for talents, learning, integrity, and diligence in the public service. He was secretary more than twenty years, and for many years a magistrate and member of council elected by the people. He was also useful as a physician and surgeon. Mr. Addington was a Christian, and adorned his profession by singular meekness, humility, and disinterested kindness. In his family he was a daily worshipper of God. Religion shed its peace on his heart as he went down to the dead.—Allen's Biog. Diet.

ADDISON, (JOSEPH;) so highly celebrated in English literature, was the son of Dr. Launcelot Addison, dean of Litchfield. He was born May 1, 1672, at his father's rectory, Milston, Wilts. After receiving the rudiments of his education at home, at Salisbury, and at Litchfield, he was removed to the Charter House, then under the direction of Dr. Ellis, where he contracted his first intimacy with Mr.

afterwards Sir Richard Steele. At the age of fifteen, he was entered of Queen's college, Oxford, where he soon became distinguished for the ardor with which he cultivated classical literature, and for his skill in Latin poetry. He early began to distinguish himself as an author; and in 1695, he addressed a complimentary poem on one of the campaigns of king William to the lord keeper Somers, who procured him a pension from the crown of 300l. per annum, to enable him to travel. In 1701, he wrote his epistolary poem from Italy, addressed to lord Halifax, which is esteemed by many, the most finished and elegant of his poetical productions. On his return home, he published his travels, which he dedicated to lord Somers. The death of king William deprived Mr. Addison of the benefit of a small appointment, as a confidential resident about the person of prince Eugene, then commanding the armies of the emperor of Germany in Italy, and also of his pension: so that on his return to England he found all his patrons displaced, and himself in a state approaching to indigence. This depression, however, was happily not lasting: for lord Godolphin, applying to lord Halifax, to recommend him a poet capable of celebrating the recent splendid victory of the duke of Marlborough at Blenheim, the latter named Mr. Addison, who produced his celebrated poem, "The Campaign," for which he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of appeals, in which he succeeded Mr. Locke. In 1705, he attended lord Halifax in his mission to Hanover; and, in the year following, was made under secretary of state. These employments, however, did not engross him from the pursuits of literature. He assisted Steele in the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, in the course of which appeared the series of papers afterwards collected, and subsequently often reprinted, under the title of "Addison's Evidences of the Christian Religion." In his latter years he projected a paraphrased version of the Psalms of David, of which he gave a beautiful specimen in his metrical translation of Psalm 23.—"The Lord my portion shall prepare," &c. But a long and painful illness prevented the completion of this pious design: and it is the more to be regretted, as the few compositions of this kind which he has left us exhibit proofs of his piety, and his competency for the undertaking. Mr. Addison died at Holland House, Kensington, on the 17th of June, 1719, in the forty-ninth year of his age. His complaint appears to have been that of asthma, aggravated by dropsy. During his lingering decay, he sent for a young nobleman of very irregular life and of loose opinions, to attend him; and when the latter, with great tenderness, requested to receive his last injunctions, Mr. Addison told him, "I have sent for you that you may see how a Christian can die." What effect this impressive scene had upon the young nobleman's behavior is not known; but he himself died in a short time.—Janes's Rel. Biog.; Biog. Brit.

ADESSENARIANS; a branch of the Sacramentarians; so called from the Latin Adesse, to be present, because they believed the presence of Christ's body in the Eucharist, though in a manner different from the Romanists.

ADIAPHORISTS; a name given in the sixteenth century to the moderate Lutherans who adhered to the sentiments of Melancthon; and afterwards to those who subscribed the interim of Charles V. [SEE INTERIM.] The word is of Greek origin (adiaphoros) and signifies indifference or lukewarmness.

ADJURE; to bind by oath, as under the penalty of a fearful curse. Josh. 6: 26. Mark 5: 7.—2. To charge solemnly, as by the authority, and under pain of the displeasure of God. Matt. 26: 63. Acts 19: 13. St. Paul uses this word in 1 Thess. 5: 27. I adjure you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren. What an idea does this solemn adjuration give us of the importance of the knowledge of the Scriptures! See OATH; SWEARING.

ADMAH; the most easterly of the five cities of the plain, destroyed by fire from heaven, and afterwards overwhelmed by the waters of the Dead Sea. Gen. 19: 24. There is some probability that Admah was not entirely sunk under the waters; or, more probably, the inhabitants of the country built a city of the same name on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, for Isaiah, 15. according to the Seventy, says, "God will destroy the Moabites, the city of Ar, and the remnant of Adama." Gen. 14: 2. Deut. 29: 23. To be made as Admah, and set as Zeboim, Hos. 11: 8. is to be made a distinguished monument of the fearful vengeance of God.—Calmet.

ADMINISTER; to manage and give out as stewards. 2 Cor. 8: 19.

ADMINISTRATION; a public office and the execution thereof. 1 Cor. 12: 5.

ADMIRATION; is that passion of the mind which is excited by the discovery of any great excellence in an object. It has, by some writers, been used as synonymous with surprise and wonder; but it is evident they are not the same. Surprise refers to something unexpected; wonder, to something great or strange; but admiration includes the idea of a high esteem or respect. Thus we say, we admire a man's excellencies; but we do not say that we are surprised at them. We wonder at an extraordinary object or event, but we do not always admire it.—Buck.

ADMONITION; instruction, warning, reproof. 1 Thess. 5: 14. The admonition of the Lord, is warning, instruction, and reproof, given in the Lord's name, from his word, in a way becoming his perfections, and intended for his honor. Eph. 6: 4. Heretics are to be rejected or cast out of the church, after a first and second admonition, that is, solemn warning and reproof. Tit. 3: 10. Admonition was a part of the discipline much used in the ancient church: it was the first act or step towards the recovery or expulsion of delinquents. In case of private offences, it was performed according to the evangelical rule, privately; in case of public offence, openly before the church. If either of these sufficed for the recovery of the fallen person, all farther proceedings in a way of censure, ceased; if they did not, recourse was then had to excommunication. Tit. 3: 10. 1 Thess. 5: 14. Eph. 3: 4. Matt. 3: 18.—Buck; Brown.

ADONAI; one of the names of the Supreme Being in the Scriptures. The proper meaning of the word is "my Lords" in the plural number; as Adoni is my Lord, in the singular. The Jews, who, either out of respect or superstition, do not pronounce the name of Jehovah, read Adonai in the room of it, as often as they meet with Jehovah in the Hebrew text. But the ancient Jews were not so scrupulous; nor is there any law which forbids them to pronounce the name of God.—Buck.

ADONIBEZEK; a powerful and cruel king of the city Bezek, seventeen miles east from Napolis. Judg. 1: 7. Cruelties similar to those recorded of Adonibezeck are by no means uncommon in the wars of the East. Undoubtedly war is shocking at all times, but it cannot be denied that the influence of Christianity has abated its horrors. To see its true picture, it should be examined in the East; and there as practised by Mussulmen heroes.—Calmet.

ADONIJAH; the fourth son of David and Haggith. His history is found 1 Kings, chap. 1: 2.

ADONIS; the text of the Vulgate in Ezek. 8: 14. says, that the prophet saw women sitting in the temple, and weeping for Adonis; but according to the reading of the Hebrew text, they are said to weep for Tammuz, the hidden one.

Fabulous history gives the following account of Adonis: he was a beautiful young shepherd, the son of Cynras, king of Cyprus, by his own daughter Myrrha. The goddess Venus fell in love with this youth, and frequently met him on mount Libanus. Mars, who envied this rival, transformed himself into a wild boar, and as Adonis was hunting, struck him in the groin and killed him. Venus lamented the death of Adonis in an inconsolable manner. The eastern people, in imitation of her mourning, generally established some solemn days for the bewailing of Adonis. After his death Venus went to the shades, and obtained from Proserpina, that Adonis might be with her six months in the year, and continue the other six in the infernal regions. Upon this were founded those public rejoicings, which succeeded the lamentations of his death. Some say that Adonis was a native of Syria; some, of Cyprus; and others, of Egypt.

Among the Egyptians Adonis was adored under the name of Osiris, the husband of Isis. But he was sometimes called by the name of Ammuz, or Tammuz, the concealed, probably to denote his death or burial. The Hebrews, in derision, sometimes call him the dead, Psalm 106: 28. Lev. 19: 28. because they wept for him, and represented him as dead in his coffin; and at other times they denominate him the image of jealousy, Ezek. 8: 3, 5. because he was the object of the jealousy of Mars. The Syrians, Phœnicians, and Cyprians, called him Adonis; and Calmet is of opinion that the Ammonites and Moabites designated him by the name of Baal-peor.

The manner in which they celebrated the festival of this false deity was as follows: they represented him as lying dead in his coffin, wept for him, bemoaned themselves, and sought for him with great eagerness and inquietude. After this they pretended that they had found him again, and that he was still living. At this good news they exhibited marks of the most extravagant joy, and were guilty of a thousand bad practices, to convince Venus how much they congratulated her on the return and revival of her favorite, as they had before condoled with her on his death. The Hebrew women, of whom the prophet Ezekiel speaks, celebrated the feasts of Tammuz, or Adonis in Jerusalem; and God showed the prophet the women weeping for this infamous god, even in his temple.—Calmet; Watson.

ADONISTS; a party among divines and critics, who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah, are not the natural points belonging to that word, nor express the true pronunciation of it; but are the vowel points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim, applied to the consonants of the ineffable name Jehovah, to warn the readers, that instead of the word Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to pronounce, and the true pronunciation of which had long been unknown to them, they are always to read Adonai. They are opposed to Jehovists, of whom the principal are Drusius, Capellus, Buxtorf, Altling, and Reland.—Buck.

ADONIZEDEK; king of Zedek or Jerusalem; for this city is believed to have been called by four different names, Salem, Jerusalem, Jebus, and Zedek. For his history, see Josh. 10. A. M. 2554.

ADOPTION. The nature of adoption may be explained in the following manner. A child is, in this act, taken by a man from a family not his own; introduced into his own family; regarded as his own child, and entitled to all the privileges and blessings belonging to the relation. To adopt children in this manner has, it is well known, been a custom generally prevailing in all nations. Thus children were adopted among the Egyptians, Jews, Romans, and other ancient nations; and the same custom exists in the Christian nations of Europe, in our own country, among the American aborigines, and, so far as my knowledge extends, throughout the world. Of the same general nature is that transaction in the divine economy, by which mankind become the children of God. It is easy to conceive the propriety of the term as used by the apostle in reference to this act, though it must be confessed there is some difference between civil and spiritual adoption. Civil adoption was allowed of and provided for the relief and comfort of those who had no children; but in spiritual adoption this reason does not appear. The Almighty was under no obligation to do this; for he had innumerable spirits whom he had created, besides his own Son, who had all the perfections of the divine nature, who was the object of his delight, and who is styled the heir of all things. Heb. 1: 3. When men adopt, it is on account of some excellency in the persons who are adopted; thus Pharaoh's daughter adopted Moses because she was exceeding fair, Acts 7: 20, 21; and Mordecai adopted Esther because she was his uncle's daughter, and exceeding fair, Est. 2: 7; but man has nothing in him that merits this divine act, Ezek. 16: 5. In civil adoption, though the name of a son be given, the nature of a son may not: this relation may not necessarily be attended with any change of disposition or temper. But in spiritual adoption we are made partakers of the divine nature, and a temper or disposition given us becoming the relationship we bear, Jer. 3: 19.

Much has been said as to the time of adoption. Some place it before regeneration, because it is supposed that we must be in the family before we can be partakers of the blessings of it. But it is difficult to conceive of one before the other; for although adoption may seem to precede regeneration in order of nature, yet not of time; they may be distinguished, but cannot be separated. "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." John 1: 12. There is no adoption, says the great Charnock, without regeneration. "Adoption," says the same author, "is not a mere relation; the privilege and the image of the sons of God go together. A state of adoption is never without a separation from defilement." 2 Cor. 6: 17, 18. The new name in adoption is never given till the new creature be formed. "As many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Rom. 8: 14. Yet these are to be distinguished. Regeneration, as a physical act, gives us a likeness to God in our nature; adoption, as a legal act, gives us a right to an inheritance. Regeneration makes us formally his sons, by conveying a principle, 1 Pet. 1: 23; adoption makes us relatively his sons, by conveying a power, John 1: 12. By the one we are instated in the divine affection; by the other we are partakers of the divine nature."

The privileges of adoption are every way great and extensive. 1. It implies great honor. They have God's name put upon them, and are described as "his people, called by his name." 2 Chron. 7: 24. Eph. 3: 15. They are no longer slaves to sin and the world; but, emancipated from its dreadful bondage, are raised to dignity and honor. Gal. 4: 7. 1 John 3: 1. 2.—2. Inexhaustible provision and riches. They inherit all things. Rev. 21: 7. All the blessings of a temporal kind that are for their good shall be given them. Psalm 84: 11. All the blessings of grace are treasured up in Jesus Christ for them. Eph. 1: 3. All the blessings of glory shall be enjoyed by them. Col. 1: 27. "All things are yours," says the apostle, "whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present or things to come, all are yours." 1 Cor. 3: 22.—3. Divine protection. "In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence, and his children shall have a place of refuge." Prov. 14: 26. As the master of a family is engaged to defend and secure all under his roof, and committed to his care, so Jesus Christ is engaged to protect and defend his people. "They shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings and quiet resting places." Isa. 32: 18. Heb. 1: 14.—4. Unspeakable felicity. They enjoy the most intimate communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. They have access to his throne at all times, and under all circumstances. They see divine wisdom regulating every affair, and rendering every thing subservient to their good. Heb. 12: 6—11. The laws, the liberties, the privileges, the relations, the provisions, and the security of this family, are all sources of happiness; but especially the presence, the approbation, and the goodness of God, as the governor thereof, afford joy unspeakable and full of glory. 1 Pet. 1: 8. Prov. 3: 17. Heb. 4: 16.—5. Eternal glory. In some cases, civil adoption might be made null and void, as among the Romans, when against the right of the pontifex, and without the decree of the college; but spiritual adoption, as it is divine as to its origin, so it is perpetual as to its duration. "The Son abideth in the house for ever." John 8: 35. "The inheritance of the saints is incorruptible, undefiled, and never fadeth away." 1 Pet. 1: 4. "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." 1 John 3: 2. In the present state we are as children at school; but in heaven we shall be as children at home, where we shall always behold the face of our heavenly Father, for ever celebrating his praises, admiring his perfections, and enjoying his presence. "So shall we be ever with the Lord." 1 Thess. 4: 17.

The evidences of adoption are, 1. Renunciation of all former dependencies. When a child is adopted, he relinquishes the object of his past confidence, and submits himself to the will and pleasure of the adopter; so they who are brought into the family of God will evidence it by giving up every other object, so far as it interferes with the will and glory of their heavenly Father. "Ephraim shall say, what have I to do any more with idols?" Hos. 14: 8. "Other lords have had dominion over us; but by thee only will we make mention of thy name." Isa. 26: 13. Matt. 13: 45, 46. Phil. 3: 8.—2. Affection. This may not always apply to civil adoption, but it always does to spiritual. The children of God feel a regard for him above every other object. His own excellency, his unspeakable goodness to them, his promises of future blessings, are all grounds of the strongest love. "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee." Psalm 73: 25. "Thou art my portion, saith my soul, therefore will I hope in thee." Lam. 3: 24. Luke 7: 47. Psalm 18: 1.—3. Access to God with a holy boldness. They who are children by adoption are supposed to have the same liberty of access as those who are children by nature; so those who are partakers of the blessings of spiritual adoption will prove it by a reverential, yet familiar address to the Father of spirits: they will confess their unworthiness, acknowledge their dependence, and implore the mercy and favor of God. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying Abba, Father." Gal. 4: 6. "Through Jesus Christ we have access by one Spirit unto the Father." Eph. 2: 18. Having such a privilege, "they come boldly to the throne of grace, that they may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need." Heb. 4: 6.—4. Obedience. Those who are adopted into a family must obey the laws of that family; so believers prove themselves adopted, by their obedience to the word and ordinances of God. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." John 15: 14. "Whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also to walk even as he walked." 1 John 2: 1, 5.—5. Patient yet joyful expectation of the inheritance. In civil adoption, indeed, an inheritance is not always certain; but in spiritual adoption it is. "To them, who, by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life." Rom. 2: 7. "We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." 2 Cor. 4: 18. Rom. 6: 23. Heb. 11: 26, 27. From the consideration of the whole of this doctrine, we may learn that adoption is an act of free grace through Jesus Christ. Eph. 1: 5. Applied to believers by the Holy Spirit. Gal. 4: 6. Rom. 8: 15, 16. A blessing of the greatest importance. 1 John 3: 1. and lay us under an inviolable obligation of submission, Heb. 12: 9. imitation, Eph. 5: 1. and dependence, Matt. 6: 32. ADOPTIONISTS, or Adoptiani; the followers of Felix and Elipardas, two bishops, in Spain, who, towards the close of the eighth century, are said to have maintained that Jesus Christ, in his human nature, was not the natural, but adopted Son of God. This notion, which seems to contradict Luke 1: 35. and to lean to Unitarianism, was immediately condemned as heresy.—Buck, Belp's, Wanderings of the Intellect.

ADORAM; the officer, who, under the government of David, was receiver-general of the tribute money. 2 Sam. 20: 24. A person of the same name is also mentioned as sustaining the same office under the reign of Rehoboam. 1 Kings 12: 18. When Rehoboam, by his imprudent conduct, had exasperated the ten tribes against him, and provoked them to separate from the house of David, he sent Adoram to exert his efforts in trying to appease them. It does not seem very certain whether his object was to reduce the people by gentle or by harsh methods; or whether he designed to make some concessions by putting Adoram into their hands, who, by his vexatious exactions, had probably been the principal cause of their dissatisfaction; but, however that may be, the people, who had been extremely irritated, fell upon Adoram and stoned him to death.

ADORATION; an act of worship, strictly due to God alone, but performed to other objects also, whether idols or men. The forms, times, objects, and places of adoration, are different in different countries, according to their prevailing religious customs. The origin of this practice is to be found in the universal and just opinion, that the sentiments of the heart ought to be expressed by articulate language and external actions. The term, being derived from the Latin ad and orare, signifies, to apply the hand to the mouth, i. e. to kiss the hand, and there is a very striking allusion to it in the book of Job, chap. 31: 26—28. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge, for I should have denied the God that is above." To understand the meaning of this passage, we must consider that, in the times of Job, it was the practice of the Persians to worship the sun and moon; and some learned writers understand those heavenly luminaries to be intended by the terms Adramelech and Anammelech, in 2 Kings 17: 31. the former referring to the sun and the latter to the moon; the first signifying "the magnificent king," and the second "the gentle king." As all idolatry consists in transferring that worship to the creature which is due only to the adorable Creator, so it was not merely prohibited by the Jewish law, but also made a capital offence to be punished with death. Deut. 13: 6—11. To this Job refers; and his argument is, that if at any time when he had been contemplating the two great lights of heaven, his heart had been enticed to transfer to them that adoration which was due to their great Creator, he should have been guilty of idolatry, have denied the God that is above, and would have deserved to be put to death as a criminal.

The following account of this mode of adoration in India, may serve as a further illustration. "At Surat is seen a great and fair tree, which is held in great veneration. On high there hangs a bell, which those that come to make their foolish devotions, first of all ring out, as if thereby to call the idol to hear them; then they fall to their adoration, which is commonly to extend both hands downwards, as much as possible, being joined together in a praying posture; which lifting up again, by little and little, they bring to their mouths as if to kiss them; and lastly, extend them so joined together, as high as they can over their heads, which gesticulation is used only to idols and sacred things. This ceremony being performed, some make their prayers standing; others prostrate themselves with their whole bodies grovelling on the earth, and then rise again; others only touch the ground with their head and forehead, and perform similar acts of humility."—De La Valle's Travels in India, p. 20.

In the east it is still considered as a mark of the highest respect, to take off the shoes, and approach barefooted to perform adorations. See Exod. 3: 5. and Josh. 5: 13. The Egyptians were particularly attentive to this practice; and the Mahometans observe it whenever they enter their mosques. When Mr. Wilkins wished to enter the inner hall of the college of Seekers at Patna, he was told that it was a place of worship, open to him and to all men; but that it was necessary for him to take off his shoes, (Asiatic Researches, vol. i. p. 289.) and Ives, in his Travels, p. 75, says, that "at the doors of an Indian Pagoda, are seen as many slippers and sandals as there are hats hanging up in our churches."

The Romans, when practising adoration, having their heads covered, applied their hand to their lips, with the forefinger resting on the thumb, which was erect, and thus bowing the head, turned themselves from left to right. Sometimes standing was the attitude of adoration; sometimes the body was inclined forward, and the eyes fixed on the ground; kneeling was also a common practice, and frequently complete prostration. Sitting with the under parts of the thighs resting on the heels, seems to have been customary among the Egyptians; almost all the figures of worshippers discovered in their sacred buildings being represented in this posture.

The Persians, when performing their acts of adoration, always turned their faces towards the sun, or to the east, and among them the practice of kissing the hand is said to have originated. It was at first done as a token of respect and submission to their monarchs and great men, and was easily and naturally transferred to idolatrous worship. Among them the homage paid to their kings was very extravagant. Cyrus introduced the custom, when adoring their prince, of bending the knee before him; falling on the face at his feet; striking the earth with the forehead; and even kissing the ground. The kings of Persia indeed, never admitted any one into their presence, gave audience, or conferred favors without exacting this ceremony; and the history of Haman and Mordecai, in the Book of Esther, shows that similar reverence was paid to the favorites of princes. The Roman emperors borrowed this extravagant and impious homage from the kings of Persia; and the popes from the emperors. The common practice among their abject flatterers, was to express their adoration by bowing or kneeling at their feet, laying hold of their purple robe, then presently withdrawing the hand and applying it to the lips; though this was an honor to which none were admitted but persons of rank and dignity. The usual mode of adoration consisted in falling on the ground and kissing the feet of the emperor. This humiliating reverence was exacted from all that entered the royal presence, from the princes invested with the diadem and purple, and from the ambassadors who represented their independent sovereigns. (Gibbon's Roman History, vol. x. p. 124.) Even in the present day, when any one pays his respects to the king of Sumatra, he first takes off his shoes and stockings, and leaves them at the door.

The Jewish forms of adoration were various: standing, bowing, kneeling, prostration, and kissing the hand. Hence in their language kissing is properly used for adoration. 1 Kings 19: 18. Hosea 13: 2. Job 31: 27. This illustrates that important passage in Psalm 2: 12. "Kiss the Son, (that is, pay him homage and worship.) lest he be angry and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little."

The first Christians generally kneeled down in private; but stood during public worship on the Lord's day. It was evidently the practice also, both among Jews and Christians, in offering up their prayers and supplications, to lift up their hands and spread them forth towards heaven. To this Isaiah alludes, chap. 1: 15. and Paul enjoins it upon Christians, 1 Tim. 2: 8. But whatever may be the external forms of worship, nothing can be plainer from the Scriptures than that God has peculiar respect to the state of the heart. Hence the complaint of old, "This people draw near unto me with their lips, while their hearts are far from me." "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me." "God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him."

If we examine the short notices which the Scriptures give us of the worship of the heavenly state, we may at least learn from them this important truth, that the holiest beings, though honored with a residence in the immediate presence of the blessed God, where they are permitted to surround his throne, and to contemplate his glories without a veil, are, at the same time, filled with the most profound adoration of his glorious Majesty. "I saw Jehovah sitting upon a throne," says the prophet, "high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple. Above it stood the seraphim: each one had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly. And one cried to another, and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory." Isa. 6: 1-3. "I beheld," says the writer of the Apocalypse, "and lo, a great multitude which no man could number of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands, and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." And all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the elders and the four living creatures, and fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God, saying, "Amen; Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. AMEN." Rev. 7: 9-12.—Watson; Jones.

ADORN; to deck, to make beautiful. 1 Tim. 2: 9. Holiness of heart and life is the appropriate adorning of Christian females. Much care, pains, and attention to the glass of God's word are necessary in attaining it; and it renders our nature and character truly amiable and glorious. 1 Pet. 3: 4, 5. 1 Tim. 4: 9, 10. By a holy conversation we adorn the doctrine of God; practically show to the world the purity, power, glory, and usefulness of his truths, laws, promises, threatenings. Tit. 2: 10. The church is adorned when her ordinances are pure and efficacious; her officers faithful and zealous; her members clothed with the imputed righteousness of Christ and his sanctifying grace. Isa. 61: 10. Rev. 21: 2.

ADRA. See ARAD.

ADRAMMELECH; mighty king, son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. This monarch returning to Nineveh, after the unhappy expedition which he had made into Judea under king Hezekiah, was put to death by his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezar, while worshipping in the temple of his god Nisroch. 2 Kings 19: 37. and Isa. 37: 38. It is not said what induced these princes to commit this parricide; but having accomplished it, they fled for safety to the mountains of Armenia, and their brother Esarhadon succeeded to the throne.

ADRAMMELECH was also the name of an idol worshipped by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, who settled in the country of Samaria, in the room of those Israelites who were carried beyond the Euphrates. 2 Kings 17: 31. See ANAMELECH.—Calmet.

ADRAMYTTIUM; a maritime town of Mysia, in Asia Minor, opposite the island of Lesbos. In a vessel belonging to this port, Paul embarked at Cæsarea, on his first voyage to Rome, intending, says the historian, "to sail by the coasts of Asia." The town was situated at the foot of Mount Ida, and was founded by a colony of Athenians. It had formerly a dock and harbor, and was noted for both its trade and shipping, but is now a wretched village, inhabited by only a few fishermen. It gave name to the Sinus Adramytticus, or bay of Adramyttium, which is an arm of the Ægean sea. Acts 27: 2.

ADRIA; the name given by Luke to the Adriatic sea, or, as it is now called, "the Gulf of Venice," in which Paul and his companions, in their voyage to Italy, were so severely driven up and down during fourteen days and nights. Acts 27: 27. It is an arm of the Mediterranean, about two hundred miles long, and fifty broad, stretching along the east of Italy, on one side, and the west of Dalmatia, Scclavonia, and Turkey, on the other. The dominion of it now belongs to the Venetians; and the sea extends from south-east to north-west, between twelve and nineteen degrees of east longitude, and between forty and forty-five of north latitude.—Jones.

ADRIEL; the son of Barzillai, married Merab, the daughter of Saul, who had previously been promised to David. 1 Sam. 18: 19. Adriel had five sons by her, who were delivered up to the Gibeonites to be put to death before the Lord, in revenge for the cruelty which their grandfather Saul had exercised against the Gibeonites. It would seem from 2 Sam. 21: 8. that Michal, "who had no child to the day of her death," ch. 4: 23. had adopted the five sons of her sister Merab, whom she is said to have "brought up for Adriel, the son of Barzillai, the Meholathite."—Jones.

ADULLAM; a city belonging to the tribe of Judah, situated in the southern territories of this tribe. Josh. 15: 35. It is said to have been a beautiful city, and surmounded the glory of Israel. Micah 1: 15. Rehoboam strengthened it with fortifications. 2 Chron. 11: 7, 8. Eusebius says, that it was a large town in his time, and describes it as being situated ten miles eastward of Eleutheropolis. It was a royal city in the days of Joshua, who put the king of it to death. Josh. 12: 15. It was in a cave near to this city that David concealed himself from the rage of Saul: "and when his brethren and all his father's house, heard that he had escaped to the cave of Adullam, they went down thither to him." 1 Sam. 22: 1.—Jones.

ADULTERY; a violation of conjugal faith, by criminal intercourse with any person, whether married or single. When God at the beginning, to complete the work of his creation, had, as it were, put the finishing touch to the whole by the formation of Adam, to perfect his happiness, and that nothing might be wanting to consummate his bliss, we are told that Jehovah said, "It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him an helpmeet for him." In consequence of this, Eve was created, and when the Lord brought her unto him, Adam said, "This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; therefore, shall a man leave his father and his mother, and cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh." Gen. 2: 16-24. These words lead us to the original institution of marriage, and show it to have been of divine appointment, intended for the happiness of the human race. It may also be remarked that the sameness of proportion between the numbers of each sex, which has obtained in every age of the world, while it furnishes a convincing argument against the practice of polygamy, carries with it a strong intimation, independent of the positive testimony of revelation, that a promiscuous intercourse between the sexes is both unnatural, and contrary to the will of God. Accordingly we find the practice of adultery condemned in the divine word, in the most pointed manner. It is one of the ten precepts of the law which the Most High gave to the children of Israel at Mount Sinai. "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" and the crime, when it took place with a married woman, was punished with the death of both the parties that were detected in the commission of it. Lev. 20: 10. In the New Testament writings, adultery is always ranked among the works of flesh, or of corrupt nature; and while "marriage" is expressly said to be "honorable in all, and the marriage-bed undefiled," it is added, "whoremongers and adulterers God will judge," that is, he will condemn them in the judgment. Heb. 13: 4. Hence it is enumerated among those vices, which, if persevered in, will exclude from the kingdom of heaven. Gal. 6: 19-21. Eph. 5: 3-6. Col. 3: 5, 6. The heinousness of the sin consists not only in its being contrary to the divine law, but also in its counteracting the will of God in the institution of marriage and fraught with the most baneful consequences to our neighbor. "To avoid fornication, therefore, let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband." It is an alarming view which Christ gives us with regard to the extent of the divine law in reference to this sin, when he describes it as comprehending every species of unchastity, and even the very emotions of the heart: "Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." Matt. 5: 28. and ch. 15: 19.

ADULTERY is frequently charged upon the Israelites in their national capacity; and is then to be considered as used figuratively by the prophets. Isaiah terms them—"the seed of the adulterer and the whore." Ch. 57: 3. Jeremiah complains of them, that "they were all adulterers." 9 : 2. Hosea uses similar language, chap. 7 : 4. and Christ repeatedly calls them, "an adulterous generation." Matt. 12 : 39. and 16 : 4. Mark 8 : 38. To perceive the import of this, we must take into consideration that, as a nation, they had entered into covenant with God; that those covenant engagements are alluded to under the metaphor of a marriage contract; and hence their violation of the covenant is charged home upon them as the sin of adultery. Thus Isaiah speaks of the Jewish church, of which all the natural descendants of Abraham were members, as "the married wife." Isaiah 54 : 1. And Jeremiah exhorting them to repentance, says, "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you." Ch. 3 : 14. Hence their backslidings from the worship of the true God, and reverting to idolatry, to which they were remarkably prone about the period of the Babylonish captivity, is rebuked by the prophets under the strong figurative expressions of adultery and whoredom. "Through the lightness of her whoredom she defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and stocks." Jer. 3 : 9. Thus, also, the prophet Ezekiel reproaches them—"Thou hast forgotten me, saith the Lord God, and cast me behind thy back; therefore, bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms."—"They have committed adultery,—with their idols have they committed adultery." Ch. 23 : 35—37. Hence God compares himself to a husband jealous of his honor; and their adoption of vile opinions and practices is in his eye the worst kind of prostitution. It is, says Calmet, an argument ad hominem, not merely to the Jews, but to human nature at large, against the flagitious wickedness of forsaking God for the sake of any other object which would rival him in our affections. 2 James 3 : 4. 1 Cor. 10 : 21, 22. It is necessary to keep in view these principles, in order to enter properly into the meaning of the prophetic writings. See further on this subject under the article MARRIAGE.

One of the most singular institutions that is to be found in all the Mosaic economy, is the law which was given to the Hebrews for the trial of a wife whose husband was jealous of her having an adulterous connection with another man. It is contained in Numbers 5 : 11—31. to which the reader must be referred for the particulars. It consisted in obliging the suspected wife, either to make a public avowal of her guilt before the whole Sanhedrim and assembled congregation, in which case she was reprimanded and might go where she pleased; or if she persisted in affirming her innocence, compelling her to drink waters which were rendered metaphorically bitter by the infusion of the divine curse on adultery; which waters, by divine interposition, had the extraordinary effect of greatly improving her health, beauty, and fruitfulness in case of her innocence, while, on the contrary, if guilty, she immediately grew pale, her eyes started out of her head, her thighs putrified, and she immediately died under the most shocking circumstances that are conceivable! This was called—"The Law of Jealousies," ver. 29. and hereby Jehovah strikingly manifested that he was privy to their most secret sins,—that he was the preserver of conjugal faith and chastity, as well as the protector of innocence.

On this law of Moses, Michaelis has the following remarks:—"This oath was, perhaps, a relic of some more severe and barbarous consuetudinary laws, whose rigor Moses mitigated; as he did in many other cases, when an established usage could not be conveniently abolished altogether. Among ourselves, in barbarous times, the ordeal, or trial by fire, was, notwithstanding the purity of our married people, in common use; and this, in point of equity, was much the same in effect, as if the husband had had the right to insist on his wife submitting to the hazardous trial of her purity, by drinking a poisoned potion; which, according to an ancient superstition, could never hurt her if she was innocent. And, in fact, such right is not altogether unexampled; for, according to Oldendorp's History of the Mission of the Evangelical Brethren, in the Caribbee Islands, it is actually in use among some of the savage nations in the interior parts of West Africa.

"Now, when in place of a poisoned potion like this, which very few husbands can be very willing to have administered to their wives, we see, as among the Hebrews, an imprecation-drink, whose avenger God himself promises to become, we cannot but be struck with the contrast of wisdom and clemency which such a contrivance manifests. In the one case, (and herein consists their great distinction,) innocence can only be preserved by a miracle; while on the other, guilt only is revealed and punished by the hand of God himself.

"By one of the clauses of the oath of purgation, (and had not the legislator been perfectly assured of his divine mission, the insertion of any such clause would have been a very bold step indeed,) a visible and corporal punishment was specified, which the person swearing imprecated on herself, and which God himself was understood as engaging to execute. To have given so accurate a definition of the punishment God meant to inflict, and still more, one that consisted of such a sore disease, would have been a step of incomprehensible boldness in a legislator who pretended to have a divine mission, if he was not, with the most assured conviction, conscious of its reality.

"Seldom, however, very seldom, was it likely that Providence would have an opportunity of inflicting the punishment in question. For the oath was so regulated, that a woman of the utmost effrontery could scarcely have taken it without changing color to such a degree as to betray herself.

"In the first place, it was not administered to the woman in her own house, but she was under the necessity of going to that place of the land where God in a special manner had his abode, and take it there. Now, the solemnity of the place, unfamiliarized to her by daily business or resort, would have a great effect upon her mind. In the next place, there was offered unto God what was termed an execration-offering, not in order to propitiate his mercy, but to invoke his vengeance on the guilty. Here the process was extremely slow, which gave her more time for reflection than to a guilty person could be acceptable, and that, too, amidst a multitude of unusual ceremonies. For the priest conducted her to the front of the sanctuary, and took holy water, that is, water out of the priest's laver, which stood before it, together with some earth off its floor, which was likewise deemed holy; and having put the earth in the water, he then proceeded to uncover the woman's head, that her face might be seen, and every change in her countenance during the administration of the oath accurately observed: and this was a circumstance which, in the east, where the women are always veiled, must have had a great effect; because a woman accustomed to wear a veil, could on so extraordinary an occasion, have had far less command of her eyes and her countenance than an European adulteress, who is generally a perfect mistress in all the arts of dissimulation, would display. To render the scene still more awful, the tresses of her hair were loosened, and then the execration-offering was put into her hand, while the priest held in his bitter water; but we must not understand this, as if the water had really been bitter; for how could it have been so? The earth of the floor of the tabernacle could not make it bitter. Among the Hebrews and other oriental nations, the word bitter was rather used for curse: and, strictly speaking, the phrase does not mean bitter water, but the water of bitterness, that is of curse. The priest now pronounced the oath, which was in all points so framed that it could excite no terrors in the breast of an innocent woman; for it expressly consisted in this, that the imprecation-water could not harm her if she was innocent. It would seem as if the priest here made a stop, and again left the woman some time to consider whether she would proceed with the oath. This I infer from the circumstance of his speech not being directly continued in verse 21, which is rather the repetition of what goes before; and from the detail proceeding anew in the words of the historian, Then shall the priest pronounce the rest of the oath and the curses to the woman; and proceed thus.—After this stop he pronounced the curses, and the woman was obliged to declare her acquiescence in them by a repeated Amen. Nor was the solemn scene yet altogether at an end; but rather, as it were, commenced anew. For the priest had yet to write the curses in a book, which I suppose he did at great deliberation; and having done so, he washed them out again in the very imprecation-water, which the woman had now to drink; and this water being now presented to her, she was obliged to drink it, with this warning and assurance, in the name of God, that if she was guilty, it would prove within her an absolute curse. Now, what must have been her feelings, while drinking, if not conscious of purity. In my opinion she must have conceived that she already felt an alteration in the state of her body, and the germ, as it were, of the disease springing up within her. Conscience and imagination would conspire together, and render it almost impossible for her to drink it out. Finally, the execration-offering was taken out of her hand, and burnt upon the altar. I cannot but think that, under the sanction of such a purgatorium, perjury must have been a very rare occurrence indeed. If it happened but once in an age, God had bound himself to punish it; and if this took place but once, (if but one woman who had taken the oath was attacked with that sore disease which it threatened,) it was quite enough to serve as a deterrent to all others for at least one generation."

This procedure had also the effect of keeping in mind, among the Jews, God's high displeasure against this violation of his law; and though some lax moralists have been found, in modern times, to palliate it, yet the Christian will always remember the solemn denunciations of the New Testament against a crime so aggravated, whether considered in its effects upon the domestic relations, upon the moral character of the guilty parties, or upon society at large.—Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge.—Heb. 13: 14.

It is evident, observes Paley, that, on the part of the man who solicits the chastity of a married woman, it certainly includes the crime of seduction, and is attended with mischief still more extensive and complicated: it creates a new sufferer, the injured husband, upon whose affection is inflicted a wound the most painful and incurable that human nature knows. The infidelity of the woman is aggravated by cruelty to her children, who are generally involved in their parents' shame, and always made unhappy by their quarrel. The marriage vow is witnessed before God, and accompanied with circumstances of solemnity and religion, which approach to the nature of an oath. The married offender, therefore, incurs a crime little short of perjury, and the seduction of a married woman is little less than the subornation of perjury. But the strongest apology for adultery is, the prior transgression of the other party; and so far, indeed, as the bad effects of adultery are anticipated by the conduct of the husband or wife who offends first, the guilt of the second offender is extenuated. But this can never amount to a justification, unless it could be shown that the obligation of the marriage vow depends upon the condition of reciprocal fidelity; a construction which appears founded neither in expediency, nor in the terms of the vow, nor in the design of the legislature, which prescribed the marriage rite. To consider the offence upon the footing of provocation, therefore, can by no means vindicate retaliation. "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" it must be ever remembered, was an interdiction delivered by God himself. This crime has been punished in almost all ages and nations. By the Jewish law it was punished with death in both parties, where either the woman was married, or both. Among the Egyptians, adultery in the man was punished by a thousand lashes with rods, and in the woman by the loss of her nose. The Greeks put out the eyes of the adulterers. Among the Romans, it was punished by banishment, cutting off the ears, noses, and by sewing the adulterers in sacks, and throwing them into the sea, scourging, burning, &c. In Spain and Poland they were almost as severe. The Saxons formerly burnt the adulteress, and over her ashes erected a gibbet, whereon the adulterer was hanged. King Edmund, in his kingdom, ordered adultery to be punished in the same manner as homicide. Canute ordered the man to be banished, and the woman to have her nose and ears cut off. Modern punishments, in different nations, do not seem to be so severe. In Britain it is reckoned a spiritual offence, and is cognizable by the spiritual courts, where it is punishable by fine and penance.—See Valey's Morau and Political Philosophy.

In John 8: 3. we read that the Jews having surprised a woman in adultery, brought her to our Savior, and asked him what they should do with her: Moses having ordered women guilty of this crime to be stoned. This they said, tempting him, to find accusation against him. From our Lord's manner of treating their application, and its results, Calmet and others have supposed that the woman's accusers were themselves guilty of the crime which they alleged against her; and as it was not just to receive the accusations of those who are guilty of the evil of which they accuse others, our Lord dismissed them with the most obvious propriety. But, as Mr. Taylor suggests, it seems enough to suppose, that the consciences of these witnesses accused them of such crimes as restrained their hands from punishing the adulteress, who, perhaps, was guilty, in this instance, of a less enormous sin than they were conscious of, though of another kind. He also suggests that their malevolent design to entrap our Lord, was appealed to by him, and was no slight cause of their confusion, if they wished to found a charge which might affect his life. Their intended murder was worse than the woman's adultery; especially if, as there is room to believe, the woman had suffered some violence. But the whole transaction may be viewed in another light. The law was, that both the culprits should be brought before the council, where, if condemned, the whole audience, council included, were to stone them. By bringing this woman only to Jesus, the Jews were guilty, 1. of partiality, as they ought to have brought the adulterer also; 2. they desired Jesus to take on himself the office of the council, which would have been assuming political power, and would have endangered his life. This plot he retorts on themselves, by saying, "Do you, on your own proposals, assume that conduct which you well know the council would pursue in such a case; consider the prisoner as ipso facto condemned by the circumstances in which she was apprehended, therefore do you cast stones at her, as the council would cast stones at a person so condemned." This they declined, being aware of its tendency, and shrunk from that action to which they had urged Jesus. To this his words seem more particularly to allude, "Let him who is without sin, not moral guilt merely, but political offence—he who can be innocent in assuming that power of life and death, which is legally lodged elsewhere, let him act the judge, and stone her." And so, speaking to the woman, "has nobody officially condemned thee—executed the condemnation of the law on thee, by stoning thee?—Neither do I officially condemn thee;—I do not execute condemnation on thee by stoning thee: Remember the narrow escape thou hast now experienced: Go and sin no more."

The genuineness of this narrative has been much disputed, in consequence of its having been omitted in many ancient MSS., and being much varied in its position, in others. The arguments in its favor, however, are generally admitted to preponderate. It is found in the greater part of the MSS. extant, of all the recensions or families; and Tatian and Ammonius (A. D. 172, and 220) inserted it in their harmonies. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions, (lib. 2. cap. 24.) and the Synopsis ascribed to Athanasius, have it. Jerome, Justin, Ambrose, and the Latin fathers received it, though they were not unacquainted with the differences among the Greek copies. Justin conjectures, that some Christian of weak judgment expunged it, lest our Savior should be thought to authorize the crime of adultery, by forgiving it so easily. Many Syriac manuscripts, of good antiquity, read it; and it is found in all printed copies, Greek and Latin. Griesbach prints the passage between [ ] as dubious; yet on the whole admits it.

But admitting its truth, there is scarcely any of the Savior's miracles that sets forth in a more striking manner his divine authority over the consciences of men, in flashing conviction upon their guilty minds, and compelling them to speak out to their own confusion. And, in this view, it may serve to show us what will be the real state of things in the great day of awful retribution, when the books shall be opened and every man's sins set in array against him.—Calmet; Watson; Jones.

ADUMMIM; a city and mountain near Jericho, and in the lot of the tribe of Benjamin. It was situated in the way from Jerusalem to Jericho, and is said to have been greatly infested with robbers. Hence, Christ is supposed to have taken it for the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan, who so humanely relieved the man that fell among thieves.

ADVANTAGE; 1. Profit, gain. Job 35 : 3.—2. A fair opportunity to excel, or prevail over another; a privilege, or pre-eminence of privileges, in a good sense. Rom. 3 : 1.—3. Actual prevalence or superiority, in a bad sense. 2 Cor. 2 : 11.

ADVERSARY; (in the Hebrew Satan, in the Greek Antidikos), one who carries on a controversy with another under the color of justice; and usually with the forms and processes of law. Luke 18 : 3. Matt. 5 : 25. The use of the term both in the Old and New Testament shows that it differs from enemy in this, that it imports (whether truly or not) a claim of right to oppose. Hence the appellation is with equal propriety given, as we have seen, to men, 1 Sam. 29 : 4—to God, Exod. 23 : 22—to a good angel, Num. 22 : 22—and to the evil spirit, Job 1 : 6. It is more commonly used absolutely for the latter, "that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan." Rev. 20 : 2. Ps. 109 : 6. Zech. 3 : 1. 1 Pet. 5 : 8. From an ADVERSARY so powerful, sagacious, experienced, artful, indefatigable, and withal so malicious; from an ADVERSARY equally skilled in the wiles which lead to presumption, and that afterwards plunge into despair; from an ADVERSARY who assaulted even the Son of God himself; what have we not to fear! Especially when we consider that, although not himself omnipresent, yet his servants, emissaries, and agents are at all times, on every side of us; acting in his name, upon his schemes, and in the same spirit as himself. Matt. 25 : 41. 2 Cor. 11 : 13—15. 2 : 11. Ephes. 6 : 10—16. Faith in the crucified Savior is the only impregnable shield against his assaults. Whom resist, says the apostle, steadfast in the faith; knowing that the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world. But the God of all grace who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect, establish, strengthen, settle you. To him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen. 1 Pet. 5 : 8—11.

ADVERSITY; the opposite of prosperity. Ecc. 7 : 14. It is that state in which the train of providential circumstances is contrary to our wishes. Gen. 42 : 36. The duties of this trying state are Fortitude. Prov. 24 : 10. Consideration. Ec. 7 : 14. Devout acknowledgment. Prov. 3 : 6. Prayer. James 5 : 13. Submission. 1 Sam. 3 : 18. Faith in the promises, perfections, and providential government of God. Rom. 8 : 28.—See AFFLICTION.

ADVOCATE; (parakletos, a patron), one who pleads the cause of another. It is a title appropriated to our Lord Jesus Christ, as the exclusive Mediator between God and man. It designates one important branch of his high priestly office—a branch most essential to our daily comfort, as well as to our peace with God. As a deep impression of the divine majesty and purity, (1 John 1 : 5—10.) is essential to guard us against sin; so, under the awful consciousness of having sinned against that purity and majesty, and all the affecting manifestations of infinite love in the Gospel, nothing short of a lively recollection and reliance upon the tender and efficacious intercession of our holy Redeemer, could save us from despair. Hence the exquisite propriety and beauty of the words of the apostle. (1 John 2 : 1.) My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. But if any one sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world. And hereby we do know that we know him, (that is, that our reliance upon him is sincere and successful,) if we keep his commandments.

The understanding of this point is so vital, both to our peace of conscience and purity of character, that we must be pardoned for dwelling more particularly upon it; especially as it reveals one of the sweetest features in the character of our Lord, and one that comes home with all the warmth of the most endearing tenderness to our hearts.

That our poor nature universally stands in need of an Advocate before the tribunal of divine justice, it is unnecessary to insist upon; since "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Rom. 3 : 23. But where shall that Advocate be found? He who undertakes to plead the cause of the sinner, must himself be sinless. He must not only possess sufficient ability for the office of a special pleader; but he must know every person and every case, with all the disadvantages of all the causes for which he undertakes. He must thoroughly understand the law and the government under which he pleads; and be equally solicitous to uphold the claims of righteousness as to secure the safety of the client, who has resorted to him for protection. He must know the true ground on which to rest his plea with the certainty of success. Neither is it sufficient that he possess all these qualifications, and more than these, unless that he be lawfully constituted to the office. It is not enough, in our common courts of justice, between man and man, that many an able and feeling heart could stand up for poor guilty criminals, and plead their cause. He that advocates for them, must have a legal call to the office, and be sworn into it according to the laws of the court. How delightful is it to see that all these qualifications meet and centre in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, and invest him with all their soft and attractive splendors.

The Redeemer's claim to this office is founded on the express call of JEREMIAH. We are told by God the Holy Ghost, (Heb. 5 : 5, 6.) that "Christ glorified not himself to be made an High Priest; but was called of God, as was Aaron." And he was not only called to the office, but sworn into it with the solemnity of an oath,—“The Lord swear and will not repent; thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedek.” Christian! let this be kept in perpetual remembrance. Your Jesus, your Advocate with the Father, is your sworn Advocate. And as in consequence of sin, God our Father is of necessity the legal adversary of every sinner, (Luke 12 : 58, 59.) so for every believer Christ is the legal advocate, fully and lawfully appointed to this office by the Father himself. Well might he say when about to ascend to Heaven, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me." John 14 : 1.

Nor is this all. Christ is our Advocate by virtue of his being the propitiation for our sins. Not only the infinite dignity of his person, and the infinite merit of his propitiation, give him this claim, but also he is the very "propitiation" which God himself "hath set forth, through faith in his blood." Consult Job 33 : 24. Isaiah 42 : 21. Matt. 17 : 5. Rom. 3 : 25. Here then is laid the foundation of his great argument on our behalf. It is not that we, according to the law of God, are not found guilty; the reverse of this is the admitted fact. (Rom. 3 : 19. Isa. 53 : 12.) But may he not plead for his own rights, and those of his people in him? May he not plead the absolute promise of the covenant of redemption, that if he should make his soul an offering for sin, he should see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied? Isa. 53 : 10, 11. And can he rest satisfied till he hath brought all his redeemed people around him in glory? We know from his own words (John 17 : 24.) that he cannot. Nor will he rest till all the ends of his incarnation, as far as they relate to this world, are accomplished; although the universal establishment of his kingdom, (Ps. 2 : 8—12.) involves the overthrow of the empire of Satan, and the destruction of his own and his people's enemies. Isa. 63 : 4. 1 John 3 : 8. Isa. 42 : 4.

Time would fail to describe here, what the Scriptures largely set forth, the various qualifications of our Lord, his ability, his readiness, his grace, and a thousand endearing things beside, which render him so peculiarly suited to the office. Indeed, indeed, it is most blessed to behold him in this endearing character! All he undertakes is free, altogether free, "without money and without price." No case, however desperate, he refuseth; and none that he undertakes can fail. Other advocates may, and indeed must, often disappoint the expectations placed in them; Jesus never.—And then the gracious manner in which he carries on the cause intrusted to his hands, is most blessed to think upon; for he makes every case which he takes up his own. He enters into all their concerns; gives them to see how much he sympathizes with them in all their exercises; and supports their souls with the abiding assurance of his everlasting attention. Not all the hallelujahs of heaven can make him for a moment intermit his regard to the persons or the causes of his redeemed on earth. Their wants, their sorrows, their desires are all numbered before him. For it is not their deservings, but his love; not what they have done, or can do for themselves; but what they need, and what he can do for them, which regulates the bestowment of his grace. If they "have not," then, it is "because they ask not," or ask not in a way which will promote their highest good. What they are, and what they merit, comes not into the account. That they are his; that he has purchased their redemption, and received them as the gift of the Father, (John 6: 37—40. 10: 27—30. 17: 2—26.) these are the motives that operate in the heart of Christ. Not vain then is the apostle's triumphant challenge. Rom. 8: 33—39. Seeing we have such an advocate, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" Oh, were his powerful recommendations known to sinners through faith, not a soul earnest for its everlasting welfare could hesitate a moment to commit all its concerns into the hands of an advocate so wise, so tender, and successful.

Sinners in Zion! here bring all your causes. Come at once to Jesus, and put your trust in him. Blessed are such as do this. He is waiting to be gracious. He can and will save even to the uttermost all that come to God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them, (Heb. 7: 25.) and be their glorious, gracious, lawful and successful Advocate, Friend and Forerunner, in the heavens to which he has ascended.

ADYTUM; a Greek word, signifying inaccessible, by which is understood the most retired and secret place of the heathen temples, into which none but the priests were allowed to enter. The adytum of the Greeks and Romans answered to the Holy of Holies of the Jews, and was the place from whence oracles were delivered.

ÆLIA CAPITOLINA; the name given to Jerusalem, when the emperor Adrian, (whose family name was Ælius,) about A. D. 134, settled a Roman colony there, and banished the Jews, prohibiting their return upon pain of death. We are assured, that Tinnius Rufus, or, as the Rabbins call him, Tarannus, or Turnus Rufus, ploughed up the spot of ground on which the temple had stood. There are medals of Adrian extant, struck upon this occasion; on the reverse of which Judea is represented as a woman, holding two naked children by her, and sacrificing upon an altar. On another medal, we see Judea kneeling, submitting to the emperor, and three children begging mercy of him. Jerome states, that in his time the Jews bought from the Roman soldiers permission to look on Jerusalem, and to shed tears over it. (Paulin. ad. Sever. Ep. 11.) Old men and women, loaded with rags, were seen to go weeping up the mount of Olives, (see Mark 13: 3.) to lament from thence the ruin of the temple.

The city was consecrated by Adrian to Jupiter Capitolinus, after whom it was named Capitolina, and a temple was built to him on the spot where Jesus rose from the dead. A statue of Venus was also set up at Calvary, a marble hog was placed on the gate leading toward Bethlehem, and at this place a grove was planted in honor of Adonis, to whom was dedicated the cave in which our Lord was supposed to have been born. Notwithstanding these degradations, however, the places consecrated by the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus, continued to be held in repute, and were, in fact, identified by the very means employed to destroy their locality and put out their remembrance. See CALVARY, and SEPULCHRE OF CHRIST.

It appears that Adrian's order for expelling the Jews from Jerusalem did not extend to the Christians. These remained in the city, and the church which had been previously composed chiefly of converted Jews, who had connected many of the legal ceremonies with the Christian worship, was now formed exclusively of Gentile converts, who abolished the Jewish observances.

From this period the name Ælia became so common, that Jerusalem was preserved only among the Jews, and better informed Christians. In the time of Constantine, however, it resumed its ancient name, which it has retained to the present day.—Calnet.

ÆONS, (aiões, ages or eternities;) immortal beings, or virtues.—See Basiliidans.

ÆRA; a series of years, commencing from a certain point of time called an epoch; thus we say, the Christian æra; that is, the number of years elapsed since the birth of Christ. The generality of authors use the terms æra and epoch in a synonymous sense; that is, for the point of time from which any computation begins.

The ancient Jews made use of several æras in their computation; sometimes they reckoned from the deluge, sometimes from the division of tongues; sometimes from their departure out of Egypt; and at other times from the building of the temple; and sometimes from the restoration after the Babylonish captivity: but their vulgar æra was from the creation of the world, which falls in with the year of the Julian period 953; and consequently they supposed the world created 294 years sooner than according to our computation. But when the Jews became subject to the Syro-Macedonian kings, they were obliged to make use of the æra of the Seleucidæ in all their contracts, which from thence was called the æra of contracts. This æra begins with the year of the world 3692, of the Julian period 4002, and before Christ 312. The æra in general use among the Christians is that from the birth of Jesus Christ, concerning the true time of which chronologers differ; some place it two years, others four, and again others five, before the vulgar æra, which is fixed for the year of the world 4004: but archbishop Usher, and after him the generality of modern chronologers, place it in the year of the world 4000.

The ancient heathens used several æras: 1. The æra of the first Olympiad is placed in the year of the world 3228, and before the vulgar æra of Jesus Christ 776. 2. The taking of Troy by the Greeks, in the year of the world 2820, and before Jesus Christ 1884. 3. The voyage undertaken for the purpose of bringing away the golden fleece, in the year of the world 2760. 4. The foundation of Rome, in 2856. 5. The æra of Nabonassor, in 3257. 6. The æra of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, in 3674, and before Jesus Christ 330.—Watson.

ÆRIANS; a sect which arose about the middle of the fourth century, being the followers of Ærius, (who must be distinguished from Arius and Aëtius,) a monk and a presbyter of Sebastia, in Pontus. He is charged with being an Arian, or Semi-Arian; but the heaviest accusation against him is an attempt to reform the church; and, by rejecting prayers for the dead, with certain fasts and festivals then superstitiously observed, to reduce Christianity as nearly as possible "to its primitive simplicity; a purpose, indeed, laudable and noble," says Dr. Mosheim, "when considered in itself; though the principles from whence it springs, and the means by which it is executed, are sometimes, in many respects, worthy of censure, and may have been so in the case of this reformer." This gentle rebuke probably refers to a report that the zeal of Ærius originated in his being disappointed of the bishopric of Sebastia, (conferred on Eustathius,) which led him to affirm that the Scriptures make no distinction between a presbyter and a bishop, which he founded chiefly on 1 Tim. 4: 14. Hence he is considered by many, as the father of the modern Presbyterians.—"For this opinion, chiefly," says Dr. Turner, "he is ranked among the heretics, by Epiphanius, his contemporary, who calls it a notion full of folly and madness. His followers were driven from the churches, and out of all the towns and villages, and were obliged to assemble in the woods, caverns, and open fields."—Williams.

ÆTIANUS; another branch (as it is said) of Arius, so called from Aëtius, bishop of Antioch, who is also charged with maintaining "faith without works," as "sufficient to salvation," or rather justification; and with maintaining "that sin is not imputed to believers." It is added, that he taught that God had revealed to him things which he had "concealed from the apostles;" which perhaps, is only a misrepresentation of what he taught on the doctrine of divine influences.

ÆFAR; joined with off, signifies, 1. The distance between two places. Gen. 37: 18.—2. To be estranged from God. Ps. 38: 11.—3. Absent from God. Ps. 10: 1.—4. Ungodly, not only out of the visible church, but alienated from God. Eph. 2: 17.

AFFECTIONS. With many, says Buckminster, there is, perhaps, too much of a disposition to reduce Christianity to a barren system of rational truths. They are apt to make it a mere collection of specific statutes, like a civil or criminal code, in which the precise amount of obligation, and limit of transgression may be clearly ascertained. Men of inquisitive and speculative minds are in peculiar danger of preferring the exercise of the understanding to that of the heart, and thus of rendering the light of religion little more than a cold coruscation, which imparts no warmth to the region of the affections. But, (he adds,) when we consider how important a part of our constitution the affections are, and how much they do in ultimately determining the character of the man, you cannot suppose that religion is the only subject, from which the exercise of them is to be excluded. When we consider, too, the infinite sublimity of religious truths, and the influence they have on human happiness here, and on man's expectations for eternity, surely it cannot be, that he, who is impassioned on every other subject, may be always lukewarm on this; that the affections, which glow in every other sphere, must lose all their warmth, as soon as they touch the region of theology. If it were enough merely to believe, we might believe as well in a malevolent, as in a gracious being. If it were enough to know the sanctions, and admit the obligations of a law, the character of the lawgiver would be of no consideration. If it were enough to keep the commandments according to the barren letter of the moral code, surely the first commandment would have been more than superfluous—Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength. But it is not sufficient that the affections be merely admitted into religion. If they are allowed to enter it at all, they must enter it largely. If God is to be loved, he is to be loved supremely. If Jesus, though absent and invisible, is yet our Savior and friend, he demands an attachment, on our part, stronger than death, which many waters cannot quench, nor floods drown. If the soul is worth any thing, it is inestimable; you cannot love it too dearly. If the interest of any reaches beyond this earthly scene, it spreads throughout eternal duration. It should move our feelings, as well as our thoughts. There cannot be awakened too deep a sensibility for the immortal welfare of a being, who is susceptible of innumerable gradations of bliss and wretchedness.

Let it be admitted that the Scriptures are written in the language of orientals, and abound in phrases and expressions of such passionate hyperbole, as seem, to the colder and more chastised imaginations of the western world, like the language of exaggerated feeling. But, with all this allowance, and it is great, they cannot be made to describe a religion which exists only in the head. There is not a worthy passion, which silently pervades, or tumultuously agitates the breast of man, that has not been enlisted in the cause of God, and encouraged in the Scriptures. Hope, the most animated of the affections, is, in our religion, the ruling spring of ineffable happiness. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, has begotten us again into a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead." The most impatient desires of religious improvement are represented, as a part of the Christian character: "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness." "Let him that is athirst come, and I will give unto him the water of life freely." Joy enters largely into the Christian temper, "For the fruit of the Spirit is love and joy." Sorrow, deep, piercing, and humiliating, is not excluded. "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted;" and "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit." Gratitude is a vital principle of religious obedience; and compassion is a sentiment so essential to religion, that it has even given a name to the righteous; and a merciful is equivalent to a good man. "I will have mercy and not sacrifice," was the passage so dear to our compassionate Savior. Zeal, too, is not to be rejected for its abuses, if Christ, when he gave it himself for us, intended, not only to redeem us from iniquity, but "to purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." To these Christian affections need not be added the comprehensive one of love, for it is not only represented as the source, attendant, and result of true religion, but it is, in numerous passages, commended as the substance and epitome of duty, the fulfilling of the law, the end of the commandment. From this enumeration we may understand, that religion is not a bare comprehension of truths, not the knowledge and remembrance of facts, not the confession of a faith, or the observation of duties formally defined; but it is a celestial spirit, which mingles with and informs all our duties, in secret and in public, which agitates the mass of our intellectual and moral faculties, which discovers itself in fears and hopes, joys and sorrows, gratitude and humiliation, earnestness and a-hallowed love.

And why is it that in religion alone, things spiritual and invisible are to have no command over the affections? Is not this theory perpetually disproved by every observation of man's ruling passions? The metaphysician becomes extravagantly fond of his obscure and lofty speculations. The mathematician is in raptures with the beauty of a theorem, of which the world sees nothing but the lines and angles. The artist glows with imaginations of ideal beauty. The man of taste has his fancies and his fondnesses, and discerns and loves a thousand inexpressible delicacies, impalpable to ordinary minds. And has religion nothing to elevate the soul, nothing to absorb the thoughts, to summon the passions, to make men feel? Because God cannot be seen, shall he be, therefore, excluded from our affections? The single circumstance, that God is not the object of any one of our senses, is abundantly compensated by the consideration, that he is never absent from us; that he compasseth continually our path and our lying down, and that we cannot remove a step from the sphere of his presence; that every sigh which escapes us reaches his ear, and not an affectionate movement springs up in our hearts, to which he is not intuitively attentive. The faintest glow of gratitude, which lights up the countenance, shines before his eyes; and the least cloud of godly sorrow, which passes over the brow, sends its shade to the throne of God, encompassed as it is with "undiminished brightness."

That man may well be suspected, who takes an active interest in every event that transpires, is busy in every project that is ever undertaken, but in religion only is idle, inattentive, and incredulous. Such a man is not to plead, that his feelings are not easily excited, or that his constitutional temperament is lukewarm; and one would think, that, if he were dead to every other sentiment, the immense interest, which he himself has at stake in eternity, and the still greater interest of a whole world of living souls, to whom religion is all important, would rouse every latent spark of passion in his breast, and suffer him not to rest in the cause of God, till the affections themselves were quenched in the flood of death.

The causes that modify the exercise of the affections in different minds, are extremely numerous, and some of them we proceed to consider. (1.) The external exhibition of a man's religious feelings depends much on his original temperament. (2.) The religious affections are also considerably modified by the difference of the doctrines embraced. (3.) The affections, also, are modified by the metaphysical direction of religious inquiries.

But there are pursuits of life, and habits of mind, which repress, and others, which utterly destroy the religious affections; which freeze the current of the soul's best feelings, and leave us but a name to live, while we are dead. Among these last must be reckoned worldly and avaricious pursuits. "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

Another destroyer of the religious affections, is the love of pleasure. There are two classes of men that are governed by the love of pleasure; the gay and fickle, who are ever lost in the rapid succession of amusements; and the sensual, who are forever plunged in gross and criminal enjoyments. But the love of pleasure and the love of God are irreconcilable. They are at continual war; and never can divide the empire of the same breast. "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth."—1 Tim. 5: 6.

2. In Rom. 8: 5. the apostle divides all mankind into two great classes, carnal and spiritual: "They that are after the flesh, do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the spirit, the things of the spirit." Franck, in his Guide to the reading and study of the Scriptures, lays down the following characteristics.

CHARACTERISTICS OF SPIRITUAL AFFECTIONS.

1. A spiritual affection has for its source, the Holy Spirit, and is the fruit of His influence.
2. A spiritual affection tends to a holy end.
3. A spiritual affection is engaged on objects that are divine, eternal, spiritual, and invisible.
4. A spiritual affection, when engaged on sensible objects, is not employed on them as such; but only so far as they have relation to those which are unseen.
5. A spiritual affection is grounded on faith and love. When these do not operate, affections cease to be spiritual.
6. A spiritual affection influences the subject of it, to seek, not himself nor his personal convenience, as such, but God and His glory.
7. A spiritual, overcomes a carnal affection, though the latter be otherwise very violent.
8. A spiritual affection is always connected with humility. The instant the mind is elated, affections become carnal.
9. A spiritual affection excites no perturbation in the mind, nor does it leave behind it any bitterness. It rather assists in the regulation of the soul, receiving every dispensation with complacency, and acquiescing in God with joy.
10. A spiritual affection tends to the amelioration of nature, the increase of grace, and the edification of mankind; having no object but the glory of God.

CHARACTERISTICS OF CARNAL AFFECTIONS.

1. A carnal affection, as it is opposed to those which are spiritual, so, it has nature for its source, and is destitute of grace.
2. A carnal affection has, for its end, the temporal preservation and amendment of nature, or, it refers all things to pleasure; and, particularly, seeks such pleasure not in mental peace, but personal convenience; and this, often under a pretext of duty.
3. A carnal affection is engaged on objects that are corporal, local, temporal, and sensitive.
4. A carnal affection, if engaged upon spiritual objects, does not dwell on them as such; neither with righteous views, nor in a consistent manner; but only so far as they have relation to private gratification or convenience.
5. A carnal affection receives its existence and support from perverse self-love.
6. A carnal affection gives the preference to things naturally pleasing, though others may approximate more nearly to real excellence.
7. A carnal affection gradually disturbs the mind when it is at all indulged, rendering it incapable of investigating truth, or of performing righteous actions; and it leaves a degree of bitterness in the mind, proportioned to the strength of the affection. Cicero justly used to term them "the perturbations of the mind."
8. A carnal affection has always a degree of pride in it, though it is often very subtle. As long as this has place in the mind, carnal affections are not put off.
9. A carnal affection often induces a visible change of the body.

Although the carnal affections are, by these characteristics, separated from the spiritual affections, we are not thence to conclude, that they are so separated in the heart of a renewed person, as that the former never mingles with the latter. On the contrary, the believer's daily strife is to be more and more delivered from the sinful affections of carnal nature. It is according to the reigning affection, that a man is denominated carnal or spiritual. It were impious to ascribe any mixture of good and bad affections to the Holy Spirit; though we cannot deny that sacred affections show themselves in a sanctified nature, or external and natural indications.

3. That an acquaintance with the doctrine of the affections, is an essential requisite in the exposition of the Scriptures, may be proved from reason: for (1.) the affections of love, hatred, desire, hope, fear, joy, sorrow, &c. are frequently to be met with in holy writ. It is evident, therefore, that were we ignorant of these affections, we should be inadequate to the exposition of no inconsiderable part of the sacred writings. (2.) When no affections are expressed, we must necessarily consider them implied; and that every sentence is of their dictation. (3.) Without a knowledge of these emotions, who can inspect the abyss of the human heart, and the depth of those feelings by which it is agitated? And without forming correct ideas of the affections which it is proposed to imitate, how shall man, who is carnal, "put them on?" (4.) The nature of discourse confirms the position. The words of Christ in Matt. 12: 34, 35. decidedly evidence, that, unless some affection influenced the heart, language would not be uttered; so that a man's words are, in fact, the index of his feelings or affections.

Since then the affections are so intimately connected with all language, none will suppose that they are banished from the writings of the inspired penmen: and, because they are closely united with the language of inspiration, it follows that the sacred records cannot be adequately expounded, by those who are satisfied with the mere shell, and contemn the precious kernel of Scripture; who watch the lips, but never enter into the feelings of the inspired penmen.

It forms no solid objection to our view of the subject, that many commentators neglect this point of exposition, and pass it over in silence. This consideration is abundantly overruled, by opposing to it the high authorities that have advocated the study of the affections. Luther, for example, says, "Whoever adopts it, will, I am satisfied, learn more himself, than he can gather from all commentaries united." "An expositor should, as it were, invest himself with the author's mind, in order that he may interpret him as another self." It might be added, that those persons are usually but indifferent examiners of the Scriptures, who, in searching into their meaning, depend, partially, or entirely, on authority. It evidences, as Bernard has observed, that they do not read the Word in the Spirit, under whose influence it was written.

Besides, a consequence deduced from the ignorance or negligence of commentators, can avail nothing against the doctrine. It is, indeed, to be lamented, that very few are solicitous to ascertain the spiritual meaning of the sacred writings; but are anxious rather to be diffuse on critical, controverted, and difficult points, where there is a wider field for the range of natural intellect. This inattention to the affections is a main reason, why some commentaries are so meagre and unsatisfactory to spiritual readers, who, with a view to personal edification, search after the mind of the Spirit, and the revelation of the divine image. A comment, written without adverting to the affections, is so only in name and form.—Buckminster's Sermons, vol. 1. AFFINITY. There are several degrees of affinity, wherein marriage was prohibited by the law of Moses: thus the son could not marry his mother, nor his father's wife. Lev. 17: 7, &c. The brother could not marry his sister, whether she were so by the father only, or only by the mother, and much less if she were his sister both by the same father and mother. The grandfather could not marry his granddaughter, either by his son or daughter. No one could marry the daughter of his father's wife; nor the sister of his father or mother; nor the uncle, his niece; nor the aunt, her nephew; nor the nephew, the wife of his uncle by the father's side. The father-in-law could not marry his daughter-in-law; nor the brother, the wife of his brother, while living; nor even after the death of his brother, if he left children. If he left no children, the surviving brother was to raise up children to his deceased brother by marrying his widow. It was forbidden to marry the mother and the daughter at one time, or the daughter of the mother's son, or the daughter of her daughter, or two sisters, together. Similar regulations are adopted in the laws of this country.

It is true the patriarchs, before the law, married their sisters, as Abraham married Sarah, who was his father's daughter by another mother; and two sisters together, as Jacob married Rachel and Leah; and their own sisters, both by father and mother, as Seth and Cain. But these cases are not to be proposed as examples; because in some they were authorized by necessity; others, by custom; and the law as yet was not in being. If some other examples may be found, either before or since the law, the Scripture expressly disapproves of them; as Reuben's incest with Bilhah, his father's concubine; and the action of Amnon with his sister Tamar; and that of Herod Antipas, who married Herodias, his sister-in-law, his brother Philip's wife, while her husband was yet living; and that which St. Paul reproves and punishes among the Corinthians. 1 Cor. 5: 1.

AFFLICTION; that which causes a sensation of pain. Calamity or distress of any kind. The afflictions of the saints are represented in the Scriptures, as appointed, 1 Thess. 3: 3. Job 5: 6, 7. numerous, Ps. 34: 19. transient, 2 Cor. 4: 17. Heb. 10: 37, and when sanctified, beneficial, 1 Pet. 1: 6. Ps. 119: 67, 71. They wean from the world; work submission; produce humility; excite to diligence; stir up to prayer; and conform us to the divine image. To bear them with patience, we should consider our own unworthiness; the design of God in sending them; and the promises of support under them; and the real good they are productive of. The afflictions of a good man, says an elegant writer, never befall without a cause, nor are sent but upon a proper errand. These storms are never allowed to rise, but in order to dispel some noxious vapors, and restore salubrity to the moral atmosphere. Who that for the first time beheld the earth in the midst of winter, bound up with frost, or drenched with floods of rain, or covered with snow, would have imagined that nature, in this dreary and torpid state, was working towards its own renovation in the spring? Yet we by experience know that those vicissitudes of winter are necessary for fertilizing the earth; and that, under wintry rains and snows, lie concealed the seeds of those roses that are to blossom in the spring; of those fruits that are to ripen in the summer; and of the corn and wine which are in harvest to make glad the heart of man. It would be more agreeable to us to be always entertained with a fair and clear atmosphere, with cloudless skies, and perpetual sunshine; yet in such climates as we have most knowledge of, the earth, were it always to remain in such a state, would refuse to yield its fruits; and, in the midst of our imagined scenes of beauty, the starved inhabitants would perish for want of food. Let us, therefore, quietly submit to Providence. Let us conceive this life to be the winter of our existence. Now the rains must fall, and the winds must roar around us; but, sheltering ourselves under him who is the "covert from the tempest," let us wait with patience till the storms of life shall terminate in an everlasting calm.—Blair's Ser. vol. v. ser. 5; Vincent, Case, and Ad-dington, on Affliction; Willison's Afflicted Man's Companion.

AFGHANS; a people of Asia, inhabiting the province of Cabel, (or Cabelistan;) and owe their introduction into this work to the opinion of sir William Jones, who considers them as a remnant of the ten tribes of Israel. In recommending an inquiry into the history and literature of this people, he says, we learn from Esdras that the ten tribes, after a wandering journey, came to a country called Arsareth, where we may suppose they settled. Now the best Persian historians affirm that the Afghans are descended from the Jews, and they have among themselves traditions of the same import. It is even asserted that their families are distinguished by the names of Jewish tribes; though since their conversion to Islamism they have studiously concealed their origin. The language they use has a manifest resemblance to the Chaldaic; and a considerable district under their dominion is called Hazareth, which might easily have been changed from Arsareth.—Williams's Dict. of All Religions.

AFRICA, (Libya;) one of the four principal divisions of the globe, and the third in magnitude.

Africa is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean sea; on the east by the Indian ocean, the Red sea, and part of Asia; on the south by the Southern ocean; and on the west by the North Atlantic. Its general form is triangular, the northern part being the base, and the southern extremity the vertex. Its length may be reckoned about seventy degrees of latitude, or four thousand nine hundred and ninety miles; and its greatest breadth something more than four thousand and ninety miles.

Africa was peopled principally by Ham, or his descendants; hence it is called the "land of Ham," in several of the Psalms. Mizraim peopled Egypt, (Gen. 10: 6, 13, 14.) and the Pathrusim, the Naphtuhim, the Casluhim, and the Ludim, peopled other parts; but the situations they occupied are not now known distinctly. Nevertheless, we may place Lehabim in Libya, and Phut between Numidia and Libya, along the Mediterranean sea. It is thought that many of the Canaanites, when expelled by Joshua, retired into Africa, and the Mahometans believe that the Amalekites, who dwelt in ancient times in the neighborhood of Mecca, were forced from thence by the kings descended from Zioram.—See CANAANITES.

The Gospel is thought to have been carried to Africa by the eunuch of Candace, whom Philip baptized; and probably also by some of those who, from different parts of it, attended the feast of pentecost. Acts 2: 10. In after-times very flourishing churches were situated on various points of the Mediterranean shore of Africa; but, at present, Mahometanism or idolatry involves almost the whole continent, as has been the case ever since its conquest by the Saracens. See Missionary department of this work.—Calmet.

AGABUS; a prophet of the primitive church, and one of the seven disciples of our Savior. Acts 11: 28. Acts 21: 10. The Greeks say that he suffered martyrdom at Antioch.

AGAG. This seems to have been a common name of the princes of Amalek, one of whom was very powerful as early as the time of Moses. Num. 24: 7. On account of the cruelties exercised by this king and his army against the Israelites, as they returned from Egypt, a bloody and long contested battle took place between Joshua and the Amalekites, in which the former was victorious. Exod. 17: 8—13. At the same time, God protested with an oath to destroy Amalek. Verses 14—16. Deut. 25: 17—19. A. M. 2513. About four hundred years after this, the Lord remembered the cruel treatment of his people, and his own oath; and he commanded Saul, by the mouth of Samuel, to destroy the Amalekites. Saul mustered his army, and found it two hundred thousand strong: 1 Sam. 15: 1, &c. Having entered into their country, he cut in pieces all he could meet with from Havilah to Shur. Agag their king, and the best of their cattle, were however spared, an act of disobedience on the part of Saul, probably dictated by covetousness. But Agag did not long enjoy this reprieve; for Samuel no sooner heard that he was alive, than he sent for him; and, notwithstanding his insinuating address, and the vain hopes with which he flattered himself that the bitterness of death was past, he caused him to be hewed to pieces in Gilgal before the Lord, saying, "As, (in the same identical mode as,) thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women." This savage chieftain had hewed many prisoners to death; and, therefore, by command of the Judge of the whole earth, he was visited with the same punishment which he had inflicted upon others.—Calmet.

AGAPÆ, or the FEAST of LOVE; from the Greek word agape, love, was a religious festival practised among the first Christians, with a view of cultivating mutual affection and friendly intercourse among each other. It was early introduced into the church, and, as some think, is referred to in Acts 2: 46. Jude, verse 12. 2 Pet. 2: 13. It consisted of an entertainment prepared by the richer members, to which the poor were invited, and was commonly held in the place of worship when the worship of the Lord's day was over. There they testified their love by mutual acts of kindness, by partaking of the same fare, and by liberally supplying the necessities of their indigent brethren. From what Pliny in his epistle to the emperor Trajan says, concerning the meetings of the Christians in his day, it would appear that the feast of charity was generally attended to in the evening of the Lord's day, at least in those churches that were in Bithynia, the seat of his jurisdiction. "Their practice is," says he, "to meet before day and sing a hymn to Christ, and to bind themselves by a solemn oath, or sacrament, to do no wickedness: these things performed, they separate and meet again to partake of a common and innocent meal." But the most particular account that we have of these Agapæ, is that given us by Tertullian, in his Apology for the Christians, chap. 39: "We Christians," says he, "look upon ourselves as one body, actuated, as it were, by one soul; and being thus incorporated by love, we can never dispute what we are to bestow upon our own members. And is it any great wonder that such charitable brethren as enjoy all things in common, should have such frequent love-feasts? It is for this you traduce us, and reflect upon our little frugal suppers, not only as infamously wicked, but as exceedingly scandalous. The nature of this supper you may understand by its name, for it is the Greek word for love. We Christians think we can never be too expensive, because we consider all to be gain that is laid out in doing good. When therefore we are at the charge of an entertainment, it is to refresh the bowels of the needy. We feed the hungry, because we know God takes a peculiar delight in seeing us do it. If therefore we feast only with such excellent and noble designs, I leave you from thence to guess at the rest of our discipline in matters of pure religion. Nothing earthly, nothing impure, has any admittance here. Our souls ascend in prayer to God before we sit down to meat. We eat only what suffices nature, and drink no more than is strictly becoming chaste and regular persons. We sup like servants who know that we may awake in the night to the service of our Master; and we discourse as those who recollect that God hears them. When supper is ended, every one is invited forth to sing praises to God, and by this you may judge of the measure of drinking at a Christian feast. As we begin, so we conclude all with prayer, and depart with the same degree of temperance and modesty with which we came; as men who have not so properly been drinking as imbibing religion."

Christians, in the present day, are much divided in their judgment regarding the Agapæ; and different parties appear to have run into different extremes upon the subject. By some they are exalted to the rank of apostolic institutions, and classed with those ordinances of divine worship, which were delivered by the apostles of Christ to be steadily observed by the churches on every Lord's day. But it is not easy to make out this point without taking undue liberties with the word of God.

But if those err, on the one hand, who identify the primitive Agapæ, with the stated ordinances of public worship, it is scarcely less censurable to discard them wholly, as is too much the case with multitudes of Christians in the present day, and to consider them as matters altogether undeserving of their regard. It is demonstrable from the passages already adduced from the writings of Pliny and Tertullian, that they were observed at a very early period of the Christian church, and that they were continued so long as the Christian profession was preserved in its original purity. But when, through the general corruption of morals, and the prevailing laxity of discipline, the abuse of these feasts became notorious; and even the heathens took occasion from them to tax the Christians with impurity, they were laid aside; and in the year 397, the council of Carthage ordained that they should not be held in churches except in cases of particular necessity. But since the abuse of a thing can never be fairly quoted as an argument against the thing itself, it merits the consideration of Christians of the present day, whether the revival of this ancient practice might not possibly be rendered, under proper regulations, productive of beneficial results, and made subservient to a restoration of that "fervent love of the brethren," which so eminently distinguished the first churches of the saints. — 1 Thess. 1: 9. 1 Pet. 1: 22. Jer. 6: 16.—Edinb. Ency. article AGAPÆ. Fleury's Eccles. Hist. tom. 1: 54. and Hallett's Notes on Scripture Texts; Jones's Bib. Cyc.

AGAPE, CHIONE, and IRENE; three sisters who suffered martyrdom in the beginning of the fourth century, at Thessalonica. It was during the persecution under Dioclesian, A. D. 304, that these heroic Christian females submitted to be buried alive, rather than give up the Scriptures and sacrifice to idols in violation of their love to God and Christ, "who commanded us," said they, "to love him to the last."—Fox.

AGAPETÆ; a name given to certain virgins and widows, who in the ancient church associated themselves with and attended on ecclesiastics out of a motive of piety and charity.—See Deaconesses.

AGAPETUS; a Christian youth of Præneste, in Italy, who, in the persecution under Severus, in the third century, though but fifteen years of age, suffered the most excruciating torments for his decided adherence to Christianity. He was first severely scourged; then hung up by the feet; then scalded with boiling water; afterwards worried by wild beasts; and at last beheaded. The officer who directed his execution, while it was performing, fell suddenly from his judicial seat, crying out that his bowels burnt him, and expired; "feeling miraculously in this world," says Fox, "a foretaste of the punishment due to such cruelty; while the youthful martyr patiently suffered in hope of a glorious resurrection."

AGARENIANS, or HAGARENIANS; a name applied by Stockman and others to some persons, who, in the seventh century, apostatized from Christianity to Mahometanism, the religion of the Arabians, who are descended from Ismael, the son of Agar.—Bell's Wanderings, p. 105.

AGATE, (shebo;) Exod. 28: 19. 29: 12. In the Septuagint and Vulgate, achates. A precious stone, semi-pellucid. Its variegations are sometimes most beautifully disposed, representing plants, trees, rivers, clouds, &c. Its Hebrew name is, perhaps, derived from the country whence the Jews imported it; for the merchants of Sheba brought to the market of Tyre all kinds of precious stones. Ezek. 27: 22. The agate was the second stone in the third row of the pectoral of the high priest. Exod. 28: 19 and 39: 12.

AGATHA; a distinguished Christian martyr of the third century. She was a Sicilian lady, of surpassing beauty, accomplishments, and piety. Quintian, the pagan governor of Sicily, captivated with her charms, and incensed by her rejection of his illicit overtures, wreaked upon this innocent and accomplished woman a revenge, at the bare recital of which humanity shudders. By his order, she was first scourged with rods; then burnt with red-hot irons, and cruelly torn with sharp hooks; after which she was laid upon a bed of live coals mingled with glass. After enduring inconceivable agonies with a sweet fortitude, derived from her holy faith, the lovely victim was removed to her prison, and there expired, February 5, A. D. 251; her released spirit doubtless triumphantly mingling with the great multitude before the throne, who came out of great tribulation; having washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Rev. 7: 9—17.—Fox.

AGATHO; a Christian of Greece, who, in company with three Christian females, Cassia, Philippa, and Eutychia, suffered martyrdom in the fourth century, under Dioclesian.—Fox.

AGATHUS, (Verius;) a young man of Lyons, in France, who, during the persecution under Antoninus Pius, having one day boldly pleaded the Christian cause, was asked if he was a Christian? The confession of Christ at such a time was costly. Matt. 10: 28—39. Having answered in the affirmative, he was condemned to death, and received the crown of martyrdom accordingly. Many, animated by this young man's intrepidity, boldly owned their faith, and suffered in like manner for their attachment to the Savior.—Fox.

AGE; duration. It sometimes signifies an indefinite period; at others it is used for, 1. a generation of the human race, or thirty years; 2. as the Latin seculum, a hundred years; 3. maturity of life, John 9: 21.; 4. the latter end of life, Job 11: 17.—See CHRONOLOGY.

The whole duration of the life of man is divided into four ages, viz. 1. Infancy; extending from the first to the fourteenth year. 2. Youth, adolescence, or the age of puberty; commencing at fourteen, and terminating at about twenty-five. 3. Manhood, or the virile age; concluding at fifty; and the last ending at the close of life. Some, however, divide the first period into infancy and childhood; and the last likewise into two stages, calling that which succeeds the age of seventy-five, decrepit old age.—Watson.

AGENDA; among divines and philosophers, signifies the duties which a man lies under an obligation to perform; thus we meet with the agenda of a Christian, or the duties he ought to perform, in opposition to the credenda, or the things he is to believe. It is also applied to the service or office of the church, and to church books compiled by public authority, prescribing the order to be observed; and amounts to the same as ritual, formulary, directory, missal, &c.—Duck.

AGENT; that which acts; opposed in philosophy to patient, or that which is acted upon.

AGENTS, (MORAL);—See MORAL AGENCY.

AGNUS DEI, (the Lamb of God); a name impiously applied to certain consecrated cakes of white wax, stamped with the figure of a lamb bearing a flag, which are borne in the processions of the church of Rome, or worn about the neck as amulets, and supposed to possess great virtues; they are at least very profitable to the clergy, and form a considerable source of income. This custom appears to have been borrowed from the heathen in the seventh or eighth century, and distinguished the numerous converts made by the sign of the cross in baptism.—Claude's Defence of the Reformation; Robinson's Dictionary.

AGONISTIC, (combatants); a name given to certain Donatist preachers, who used to attend the public markets, fairs, &c. to promulgate their principles; or rather, probably, the general principles of pure Christianity. (See Donatists.) They were a kind of itinerant polemic, or missionaries; and are sometimes called circitores, circelliones, &c.; and, at Rome, Montenses, probably from their preaching on the hills in the open air.—Encyclopedia Britannica.

AGONY, (agonia.) This term, expressive of the strongest internal conflict of emotions, is used by the evangelist Luke to describe our Lord's sufferings in the garden of Gethsemane. Crabbe, with his usual accuracy and precision, defines this word "a severe struggle with pain and suffering. Anguish," he says, "arises from the reflection on evil that is past; agony springs from witnessing that which is immediate, or before the eye. Anguish and agony are species of distress of the severer kind, which spring altogether from the maturity of reflection, and the full consciousness of evil. Anguish is pain arising from severe pressure; agony the pain arising from an intense struggle." The shade of difference is illustrated thus: "Parents suffer the deepest anguish, when a child disappoints their dearest hopes, by running a career of vice, and finishing its wicked course by an untimely and sometimes ignominious end; but not unfrequently they are doomed to suffer the agony of seeing a child encircled in flames from which he cannot be snatched, or sinking into a watery grave, from which he cannot be rescued."

Let the reader pause and reflect. What was the agonizing spectacle before the Savior's eye in Gethsemane? What was that agonizing spectacle, at the sight of which, as it opened upon his view, "he began to be sore amazed and very heavy, and said, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death?'" What was that sight of horror, whose appalling impression roused every faculty and feeling in prayer, "with strong crying and tears;" wrung every fibre of his frame with agony, and bathed his whole body in a bloody sweat? Was it merely a death of martyrdom? It were little less than blasphemy to affirm it. No: we are told what it was, in those affecting words of the apostle, (1 Cor. 15: 3.) "Christ died for our sins."

AGONYCLITÆ, (not bending the knee;) a sect of Christians in the seventh century, who prayed always standing, as thinking it unlawful to kneel.

AGRICULTURE. When God placed Adam in paradise, he instructed him "to dress and keep it;" to work and labor the ground, let in the influences of heaven, prune the trees, cherish the plants, preserve the fruits from the beasts of the field, and the fowls of heaven, which had access to the garden; and to keep all his abode, and the domain around it, in good order. This was the first employment of man, which, by the wise and benevolent arrangements of his Maker, was to cheer and accelerate the hours of innocence and peace. After his expulsion from the garden on account of his transgressions, the command which he had received at his formation, to cultivate the ground, was renewed; and the curse under which it was laid, rendered his exertions more necessary than before. This may be one reason that Adam initiated his eldest son in the art of cultivating the soil, which now refused to produce the necessities of life in sufficient abundance and perfection, without the skill and industry of man; while he devoted Abel, his younger son, to the easier and more simple occupation of a shepherd.

In the first ages of the world, men were chiefly employed in digging and throwing up the earth, by means of rude and inconvenient implements; but Noah made important advances in the art of husbandry, and found out fitter instruments of cultivation than were known before his time. This patriarch, the second father of our family, is called a man of the ground—in our translation a husbandman, because of his improvement in agriculture, and his inventions for subduing and fertilizing the soil. In consequence of the divine malediction, useless or obnoxious plants gained the ascendancy, and obstructed the growth of esculent vegetables. These obstructions were to be removed, which required great pains and labor; and the sterility of the ground was to be corrected, and its productive energy excited and improved, by the operations of the plough.

The surface of the ground was probably divided into fields, and recurred to individual proprietors long before the flood. By that dreadful catastrophe, the whole earth reverted to its natural, undivided, unappropriated state; but how long it continued in common we have no means of ascertaining. In the days of Abraham, who lived at no great distance of time from the flood, the lands of Canaan had become in some degree the exclusive property of the nation by whom they were occupied; and been even subdivided into small fields, and claimed as the legal inheritance of private individuals, except the pastures which appear to have remained in common through many preceding ages. The patriarch bought a field from Ephron the Hittite, for a possession of a burying-place; and the transaction shows, that the property was perfectly well-defined; that Ephron had the same absolute right to it, as any landed proprietor of our times has to his estate. And upon the purchase-money being paid, the sacred historian says, "The field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre, the field and the cave which was therein; and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made sure unto Abraham for a possession, in the presence of the children of Heth, before all that went in at the gate of his city." The minute division of landed property in Egypt, is attested by the same infallible authority; for, under the administration of Joseph, the people of that country were compelled by the famine to sell "every man his field;" and "Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh." When the sons of Israel had conquered the land of promise, it was, by the divine command, surveyed and divided by lot, first among the twelve tribes; and then the portion of each tribe was laid out in separate inheritances, according to the number of the families composing the tribe; and thus every man in the nation had his field, which he was directed to cultivate for the support of himself and his family. To prevent mistake and litigation, these fields were marked off by stones set up on the limits, which could not be removed without incurring the wrath of heaven. The divine command in relation to this matter, runs in these terms: "Thou shalt not remove thy neighbor's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the law which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess." In Persia, landmarks are still used: in the journey from Arzum to Amasia, Morier found the boundaries of each man's possessions, here and there, marked by large stones. Landmarks were used in Greece long before the age of Homer; for when Minerva fought with Mars, she seized, with her powerful hand, a piece of rock, lying in the plain, black, rugged and large, which ancient men had placed to mark the boundary of the field.

Their inheritances were again divided into parts, which the Hebrews distinguished by measure into acres. The distribution of a field into acres, is ascertained by a passage in the first book of Samuel which is couched in these terms: "And that first slaughter which Jonathan and his armor-bearer made, was about twenty men, within as it were a half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough."

The land of promise was distinguished by extraordinary fruitfulness: Jehovah was pleased, in a special manner, to bless the springing of the earth, and to crown the year with his goodness; yet this peculiar favor did not supersede the vigilance and activity of the husbandman. The prophet Isaiah intimates, that his countrymen began their operations in the field by erecting fences, and gathering out the stones, and clearing away other incumbrances: "My well-beloved has a vineyard in a very fruitful hill; and he fenced it and gathered out the stones thereof." Thorns or other useless plants were either dug up by the roots, or consumed by fire. "For thus saith the Lord, to the men of Judah and Jerusalem, break up your fallow-ground, and sow not among thorns." Rich as the soil of Palestine certainly is, it refused at no time the aid of manure, which travellers and historians tell us is the case in some countries. This fact we discover in several parts of Scripture, but particularly in the parable of the barren fig-tree: "Let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it; and if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then shall we cut it down." Thus we find the Jewish farmer, however highly favored, was obliged to follow the rule which Virgil prescribed to his countrymen, to saturate the parched soil with rich dung, and scatter sordid ashes upon the exhausted lands. Geor. lib. 1, l. 79. Not satisfied with cultivating the rich plains and fertile valleys of his native land, he reduced the barren rocks and rugged mountains under his dominion, and compelled them to minister to his necessities. For this purpose he covered them with earth, or, where this was impracticable, he constructed walls of loose stones in parallel rows along their sides, to support the mould, and prevent it from being washed down by the rains. On these circular plots of excellent soil, which gradually rose one above another, from the base to the very summits of the mountains, he raised abundant crops of corn and other excellent vegetables; or where the declivity was too rocky, he planted the vine and the olive, which delight in such situations, and which rewarded his toil with the most picturesque scenery, and the richest products. Thus the places where only the wild goat wandered and the eagle screamed, which appeared to be doomed to perpetual nakedness and sterility, were converted by the bold and persevering industry of the Syrian husbandman into cornfields and gardens, vineyards and olive plantations, the manifest traces of which, in all the mountains of Palestine, remain to this day. The inhabitants of that "good land," literally sung from the top of the rock, when it flowed with the blood of the grape, and poured them out "rivers of oil."—Paxton, vol. ii.

AGRIPPA; surnamed Herod, the son of Aristobulus and Mariamne, and grandson of Herod the Great, was born A. M. 3997, three years before the birth of our Savior, and seven years before the vulgar era. After the death of his father Aristobulus, Josephus informs us that Herod, his grandfather, took care of his education, and sent him to Rome to make his court to Tiberius. Agrippa, having a great inclination for Caius, the son of Germanicus, and grandson of Antonia, chose to attach himself to this prince, as if he had some prophetic views of the future elevation of Caius, who at that time was beloved by all the world. The great assiduity and agreeable behavior of Agrippa soon won upon this prince, that he was unable to live without him. Caius being killed in the beginning of the year A. D. 41, Agrippa, who was then at Rome, contributed much by his advice to maintain Claudius in possession of the imperial dignity, to which he had been advanced by the army. The emperor, as an acknowledgment for his kind offices, gave him all Judea, and the kingdom of Chalcis, which had been possessed by Herod his brother. Thus Agrippa became of a sudden one of the greatest princes of the east, and was possessed of as much, if not more territory, than had been held by Herod the Great, his grandfather. He returned to Judea, and governed it to the great satisfaction of the Jews. But the desire of pleasing them, and a mistaken zeal for their religion, induced him to put to death the apostle James, and to cast Peter into prison with the same design; and, but for a miraculous interposition, which, however, produced no effect upon the mind of the tyrant, his hands would have been imbrued in the blood of two apostles, the memory whereof is preserved in Scripture. At Cæsarea, he had games performed in honor of Claudius. Here the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon waited on him to sue for peace. Agrippa being come early in the morning into the theatre, with a design to give them audience, seated himself on his throne, dressed in a robe of silver tissue, worked in the most admirable manner. The rising sun darted his golden beams thereon, and gave it such a lustre as dazzled the eyes of the spectators; and when the king began his speech to the Tyrians and Sidonians, the parasites around him began to say, it was "the voice of a god, and not of a man." Instead of rejecting these impious flatteries, Agrippa received them with an air of complacency; and the angel of the Lord smote him, because he did not give God the glory. Being, therefore, carried home to his palace, he died, at the end of five days, racked with tormenting pains in his bowels, and devoured with worms. Such was the death of Herod Agrippa, A. D. 44, after a reign of seven years. He left a son of the same name, and three daughters—Bernice, who was married to her uncle Herod, her father's brother; Mariamne, betrothed to Julius Archelaus, and Drusilla, promised to Epiphanus, the son of Archelaus, the son of Comagena.—Watson.

AGRIPPA; son of the former Agrippa, was at Rome with the emperor Claudius when his father died. The emperor, we are told by Josephus, was inclined to give him all the dominions that had been possessed by his father, but was dissuaded from it, Agrippa being only seventeen years of age; and he kept him therefore at his court four years.

Three years after this, Herod, king of Chalcis, and uncle to young Agrippa, dying, the emperor gave his dominions to this prince, who, notwithstanding, did not go into Judea till four years after, A. D. 53; when, Claudius taking from him the kingdom of Chalcis, gave him the provinces of Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, Paneas, and Abilene, which formerly had been in the possession of Lysanias. After the death of Claudius, his successor, Nero, who had a great affection for Agrippa, to his other dominions added Julius in Peræa, and that part of Galilee to which Tarichæa and Tiberias belonged. Festus, governor of Judea, coming to his government, A. D. 60, king Agrippa and Bernice, his sister, went as far as Cæsarea to salute him; and as they continued there for some time, Festus talked with the king concerning the affair of St. Paul, who had been seized in the temple about two years before, and within a few days previous to his visit had appealed to the emperor. Agrippa wishing to hear Paul, that apostle delivered that noble address in his presence which is recorded, Acts 26, and which drew from the astonished monarch that memorable exclamation, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian."

After the destruction of Jerusalem, in which he took part with the Romans, Agrippa retired with Bernice to Rome, where he died A. D. 90, aged seventy years. The suspicion of habitual incest rests as a deep shade upon his character; which, if it be well grounded, may show, among other reasons, why he was not "altogether" persuaded to be "a Christian."—Watson; Calmet.

AGUE; a periodical disease of the fever kind, consisting of a cold shivering fit, succeeded by a hot one. It is occasioned by want of perspiration, and is said to be most obstinate in the harvest season. A burning ague is one of the most terrible kind. Lev. 26: 16.

AGUR; the name of the writer of a collection of proverbs, which have been added to those of Solomon, and are now contained in the thirtieth chapter of that book. He is called the son of Jakeh, and is said to have addressed them originally to Ithiel and to Ucal; but it is a remarkable circumstance, that, of the four persons whose names are introduced on this occasion, we find not the slightest mention in any other part of the inspired writings; and it would be trifling with the reader's patience to lay before him the reveries of the Jewish Rabbins respecting them, which indeed are remarkable for nothing so much as their extravagance and absurdity. Let us respect the silence of revelation. What should hinder us from supposing that though we are unable to give any particular account of Agur, and his father Jakeh; of Ithiel and Ucal; they were, nevertheless, persons well known in their day and generation; that Agur was a prophet or seer, who was inspired to deliver certain parables or important sayings for the use of the church of God,—that he addressed them to two of his particular friends or perhaps pupils, and that their importance induced the Hebrews to attach them, by way of appendix, to the Proverbs of Solomon? Prov. 30.

AGYNIANS, or AGINIANS; a small sect about the end of the seventh century. They condemned the use of certain meats, and marriage, whence their name.

AHAB; the son and successor of Omri. He began his reign over Israel, A. M. 3086, and reigned twenty-two years. In impiety he far exceeded all the kings of Israel. He married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon, who introduced the whole abominations and idols of her country, Baal and Ashtaroth. 1 Kings 17, &c.

2. AHAB the son of Kolaiah, and Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, were two false prophets, who, about A. M. 3406, seduced the Jewish captives at Babylon with hopes of a speedy deliverance, and stirred them up against Jeremiah. The Lord threatened them with a public and ignominious death, before such as they had deceived; and that their names should become a curse; men wishing that their foes might be made like Ahab and Zedekiah, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon roasted in the fire. Jer. 29: 21, 22.—Watson.

AHASUERUS; was the king of Persia, who advanced Esther to be queen, and at her request delivered the Jews from the destruction plotted for them by Haman. Archbishop Usher is of opinion that this Ahasuerus was Darius Hystaspes; and that Atossa was the Vasthi, and Artystona the Esther, of the Scriptures. But, according to Herodotus, the latter was the daughter of Cyrus, and therefore could not be Esther; and the former had four sons by Darius, besides daughters, born to him after he was king; and therefore she could not be the queen Vasthi, divorced from her husband in the third year of his reign, nor he the Ahasuerus who divorced her. Besides, Atossa retained her influence over Darius to his death, and obtained the succession of the crown for his son, Xerxes; whereas Vasthi was removed from the presence of Ahasuerus by an irrevocable decree. Esther 1: 19. Joseph Scaliger maintains that Xerxes was the Ahasuerus, and Hamestris his queen, the Esther, of Scripture. The opinion is founded on the similitude of names, but contradicted by the dissimilitude of the characters of Hamestris and Esther. Besides, Herodotus says, that Xerxes had a son by Hamestris that was marriageable in the seventh year of his reign; and therefore she could not be Esther. The Ahasuerus of Scripture, according to Dr. Prideaux, was Artaxerxes Longimanus. Josephus positively says that this was the person. The Septuagint, through the whole book of Esther, uses Artaxerxes for the Hebrew Ahasuerus wherever the appellation occurs; and the apocryphal additions to that book every where call the husband of Esther Artaxerxes; and he could be no other than Artaxerxes Longimanus. The extraordinary favor shown to the Jews by this king, first in sending Ezra, and afterwards Nehemiah, to relieve this people, and restore them to their ancient prosperity, affords strong presumptive evidence that they had near his person and high in his regard such an advocate as Esther. Ahasuerus is also a name given in Scripture, Ezra 4: 6. to Cambyses, the son of Cyrus; and to Astyages, king of the Medes. Dan. 9: 1.

AHAVA; the name of a river of Babylonia, or rather of Assyria, where Ezra assembled those captives whom he afterwards brought into Judea. Ezra 8: 15. The river Ahava is thought to be that which ran along the Adabene, where a river Diava, or Adiava, is mentioned, and on which Ptolemy places the city Abane or Aavane. This is probably the country called Ava, whence the kings of Assyria translated the people called Avites into Palestine, and where they settled some of the captive Israelites. 2 Kings 17: 24. 18: 34. 19: 13. 17: 31. Ezra, intending to collect as many Israelites as he could, who might return to Judea, halted in the country of Ava, or Aahava, whence he sent agents into the Caspian mountains, to invite such Jews as were willing to join him. Ezra 8: 16. The history of Izates, king of the Adiabeniens, and of his mother Helena, who became converts to Judaism some years after the death of Jesus Christ, sufficiently proves that there were many Jews still settled in that country.—Watson.

AHAZ; succeeded his father Jotham, as king of Israel, at the age of twenty years, reigned till the year before Christ, 726, and addicted himself to the practice of idolatry. After the customs of the heathen, he made his children to pass through fire; he shut up the temple, and destroyed its vessels. He became tributary to Tiglath-pileser, whose assistance he supplicated against the kings of Syria and Israel. Such was his impiety, that he was not allowed burial in the sepulchres of the kings of Israel. 2 Kings 16: 2 Chron. 28.—Watson.

AHAZIAH; the son of Ahab, king of Israel. Ahaziah reigned two years, partly alone, and partly with his father Ahab, who appointed him his associate in the kingdom a year before his death. Ahaziah imitated his father's impieties. 1 Kings 22: 52, &c. 2 Kings 1: 17.—Watson.

2. AHAZIAH; king of Judah, the son of Jehoram and Athaliah. He succeeded his father in the kingdom of Judah, A. M. 3119; being in the twenty-second year of his age. 2 Kings 8: 26, &c.; and he reigned one year only in Jerusalem. He walked in the ways of Ahab's house, to which he was related, his mother being of that family. 2 Kings 9.—Watson.

AHIJAH; the prophet of the Lord, who dwelt in Shiloh. He is thought to be the person who spoke twice to Solomon from God, once while he was building the temple. 1 Kings 6: 11. at which time he promised him the divine protection: and again, 1 Kings 11: 11. after his falling into his irregularities, with great threatenings and reproaches. Ahijah was one of those who wrote the history or annals of this prince, 2 Chron. 9: 29. The same prophet declared to Jeroboam, that he would usurp the kingdom, 1 Kings 9: 29, &c., and, about the end of Jeroboam's reign, he also predicted the death of Abijah, the only pious son of that prince, as is recorded 1 Kings 14: 2, &c. Ahijah, in all probability, did not long survive the delivery of this last prophecy; but we are not informed of the time and manner of his death.—Watson.

AHIMAAZ; the son of Zadok, the high priest. Ahimaz succeeded his father under the reign of Solomon. He performed a very important piece of service for David during the war with Absalom. He was succeeded in the priesthood by his son Azariah.—Jones.

AHITHOPHEL; a celebrated character in Scripture. He was at one time David's most intimate friend and counsellor; but afterwards became his most inveterate enemy: for, after Absalom had succeeded in exciting a general disaffection to his father's government, Ahithophel instantly joined him, and became the most active of all the conspirators. David was more alarmed by the defection of this experienced politician, than by all the thousands who crowded round the standard of rebellion; and he earnestly prayed, that the Lord might turn his counsel into foolishness. It was not without reason that David was thus alarmed; for we find Ahithophel instantly recommending the most prompt and effectual measures to destroy the power and authority of his former friend.—Jones.

AHOLIBAH and AHOLAH; are two fictitious names adopted by the prophet Ezekiel, to denote the two kingdoms of Judah and Samaria. They are represented as two sisters of Egyptian extraction, Aholah being put for Samaria, and Aholibah for Jerusalem, the first importing a tent, and the second my tent is in her. As both those kingdoms prostituted themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians, by imitating their idolatrous practices, the Lord abandoned them to those very people for whom they had shown so passionate and so impure an affection. They were by them carried into captivity, and subjected to the severest servitude. Ezekiel 33: 4.—Calmet's Dict.

AI; called by the LXX. Agai, by Josephus Aina, and by others Ajah, a town of Palestine, situate west of Bethel, and at a small distance north-west of Jericho. The three thousand men, first sent by Joshua to reduce this city, were repulsed, on account of the sin of Achan, who had violated the anathema pronounced against Jericho, by appropriating a part of the spoil. After the expiation of this offence, the whole army of Israel marched against Ai, with orders to treat that city as Jericho had been treated, with this difference, that the plunder was to be given to the army. Joshua, having appointed an ambush of thirty thousand men, marched against the city, and, by a feigned retreat, drew out the king of Ai with his troops; and upon a signal given by elevating his shield on the top of a pike, the men in ambush entered the city and set fire to it. Thus the soldiers of Ai, placed between two divisions of Joshua's army, were all destroyed; the king alone being preserved for a more ignominious death on a gibbet, where he hung till sunset. The spoil of the place was afterwards divided among the Israelites. The men appointed for ambush, are, in one place, said to be thirty thousand, and in another five thousand. For reconciling this apparent contradiction, most commentators have generally supposed, that there were two bodies placed in ambuscade between Bethel and Ai, one of twenty-five thousand and the other of five thousand men; the latter being probably a detachment from the thirty thousand first sent, and ordered to lie as near to the city as possible. Masius allows only five thousand men for the ambuscade, and twenty-five thousand for the attack. Josh. 8.—Watson.

AICHMALOTARCH; signifies the prince of the captivity, or chief of the captives. The Jews pretend that this was the title of him who had the government of their people during the captivity of Babylon; and they believe these princes or governors to have been constantly of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. But they give no satisfactory proof of the real existence of these Aichmalotarchs. There was no prince of the captivity before the end of the second century, from which period the office continued till the eleventh century. The princes of the captivity resided at Babylon, where they were installed with great ceremony, held courts of justice, &c., and were set over the eastern Jews, or those settled in Babylon, Chaldaea, Assyria, and Persia.—Watson.

AIJALON, or AJALON, the city of oaks; a city of the Canaanites; the valley adjoining to which is memorable in sacred history from the miracle of Joshua, in arresting the course of the sun and moon, that the Israelites might have sufficient light to pursue their enemies. Joshua 10: 12, 13. Aijalon was afterwards a Levitical city, and belonged to the tribe of Dan; who did not, however, drive out the Amorite inhabitants. Judges 1: 35.

AJJELETH; a Hind. The twenty-second Psalm is entitled Aijeleth Shahar, which is translated in the margin the hind of the morning; now the morning which this Psalm celebrates is the morning of the resurrection. The hind of the morning is perhaps one of the most striking characteristics of the resurrection of the dead that language can furnish.—Brown.

AINSWORTH, (HENRY, D. D.) a celebrated non-conformist divine of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but both the time and place of his birth are unknown.

In the year 1590, he greatly distinguished himself among a sect of dissenters called Brownists; and in early life gained great reputation by his knowledge of the learned languages, and particularly of Hebrew. The Brownists having fallen into great discredit in England, Ainsworth was involved in their difficulties and troubles; and at length he was compelled to quit his native land, and retire into Holland. In conjunction with Johnson, he erected a church at Amsterdam; and published a confession of faith of the Brownists, in the year 1602, which caused much contention, and a division between him and Mr. Johnson was the result; the latter removing to Embden with half the congregation, and Ainsworth remaining at Amsterdam; but Johnson soon after died, and his congregation was dissolved. Ainsworth also left his people for a short time, and went to Ireland, but returned to Amsterdam, and continued there till the time of his death. Nothing could persuade him, however, to return home; and he died, as he lived, in exile. This circumstance was at that time very prejudicial to the Protestant cause, in general, and especially to the Puritans; and it has ever been a matter of regret, that through a too rigorous administration, the church excluded this great and able man from the public exercise of his ministry in his native country. Very few authors are more quoted than Ainsworth, by the literati of all countries; and not only at a considerable distance of time but by all sects and parties. To them the celebrated Bishop Hall paid much attention.

Ainsworth was a man of profound learning, well versed in the Scriptures, and deeply read in the works of the Rabbins. He published several treatises, many of which excited great interest; particularly that entitled, "A counter Poison against Bernard and Crashaw." Ainsworth is much celebrated for his "Annotations on several Books of the Bible." These were printed at various times and in many sizes. In those on the five Books of Moses, Psalms, and the Canticles, the Hebrew words are compared with and explained by the ancient Greek and Chaldee versions, and other records and monuments of the Hebrew.

Mr. Ainsworth's death was sudden; and suspicion of his having been poisoned was raised by his having found a diamond, of great value, belonging to a Jew, and his refusing to return it to him till he had confessed with some of the Rabbins on the prophecies of the Old Testament, relating to the Messiah, which was promised; but the Jew not having sufficient interest to obtain one, it is thought he was the instrument of his death. Mr. Ainsworth was a great, a learned, and a pious man; and his name will be justly handed down to posterity, as worthy, not only of praise but imitation. In addition to the works referred to in this life, he was the author of "A Treatise on the Communion of Saints;" "A Treatise on the Fellowship that the Faithful have with God, his angels, and one with another in this present life;" and "An Arrow against Idolatry."—Jones's Christian Biography; Neal's History of the Puritans; Heylin's History of the Presbyterians; Wendler's Diss. de Lib. Kar. sec. 23.; Vogt. Catalogues, Historiis Criticis Librorum Rariorum; Light's Treatise of Religion and Learning; Calamy's Life of Baxter; and Memoirs of Ainsworth.

AION and AIONIOS. These important Greek words, in consequence of recent discussions, have become so far naturalized in our language as to claim notice here. In 1826, Mr. Balfour of Charlestown, (Mass.) in a work entitled, "An Inquiry, &c.," endeavored to prove that these words in the usage of Scripture do not denote unlimited or endless existence, but the reverse. Aion he regards as equivalent to age; and aionios, which is the adjective formed from aion, as equivalent to age-lasting, or lasting for a considerable but temporary period. Two years after, Mr. Goodwin, of Sandwich, (Mass.) in an article published in a periodical of high reputation, (the Christian Examiner), advanced a new theory; that aion in scriptural as well as in classical usage, bears no reference whatever to time or duration, but simply conveys the idea of spirituality. Hence he proposes to render aionios by the term spiritual; regarding it as equivalent to the Greek pneumatikos. Both these writers agree, however, in one point, that of setting aside the signification of eternity from the words in question, especially in relation to future punishment.

In 1829, professor Stuart, of Andover, published an "Exegetical Essay," in "the Spirit of the Pilgrims," in which he professes to settle the true sense of these terms on the principles of strict philological interpretation. This Essay, which completely subverts the positions of Mr. Balfour and Mr. Goodwin, of course called forth animadversions; and the public discussion was kept up by further investigations, letters, replies, and rejoinders, until 1833; since which time nothing new has appeared. The result of this discussion has been undoubtedly salutary; as the public are now in possession of far better means of forming an accurate judgment of the meaning of these important words than at any former period. It is not improbable that some have been stumbled by the speculations which aim to expunge from the Bible all intimations of a future and final state of retribution; but the conscientious inquirers after truth will now, we trust, be satisfied that no efforts of theological audacity, or learned ingenuity, can avail to obscure the revelation of that solemn truth, or to make it appear that the retribution which awaits the wicked, is not equal in duration to that which awaits the righteous.

Mr. Balfour has carried the argument for the limitation of these words, as far as it can ever be carried, and has shown himself an acute and pains-taking investigator. His errors, (and they are fundamental ones,) seem to result not so much from want of honesty of purpose, as from want of learning and skill in the philosophy of language, falling in with some unfortunate bias against orthodoxy. This state of mind, working on undigested materials, naturally led to doubt; doubt passed rapidly into disbelief; and disbelief into honest and determined opposition; in which the apparent contempt of his writings by the orthodox was unhappily confirmed him. Mr. Goodwin with much superior learning, urbanity, and literary taste, has thrown strong light on the etymology and classical usage of aion, though in his translations he has sometimes "darkened counsel by words without knowledge." He has probably done all that ever will be done to sustain the meaning of simple spirituality. But as relates to Old or New Testament usage, his effort must be pronounced a total failure; the reference to duration in all cases being uniform and unequivocal. Professor Stuart's little work is not without faults, some of which have been roughly handled by Mr. Balfour in his Letters to Mr. Stuart; but on the whole, it may be safely said to be one of the most able and satisfactory specimens of philological investigation, comprehension, and discriminating classification ever presented to the world. The reader, to do justice to the subject, should go through the discussion in the order in which it occurred. From an impartial collation of the evidence furnished by each of these three able writers, he can hardly fail of gaining a correct and comprehensive knowledge of the determinate sense of this fundamental word; whose frequent recurrence in the sacred writings in the most important connections, makes it worthy of the most serious and profound investigation.

The following is here set down as the result of such an investigation by the compiler of this work. It will be seen that he differs somewhat, though seldom, from the results of professor Stuart.

Aion is a derivative from aei, always, and on the present participle of the verb emi, to be. Its primary and proper signification, therefore, is always-being, or, which is the same thing, everlasting. It may be defined strictly, duration without interruption and without end. Lennep, in his "Etymologium Linguae Graecae," says, "it is a noun of that kind, which in its own nature denotes collection and multitude of things, as appears from the termination on." Phavorinus also calls it "the comprehension of many times and periods;" a definition which Saurin might have had in his eye when he speaks of the "absorbing periods of eternity." Nothing therefore can be more glaringly unsound than the statement of Mr. Goodwin, that "this word expresses the EXISTENCE or BEING alone;" a definition which gives us the force of but one half the compound; the on, but not the aei. And yet he himself says in another place, with singular inconsistency, "Aei on is a form of speech which is used at times, and indeed not unfrequently, by ancient Greek writers, to signify eternal;" and quotes Phavorinus as saying, "Aion is formed from aei and on, in the same manner as aeikizien plainly is from aeikizien." When, therefore, after again quoting Phavorinus as saying in his definition after the Etymological Magnum, "Aion is also the eternal and endless as it is regarded by the theologian," we find Mr. Goodwin adding, "Here I strongly suspect is the true secret brought to light of the origin of the sense of eternity in aion: the theologian first thought he perceived it, or else he placed it there; the theologian keeps it there now; and the theologian will probably retain it there longer than any one else;" we are almost equally shocked at the palpable misrepresentation of facts, and the wanton violation of Christian charity. "For," to use his own language, "it is a word on whose true meaning a doctrine of religion depends, embracing one of the most important principles of the Divine administration; the most momentous interests of the soul; and the entire character of the Christian religion. It is one of those cases in which a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. And the trumpet of a watchman, on an elevated watch-tower in Zion, ought to utter a full, clear, and certain sound; the distinct echoes of which he will be listening for in the depths of the spirit, and will be glad to be hearing, in every region and every period, through all eternity." With these last sentiments we do most cordially coincide, and shall endeavor to be governed by them in practice.

We have already seen that the primary and proper signification of aion is, that which always exists. But in this word, as in all others, usage always modifies the original meaning. Hence it is of the utmost consequence to understand how far the meaning of aion was affected among the Greeks by usage; and more especially how it was understood at the time the Old Testament was first translated into Greek. That version called the Septuagint, which was in common use among the Jews in the time of our Lord, it is well known was made from the original Hebrew, about 300 years before Christ. The Hebrew word olam, or olim, which occurs three hundred and eight times, is, with the exception of about twenty instances, invariably translated by the word aion, in some one of its various forms. Hence the two words were evidently regarded by the learned translators as equivalent in signification, or at least more nearly so than any other. If, therefore, we can ascertain how aion was then understood among the Greeks, we shall be able to ascertain what sense the translators attached to the Hebrew olam. Happily, we have one of the best of witnesses to the usage of aion, at that time, and by the earlier Greek writers, in Aristotle, the illustrious preceptor of Alexander the Great. In his treatise De Caelo, in describing the highest heaven as the residence of the gods, he says, "It therefore is evident that there is neither place, nor vacuum, nor time beyond. Wherefore the things there, are not by nature adapted to exist in place; nor does time make them grow old; neither under the highest [heaven] is there any change of any one of these things, they being placed beyond it; but unchangeable and passionless, having the best, even the self-sufficient life, they continue through all (aionna) eternity." For indeed the word itself, according to the ancients, divinely expressed this. For the period which comprehends the time of every one's life, beyond which according to nature nothing exists, is called his (aion) eternity. And for the same reason also, the period of the whole heaven, even the infinite time of all things, and the period comprehending that infinity, is (aion) eternity; deriving its name from (aei einai) always being, immortal and divine. (Where also it is applied to other things, to some indeed (akribesteron) accurately, but to others (amauroteron) in the lax signification of (to cinai te kai zen) being and even life."—Aristotle, De Caelo, Lib. 1. Cap. 9.

Nothing can be more explicit or satisfactory than this testimony, as to the origin and usage of aion; and a more competent witness never lived than Aristotle. Such, then, we may say with certainty, was the meaning attached to this word, at the very time the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament was made. When used in the sense of eternity, it was used accurately; when used in a modified sense, it was used figuratively, or improperly. In exact accordance with this representation, we find Taylor, in his Hebrew Concordance, gives to olam, (eis aiona), in one hundred and seventy-five instances, the sense of forever; and Gesenius, in the last edition of his celebrated Lexicon, assigns, as its primary and proper signification, the sense of (ewigkeit), eternity. Indeed, this prince of Hebrew lexicographers gives it no other definition; only remarking, that it is often with the Hebrews, as with us, in common speech, used inaccurately. The same signification, of course, belongs to aion in the Septuagint. And in this sense of unlimited duration must it always be taken, unless something appears in the subject or connection in which it occurs, to limit its signification; that is, to show that it is used figuratively, and not in its proper acceptation. Now, in all the cases relied upon by Mr. Balfour and others, to disprove its endless signification, it is clear that something of this extraneous evidence exists, to modify the meaning of the word. But this evidence by no means disproves its endless signification, when properly employed. It only proves that, in certain cases, the word is used hyperbolically. And this is no more than is true of all words, even those of the best established meaning.* A little care and candor will suffice to prevent any mistake from such an occasional use of the word. It is only the caviller that is caught in the snare of his own skepticism, or in the partiality of his prejudiced investigation; and held, perhaps, in the pride of his self-consistency, and of his publicly committed character. 2 Tim. 2: 23—26. But God has said, "the meek will be guide in judgment; the meek will he teach his way." Ps. 25: 9.

To the established meaning of unlimited duration belonging to aion, it has been objected, 1. That the Greek term will admit of a plural, which the English word eternity will not. But it might as well be contended, that forever cannot properly mean unlimited duration, because another ever may be added to it, as that aion must necessarily mean a limited duration on account of its admitting a plural form of expression. The truths, such expressions are merely intensives, as every scholar skilled in the use of language must know, and as every man of plain common sense, unbiassed by a peculiar theological system, at once perceives and feels. See 1 Tim. 1: 17.

2. But it has been said, that aion admits the pronouns this and that before it, which the English words eternity and forever do not. See Luke 20: 35. In this case, however, and others of a parallel description, the admission of the pronoun is owing to a peculiar usage of the term aion in the sense of world; and it designates, not, as some have absurdly rendered it, the Mosaic age in distinction from that of the Messiah; but the entire present state of existence in distinction from the future, which is to follow resurrection of the dead." The whole context fixes this meaning beyond the possibility of mistake.

3. The advocates of a limited meaning to this and its kindred words, adopt a rule of interpretation to this effect, "That where a word is used in relation to different things, the subject itself must determine the meaning of the word." But this rule, as it here stands, and as used by them, involves a gross sophism. It supposes that words have no proper meaning of their own, and that they are to stand for nothing in the decision of any question; but are to mean any thing that the subject to which they relate can be proved to mean without them. The sound rule of interpretation in all such cases is, "That the subject—including the connection, or scope of the passage—must commonly determine whether a word should be taken in a literal or figurative sense." This rule allows every word to have a proper meaning of its own, only modified by the connection in which it is introduced; while the other rule reduces words to mere ciphers, and, if adopted universally, would annihilate language, as the vehicle of communicating ideas. From the nature of things, it may be safely affirmed, that endless punishment can be neither proved on the one hand, nor disproved on the other. The subject involves the adjustment of relations too complicated and vast for human decision. Every truly reasonable man, believing in Divine Revelation, will therefore yield all his speculations on this awful subject, to the authoritative announcements which come to us all from the throne of God. Without seeking to evade the proper meaning of the language in which these divine discoveries are made known, he will, amid a world of conflicting opinions, cleave steadfastly "to the law and the testimony," saying, with the greatest of apostles, "LET GOD BE TRUE, AND EVERY MAN A LIAR." Rom. 3: 4. He will imitate the example of Noah, who "being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark for the saving of his house; by which he condemned the world and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Heb. 11: 7.

4. But the evidence on this subject is attempted to be discredited, by alleging the few instances in which aion and its kindred terms are used in the Scriptures in relation to future punishment. It should be remembered, however, that these terms are employed in Scripture in relation to at least twenty different subjects; so that, to be applied in numerous instances to this one in particular, is by no means to be expected. Besides, other phrases equally expressive of the same thing, are often employed. And even if there were no other terms than these, and these were used but five or six times, surely five or six solemn repetitions of such a truth, from the mouth of God, ought to be enough to fix it in our hearts. "FOR THE THINGS THAT ARE SEEN ARE (proskaira) TEMPORAL; BUT THE THINGS THAT ARE NOT SEEN ARE (aiōnio) ETERNAL." 2 Cor. 4: 18.—Fuller's Letters to Mr. Vidler; Balfour's Second Inquiry, and Letters to Professor Stuart; Christian Examiner; Stuart's Exegetical Essays.

AIR; that thin, fluid, elastic, transparent, ponderous, compressible body which surrounds the terraqueous globe to a considerable height. In Scripture it is sometimes used for heaven; as "the birds of the air;" "the birds of heaven." To "beat the air," and "to speak to the air," 1 Cor. 9: 26. signify to fatigue ourselves in vain, and to speak to no purpose. "The prince of the power of the air" is the head and chief of the evil spirits, with which both Jews and heathens thought the air was filled.—See ADVERSARY; BEEZELZUBUB; HEAVEN.

ALABASTER; the name of a genus of fossils nearly allied to marble. It is a bright, elegant stone, sometimes of a snowy whiteness. It may be cut freely, and is capable of a fine polish; and, being of a soft nature, it is wrought into any form or figure with ease. Vases or cruises were anciently made of it, wherein to preserve odoriferous liquors and ointments. Pliny and others represent it as peculiarly proper for this purpose; and the druggists in Egypt have, at this day, vessels made of it, in which they keep their medicines and perfumes.

In Matthew 26: 6, 7, we read that Jesus being at table in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, a woman came thither and poured an alabaster box of ointment on his head. St. Mark adds, "She brake the box," which merely refers to the seal upon the vase which closed it, and kept the perfume from evaporating. This had never been removed, but was on this occasion broken, that is, first opened.—Watson.

ALAMOTH; the title of the forty-sixth Psalm. The Septuagint translates this "the song of hidden things," because, says Ainsworth, this song declares the secret purposes of God to his church.

ALARM; a broken quivering sound of the Hebrews' silver trumpets. It warned them to take their journey in the wilderness, and to attack their enemies in battle. Num. 10: 4—9. (2.) A noise or bustle, importing the near approach of danger and war. Joel 2: 1.

ALASCANI; the followers of John Alasco, a Polish Catholic bishop, uncle to the king of Poland; but who, embracing the principles of the Reformation, came to England in the reign of Edward VI. and was numbered among our reformers, and was much esteemed by them, though he differed from them, it is said, in applying the words, "This is my body," to both the elements. He was superintendent of the first Dutch church in Austin Friars, with four assistant ministers. He died in 1560, and his peculiar opinions probably died with him.—Ency. Perth; Robinson's Dict.

ALBAN; an English martyr of the third century, was originally a pagan, but his humanity led him in time of severe persecution to conceal a Christian minister, by whose means he was converted.—Fox.

ALBANENSES AND ALBANOIS; petty sects of the eighth century, probably the remains of the Gnostics and the Manicheans, which see.

ALBATI; hermits of the end of the fourteenth century, who wore long white garments; whence their name.—Broughton.

ALBERT, (JANE D';) queen of Navarre. This illustrious woman, the daughter of Albert II. king of Navarre, and Margaret de Valois, and the mother of Henry IV, was a pious Protestant. At twenty years of age, she was married to Anthony de Bourbon, duke de Vendome, by whom she had three sons. On the death of Albert II. in 1555, she became queen of Navarre; and, in unison with her husband, showed all the countenance the spirit of the times would permit, to the Reformed religion, which then began to gain ground. Some time after this, her zeal suffered a temporary relaxation, but upon the death of her husband, 1652, her faith and views became decided.

and understood. She provided for the safety of her kingdom, put her son under the care of a Huguenot professor, and adopted the most vigorous means to preserve her authority against the insurrections of her Catholic subjects, and the menaces of the court of Rome, before which, in 1653, she was in vain cited to appear.

She declared herself, in 1566, the protectress of the Protestants, and went to Rochelle, where she devoted her son to the defence of the reformed religion, and caused medals to be struck with these words, a safe peace, a complete victory, a glorious death! She did every thing in her power for the advancement of the cause of religious liberty; and used to say, that liberty of conscience ought to be preferred before honors, dignities, and life itself! She caused the New Testament, the Catechism, and the Liturgy of Geneva, to be translated and printed at Rochelle. She abolished popery, and established protestantism in her own dominions. In her leisure hours, she expressed her zeal by working tapestries with her own hands, in which she represented the monuments of that religious liberty she sought to establish. One suit consisted of twelve pieces: on each was represented some Scripture history of deliverance; Israel's coming out of Egypt; Joseph's release from prison, or something of the like kind. On the top of each were these words, Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty! and, in the corners, broken chains, fetters, and gibbets. They were worked in fashionable patterns; and dexterously directed the needles of the ladies to help forward the reformation. Brave and eloquent, Jane neglected nothing that heroism or prudence could dictate. Her jewels were mortgaged without reluctance, for the support of her troops: and a peace, very advantageous to the Protestants, was concluded in 1570.

She died in Paris, June 10th, 1572, at the age of forty-four, thus escaping the horrors of the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, which proved fatal to many of her friends. She was at first thought to have been poisoned; but on opening her body nothing was found to corroborate the suspicion.

During her sickness, she said, "I take all this as sent from the hand of God, my most merciful Father; nor have I during this extremity been afraid to die, much less have I murmured against God for inflicting this chastisement upon me, knowing that whatsoever he doth, he so ordereth it, as that in the end it shall turn to my everlasting good." Again she said, "that as to what concerned herself, her life was not dear unto her, since as long as she lived in this frail flesh, she was still prone and apt to sin against God, only she said she had a concern for the children God had given her, as they would, if she were now to die, be deprived of her in their earlier years;" yet, said she, "I doubt not though he should see fit to take me from them, but that he himself would be a Father to them, and a Protector over them, as I have ever experienced him to be to me, in my greatest afflictions, and therefore I commit them wholly to his government and fatherly care." She declared to her minister, "that death was not terrible to her, because it was the way to pass to her eternal rest." He afterwards proposed to her the following questions: "Do you verily believe that Jesus Christ came into the world to save you? and do you expect the full forgiveness of your sins by the shedding of his blood for you?" "Yes," replied she, "I do, believing that he is my only Savior and Mediator, and I look for salvation from none other, knowing that he hath made abundant satisfaction for the sins of his people, and therefore I am assured that God, for his sake, according to the gracious promise in him, will have mercy upon me." Being asked, "if it should please God by this sickness to call her to himself, whether she were willing?" she answered, "with all my heart; much more willing than to linger here below in this world, where I see nothing but vanity."

When she saw the ladies and gentlemen with her, weeping about her bed, she blamed them for it, saying, "I pray you do not weep for me, since God doth by this sickness call me hence to the enjoyment of a better life, and I am now entering the desired haven, towards which this frail vessel of mine has been so long steering."

During all the time of her sickness, she ceased not such edifying and comfortable discourses; sometimes intermixing them with most affectionate aspirations to God as a testimony of the hope and desire she had of enjoying him; often uttering these words, "O my God! in thy due time deliver me from this body of death, and from the miseries of the present life; that I may no more offend thee, and that I may attain to that felicity, which thou, in thy word, hast promised to bestow upon me." Neither did she manifest her pious affection by words only, but by her serene and cheerful countenance, as far as the decrease of her strength would allow, thereby giving a full evidence to all who beheld her, that no apprehensions of death could unhinge the steadfastness of her faith.

This princess left many writings, both in prose and verse. The greatness of her mind and talents have been acknowledged even by her enemies; and the Protestant religion has seldom had so firm and conscientious a friend. The character and fate of her son is well known. She left, likewise, a daughter, who inherited her mother's heart and talents, and continued faithful to the religion in which she had been instructed.

Jane d' Albert desired to be buried, without pomp, in the tomb of her father.—Betham's Biography.

ALBERT, (THE GREAT;) one of the scholastic divines, so called on account of his extraordinary acquirements. He was born 1194, died 1280. Most of his life was spent in Germany, where he was provincial of the order of Dominicans. He endeavored, in his theological writings, to unite the devotion of the Mystics with the logic and ethics of Aristotle.—Mosheim.

ALBERT, (PIERRE ANTOINE;) rector of the French Protestant Episcopal Church, in New York, was the descendant of a highly respectable family in Lausanne, Switzerland. Being invited to receive the charge of the church in the city of New York, which was founded by the persecuted Huguenots, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he commenced his labors July 26, 1797, and died July 12, 1806, in the forty-first year of his age. He was an accomplished gentleman, an erudite scholar, a profound theologian, and a most eloquent preacher. A stranger of unobtrusive manners, and invincible modesty, he led a very retired life. His worth, however, could not be concealed. He was esteemed and beloved by all his acquaintance.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALBIGENSES; a body of reformers about Toulouse and the Albigeois in Languedoc, who sprung up in the twelfth century, and distinguished themselves by their opposition to the church of Rome. They were charged with many errors by the monks of those days; but from these charges they are generally acquitted by the Protestants, who consider them only as inventions of the Romish church to blacken their character. The Albigenes grew so formidable, that the Catholics agreed upon a holy league or crusade against them. Pope Innocent III. desirous to put a stop to their progress, stirred up the great men of the kingdom to make war upon them. After suffering from their persecutors, they dwindled by little and little, till the time of the reformation; when such of them as were left, fell in with the Vandois, and conformed to the doctrine of Zuinglius, and the disciples of Geneva. The Albigenes have been frequently confounded with the Waldenses; from whom it is said they differ in many respects, both as being later far in point of time, as having their origin in a different country, and as being charged with divers heresies, particularly Manicheism, from which the Waldenses were exempt.—See Waldenses.

ALCUIN, OR ALBINUS, (FLACCUS;) an Englishman, renowned in his age for learning. The confidante, instructor, and adviser of Charlemagne. He was born in York, or, according to some, near London, 732; educated under the care of the venerable Bede and bishop Egbert; and was made abbot of Canterbury. Being in 782, at the French court, he exerted himself for the promotion of the sciences. Most of the schools of France were either founded or improved by him. He understood the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He died 804. He left besides many theological writings, several elementary works, in the branches of philosophy, rhetoric, and philology; also poems, and a large number of letters, the style of which, however, is not pleasing, and plainly betrays the uncultivated character of the age; nevertheless, he is acknowledge as the most learned and polished man of his time.

ALDEN, (JOHN); a magistrate of Plymouth colony, was one of the first company, which settled New England. He arrived in 1620, and his life was prolonged till September 12, 1687, when he died, aged about eighty-nine years. He was a very worthy and useful man, of great humility, and eminent piety. He was an assistant in the administration of every governor for sixty-seven years. A professed disciple of Jesus Christ, he lived in accordance with his profession. In his last illness he was patient and resigned, fully believing that God, who had imparted to him the love of excellence, would perfect the work which he had begun, and would render him completely holy in heaven.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALEWORTH, (JOHN); an English martyr, who died in prison, on account of his religion, during the reign of queen Mary, about the year 1558.

ALEPH; the name of the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, from which the Alpha of the Syrian and Greeks was formed. The word expresses a leading number, and sometimes signifies Prince or Chief.—See A.

ALEXANDER, (true GREAT); son and successor of Philip, king of Macedonia, is denoted in the prophecies of Daniel by a leopard with four wings, signifying his great strength, and the unusual rapidity of his conquests, Dan. 7. 6.; and by a one-horned he-goat running over the earth so swiftly as not to touch it, attacking a ram with two horns, overthrowing him, and trampling him under foot, without any being able to rescue him, Dan. 8: 4—7. The he-goat prefigured Alexander; the ram, Darius Codomanus, the last of the Persian kings. In the statue beheld by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, Dan. 2: 39, the belly of brass was the emblem of Alexander. He was appointed by God to destroy the Persian empire, and to substitute in its room the Grecian monarchy.

Alexander succeeded his father Philip, A. M. 3668, and B. C. 336. He was chosen, by the Greeks, general of their troops against the Persians, and entered Asia at the head of thirty-four thousand men, A. M. 3670. In one campaign he subdued almost all Asia Minor; and afterwards defeated, in the narrow passes which led from Syria to Cilicia, the army of Darius, which consisted of four hundred thousand foot, and one hundred thousand horse. Darius fled, and left in the hands of the conqueror, his camp, baggage, children, wife, and mother.

After subduing Syria, Alexander came to Tyre; and the Tyrians refusing him entrance into their city, he besieged it. At the same time he wrote to Jaddus, high priest of the Jews, that he expected to be acknowledged by him, and to receive from him the same submission which had hitherto been paid to the king of Persia. Jaddus refusing to comply, under the plea of having sworn fidelity to Darius, Alexander resolved to march against Jerusalem, when he had reduced Tyre. After a long siege, this city was taken and sacked; and Alexander entered the Palestine, A. M. 3672, and subjected it to his obedience. As he was marching against Jerusalem, the Jews became greatly alarmed, and had recourse to prayers and sacrifices. The Lord, in a dream, commanded Jaddus to open the gates to the conqueror, and, at the head of his people, dressed in his pontifical ornaments, and attended by the priests in their robes, to advance and meet the Macedonian king. Jaddus obeyed; and Alexander perceiving this company approaching, hastened towards the high priest, whom he saluted. He then adored God, whose name was engraven on a thin plate of gold, worn by the high priest upon his forehead. The kings of Syria who accompanied him, and the great officers about Alexander, could not comprehend the meaning of his conduct. Parmenio alone ventured to ask him why he adored the Jewish high priest; Alexander replied, that he paid this respect to God, and not to the high priest. "For," added he, "whilst I was yet in Macedonia, I saw the God of the Jews, who appeared to me in the same form and dress as the high priest at present, and who encouraged me, and commanded me to march boldly into Asia, promising that he would be my guide, and give me the empire of the Persians. As soon, therefore, as I perceived this habit, I recollected the vision, and understood that my undertaking was favored by God, and that under his protection I might expect prosperity." Having said this, Alexander accompanied Jaddus to Jerusalem, where he offered sacrifices in the temple according to the directions of the high priest. Jaddus is said to have showed him the prophecies of Daniel, in which the destruction of the Persian empire by Alexander is declared. The king was therefore confirmed in his opinion, that God had chosen him to execute this great work. At his departure, Alexander bade the Jews ask of him what they would. The high priest desired only the liberty of living under his government according to their own laws, and an exemption from tribute every seventh year, because in that year the Jews neither tilled their grounds, nor reaped their fruits. With this request Alexander readily complied.

Having left Jerusalem, Alexander visited other cities of Palestine, and was every where received with great testimonies of friendship and submission. The Samaritans who dwelt at Sichem, and were apostates from the Jewish religion, observing how kindly Alexander had treated the Jews, resolved to say that they also were by religion Jews. For it was their practice, when they saw the affairs of the Jews in a prosperous state, to boast that they were descended from Manasseh and Ephraim; but when they thought it their interest to say the contrary, they failed not to affirm, and even to swear, that they were not related to the Jews. They came, therefore, with many demonstrations of joy, to meet Alexander, as far almost as the territories of Jerusalem. Alexander commended their zeal; and the Schemites entreated him to visit their temple and city. Alexander promised this at his return; but as they petitioned him for the same privileges as the Jews, he asked them if they were Jews. They replied, they were Hebrews, and were called by the Phœnicians, Schemites. Alexander said that he had granted this exemption only to the Jews, but that at his return he would inquire into the affair, and do them justice.

This prince having conquered Egypt, and regulated it, gave orders for the building of the city of Alexandria, and departed thence, about spring, in pursuit of Darius. Passing through Palestine, he was informed that the Samaritans, in a general insurrection, had killed Andromachus, governor of Syria and Palestine, who had come to Samaria to regulate some affairs. This action greatly incensed Alexander, who loved Andromachus. He therefore commanded all those who were concerned in his murder to be put to death, and the rest to be banished from Samaria; and settled a colony of Macedonians in their room. What remained of their lands he gave to the Jews, and exempted them from the payment of tribute. The Samaritans who escaped this calamity, retired to Sichem, at the foot of mount Gerizim, which afterwards became their capital. The eight thousand men of this nation, who were in the service of Alexander, and had accompanied him since the siege of Tyre, if permitted to return to their own country, should renew the spirit of rebellion, he sent them into Thebais, the most remote southern province of Egypt, where he assigned them lands.

Alexander after defeating Darius in a pitched battle, and subduing all Asia and the Indies with incredible rapidity, gave himself up to intemperance. Having drunk to excess, he fell sick and died, after he had obliged "all the world to be quiet before him," 1 Macc. 1: 3. Being sensible that his end was near, he sent for the grandees of his court, and declared that "he gave the empire to the most deserving." Some affirm that he regulated the succession by a will. The author of the First Book of Maccabees says, that he divided his kingdom among his generals while he was living. 1 Macc. 1: 7. This he might do; or he might express his foresight of what actually took place after his death. It is certain, that a partition was made of Alexander's dominions among the four principal officers of his army, and that the empire which he founded in Asia subsisted for many ages. Alexander died, A. M. 3684, and B. C. 323, in the thirty-third year of his age, and the twelfth of his reign. The above particulars of Alexander are here introduced because, from his invasion of Palestine, the intercourse of the Jews with the Greeks became intimate, and influenced many events of their subsequent history.

On the account above given of the interview between Alexander and the Jewish high priest, by Josephus, many doubts have been cast by critics. But the sudden change of his feelings towards them, and the favor with which the nation was treated by him, render the story not improbable.—Watson.

ALEXANDRIA; a famous city of Egypt, and long the great seat of commerce and of wealth. It was founded or enlarged, about three hundred and thirty-three years before Christ, and is now the only remaining monument of the widely extended conquests of that great and renowned warrior after whom it was named. The long and severe check which he met with before the city of Tyre, in the career of his victories, would, no doubt, convince him of the vast resources of a maritime power, and of the immense importance of commerce; and it was this which is supposed to have induced him, after the subjection of Egypt, to avail himself of the favorable commercial situation of that country, and to lay the foundation of that city, which from its vicinity to the Medierranean sea, and the Arabian gulf, has, amidst all the successive revolutions of Egypt, from the time of the Ptolemies till the discovery of the navigation by the cape of Good Hope, commanded the trade of both the east and the west. From that period, however, which begins a new era in the history of commerce, the trade of India has flowed in other channels; and the streams of its former wealth being dried up, Alexandria has gradually decayed, and is now deserving of notice only on account of its past greatness and celebrity. Alexander himself drew the plan of the new city; and as there were no instruments at hand proper for the purpose, he traced out the course of the walls, by scattering meal along the ground; a circumstance which his soothsayer interpreted as a presage of future abundance. The execution of the plan was intrusted to Denocrates, the celebrated architect, who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, whilst Alexander advanced to survey the wonders of Upper Egypt. Upon his return, about a year afterwards, the city was nearly finished; and having peopled it with inhabitants from the neighboring towns, he pursued the course of his conquests.

Ancient Alexandria stood about twelve miles from the Canopic branch of the Nile, with which it was united by a canal. The lake Mareotis bathed its walls on the south, and the Mediterranean on the north. It was divided into straight parallel streets, cutting one another at right angles. One great street, two thousand feet wide, ran through the whole length of the city, beginning at the gate of the sea, and terminating at the gate of Canopus. It was intersected by another of the same breadth, which formed a square at their junction half a league in circumference. From the centre of this great place, the two gates were to be seen at once, and vessels arriving under full sail from both the north and the south. In these two principal streets, the noblest in the universe, stood their most magnificent palaces, temples, and public buildings, in which the eye was never tired with admiring the marble, the porphyry, and the obelisks, which were destined at some future day to embellish the metropolis of the world. The chief glory of Alexandria was its harbor. It was a deep and secure bay in the Medierranean, formed by the shore on the one side, and the island of Pharos on the other, and where numerous fleets might lie in complete safety. Without the walls of Alexandria, and stretching along the shores of the Mediterranean, near to the promontory of Lectreos, was situated the palace and gardens of the Ptolemies. They contained within their inclosure the museum, an asylum for learned men, groves and buildings worthy of royal majesty, and a temple where the body of Alexander was deposited in a golden coffin. It were endless to enumerate the many palaces, temples, theatres, and other buildings with which Alexandria and its suburbs were adorned.

Alexandria owed much of its glory to the Ptolemies. Ptolemy Soter, the first of that line of kings, and one of the captains of Alexander, who, on the death of his master, seized on his Egyptian dominions, fixed the royal residence in this city, about three hundred and four years before Christ. This prince instituted the academy called the Museum, in which a society of learned men devoted themselves to the study of the sciences. He likewise founded for their use the Alexandrian library, which was afterwards so prodigiously increased, and one of the greatest ornaments of this celebrated city. It is said to have amounted to no less than seven hundred thousand volumes, before its destruction. With these advantages, and under the continued patronage of its sovereigns, Alexandria soon became one of the most distinguished seats of learning and philosophy, and preserved its celebrity till it was plundered of all its literary treasures by the barbarous hands of the Saracens. Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of Soter, completed the tower of Pharos, which his father had already begun. This was the famous lighthouse which was built on the island of that name, for the direction of the innumerable vessels which entered the harbor, and was reckoned amongst the wonders of the world.

Alexandria continued for nearly three hundred years in the possession of the Ptolemies; but at the death of Cleopatra, it passed into the power of the Romans, and was the theatre of several memorable events in the history of that people. It sometimes might receive a favor at the hands of its masters; but it as frequently obtained its full share of all the calamities which the tyranny, the cruelty, or weakness of the Roman emperors inflicted on the rest of the empire.

The first inhabitants of Alexandria were Egyptians and Greeks, to whom must be added numerous colonies of Jews, transplanted thither B. C. 336, 320, and 312, to increase the population, who, becoming familiar with the Greek language and learning, were called HELLENISTS. It was they who made the well-known translation of the Old Testament under the name of the Septuagint. (See SEPTUAGINT.)

The modern Alexandria does not occupy the site of the ancient city, of which only the ruins remain. The town has now two citadels and harbors, and its commerce is improving; but the population, which formerly amounted to three hundred thousand, is now reduced to thirteen thousand. It is the seat of a Christian patriarch, but under a Mohammedan power. The history of its conquest and consequent decay, according to the best historians, is as follows:

A. D. 638, the Saracens invaded Egypt, and the following year Amrou, their general, commenced the siege of Alexandria, which was perhaps the most arduous enterprise in the annals of his conquests. After a vigorous resistance of about fourteen months, the Saracens, however, prevailed, and the standard of Mahomet was planted on the walls of the capital of Egypt. It was at this time that the Alexandrian library met with its memorable fate; although this fact, has been recently controverted in the Encyclopedia Americana, we know not on what authority. (See ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY.)

Under the Roman and Greek emperors, as well as under the Ptolemies, for nearly a space of one thousand years, Alexandria continued to maintain its reputation for power and wealth, and likewise for literature and science: but from the period when it came under the dominion of the Saracens, all its glories have declined, till it has gradually arrived at its present degradation. When commerce revived in the thirteenth century, it naturally looked out for its former well-known channel; and the condition of Alexandria began again for a short time to brighten; but the discovery of the cape of Good Hope, which happened about that time, soon crushed its returning prosperity, and forever diverted the sources of its wealth into a different course.

The present state of this city presents a scene of magnificent ruin and desolation. For the space of two leagues, nothing is to be seen but the remains of pilasters, of capitals, and of obelisks, and whole mountains of shattered monuments of ancient art, heaped upon one another to a greater height than that of the houses. The famous tower of Pharos has been long since demolished, and a square castle, without taste, ornament, or strength, erected in its stead. The lake Mareotis, through the carelessness of the Turks in preserving the canals which conveyed the waters of the Nile, no longer exists; but its place is now occupied by the sands of Lybia.—Edin. Ency. article ALEXANDRIA.

But it is the ecclesiastical history of ALEXANDRIA, in which the biblical student is chiefly interested; and therefore it may be proper to follow up the preceding account with a few of the more important particulars of that kind which are upon record.

When Alexander the Great had finished this renowned city, he gave considerable encouragement to the Jews to settle in it; and to induce them so to do, he endowed it with peculiar privileges and immunities, allowed them the free exercise of their religion, and admitted them to a share of the same franchises and liberties which he granted to his own Macedonian subjects. Not long after the death of that ambitious and enterprising monarch, Ptolemy, king of Egypt, invaded Judea, laid siege to Jerusalem, of which he took possession about three hundred and twenty years before Christ, and carried an hundred thousand of the Jews captive into Egypt; to whom he confirmed all the immunities and privileges which had been formerly granted to their brethren by Alexander the Great, and spared no encouragement to allure others to settle in Egypt. The consequence of this was, that multitudes of them were continually flocking thither from Judea and Samaria, preferring rather to live under so generous and friendly a prince in a foreign country, than to be subject to the incessant changes of government which were occasioned by so many contending tyrants in their own. Accordingly the city of Alexandria was in a great measure peopled by Jews, and it is chiefly this circumstance which connects its history with the elucidation of the Scriptures. Hence we read, Acts 2: 10. that among those who came up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of pentecost, there were Jews, devout men, from Egypt and the parts of Lybia about Cyrene, in which Alexandria was situated. Of this city, Apollos, the companion of Paul, was a native, Acts 18: 24.; and of the Jews that disputed with Stephen and put him to death, many were Alexandrians, who, it seems, had a synagogue at that time in Jerusalem. Acts 6: 9. But to form an estimate of the number of Jews that stately resided at Alexandria, it may be sufficient to mention that about the year of Christ 67, while the quarrel was going on between that people and the Romans, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple, the subversion of their ecclesiastical polity and their ruin as a nation, fifty thousand of them were said to death at one time in the city of Alexandria! It is put that at the time this terrible event took place, there were not less than a million of Jews dispersed throughout the whole province of Egypt, in which they had a vast number of synagogues, and oratories which were either demolished or consumed by fire, for refusing to set up the statues of the Roman emperor, Caius Caligula. See Anc. Univ. Hist. Appendix to vol. xiv. octavo edition.

Christianity was planted in Alexandria at a very early period; and it is very probable that it was first carried there by some of the Jews who were converted by the preaching of Peter on the day of Pentecost, Acts 2.; for nothing can be more natural than to suppose, that those who had themselves been blessed with the knowledge of the Savior, should carry the glad tidings with them to their own homes and make known the way of salvation to others. For several ages the light of the glorious Gospel shone conspicuously in this great city, which gave birth to many eminent men, particularly to Clemens, to Origen, and others. This city is also famous for having given rise to the Arian controversy, respecting the doctrine of Christ's Sonship; a subject, however, upon which it is neither proper nor necessary here to enter. See Jones' Hist. of the Christian Church; vol. i. p. 314, &c.

ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY. This celebrated collection of books was first founded by Ptolemy Soter, for the use of the academy, or society of learned men, which he had founded at Alexandria. Besides the books which he procured, his son, Ptolemy Philadelphus, added many more, and left in this library at his death a hundred thousand volumes; and the succeeding princes of this race enlarged it still more, till at length the books lodged in it amounted to the number of seven hundred thousand volumes. The method by which they are said to have collected these books was this: they seized all the books that were brought by the Greeks or other foreigners into Egypt, and sent them to the academy, or museum, where they were transcribed by persons employed for that purpose. The transcripts were then delivered to the proprietors, and the originals laid up in the library. Ptolemy Energetes, for instance, borrowed of the Athenians the works of Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus, and only returned them the copies, which he caused to be transcribed in as beautiful a manner as possible; the originals he retained for his own library, presenting the Athenians with fifteen talents for the exchange, that is, with three thousand pounds sterling and upwards. As the museum was at first in the quarter of the city called Bruchion, the library was placed there; but when the number of books amounted to four hundred thousand volumes, another library, within the Serapeum, was erected by way of supplement to it, and, on that account, called the daughter of the former. The books lodged in this increased to the number of three hundred thousand volumes; and these two made up the number of seven hundred thousand volumes, of which the royal libraries of the Ptolemies were said to consist. In the war which Julius Cæsar waged with the inhabitants of Alexandria, the library of Bruchion was accidentally, but unfortunately, burnt. But the library in Serapeum still remained, and there Cleopatra deposited the two hundred thousand volumes of the Pergamean library with which she was presented by Mark Antony. These, and others added to them from time to time, rendered the new library more numerous and considerable than the former; and though it was plundered more than once during the revolutions which happened in the Roman empire, yet it was as frequently supplied with the same number of books, and continued, for many ages, to be of great fame and use, till it was burnt by the Saracens, A. D. 642. Abulpharagins, in his history of the tenth dynasty, gives the following account of this catastrophe: John Philoponus, surnamed the Grammarian, a famous Peripatetic philosopher, being at Alexandria when the city was taken by the Saracens, was admitted to familiar intercourse with Amrou, the Arabian general, and presumed to solicit a gift, inestimable in his opinion, but contemptible in that of the barbarians; and this was the royal library. Amrou was inclined to gratify his wish, but his rigid integrity scrupled to alienate the least object without the consent of the caliph. He accordingly wrote to Omar, whose well known answer was dictated by the ignorance of a fanatic: "If these writings of the Greeks agree with the Koran or book of God, they are useless, and need not be preserved; if they disagree, they are pernicious, and ought to be destroyed." The sentence of destruction was executed with blind obedience: the volumes of paper or parchment were distributed to the four thousand baths of the city; and such was their number, that six months were barely sufficient for the consumption of this precious fuel.—Watson.

ALEXANDRIAN MANUSCRIPT; a famous copy of the Scriptures, in four volumes quarto. It contains the whole Bible in Greek, including the Old and New Testament, with the Apocrypha, and some smaller pieces, but not quite complete. It is preserved in the British museum: it was sent as a present to king Charles I. from Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, by Sir Thomas Rowe, ambassador from England to the Grand Seigneur, about the year 1628. Cyrillus brought it with him from Alexandria, where probably it was written. In a schedule annexed to it, he gives this account:—That it was written, as tradition informed them, by Thecla, a noble Egyptian lady, about thirteen hundred years ago, not long after the council of Nice. But this high antiquity, and the authority of the tradition to which the patriarch refers, have been disputed; nor are the most accurate biblical writers agreed about its age. Grabe thinks that it might have been written before the end of the fourth century; others are of opinion that it was not written till near the end of the fifth century, or somewhat later. See Mr. Buber and Dr. Woide's edition.

ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL. No sooner had Alexander built a city, and called it after his own name, than he endeavored to make it the seat of philosophy and the arts; and here were collected the most considerable professors from Greece, Egypt, and the East; and the mixture of the different systems introduced a confusion of opinions, which not only affected materially the state of the heathen world, but even of the Christian, and produced most of the heresies which disfigured, and tormented the church in its first ages, particularly those of the Gnostics and Manichæans.

But the chief manufacturer of these absurdities was Ammonius Saccas, the founder of the new Platonics in the second century, whose followers were sometimes called Ammonians. "To this philosophy (says Dr. Mosheim) we may trace, as to their source, a multitude of vain and foolish ceremonies, proper only to cast a veil over truth, and to nourish superstition; and which are, for the most part, religiously observed by many, even in the times in which we live. It would be endless to enumerate all the pernicious consequences that may be justly attributed to this new philosophy; or rather, to this monstrous attempt to reconcile falsehood with truth, and light with darkness. Some of its most fatal effects were—its alienating the minds of many, in the following ages, from the Christian religion; and its substituting, in the place of the pure and sublime simplicity of the Gospel, an unseemly mixture of Platonism and Christianity."—Mosheim, vol. i. p. 169—176.

ALFORD, (JOHN;) founder of the professorship of natural religion, moral philosophy, and civil polity, in Harvard college, died at Charlestown, Sept. 29, 1761, aged 75. He had been a member of the council. His executors determined the particular objects to which his bequest for charitable uses should be applied, and divided it equally between Harvard college, Princeton college, and the Society for the propagation of the Gospel among the Indians. To the latter, ten thousand six hundred and seventy-five dollars were paid in 1787. Levi Frisbie was the first Alford professor.—Allen's B. Dict.

ALFRED, justly denominated the GREAT; the youngest son of Ethelwolf, was born at Wantage, in Berkshire, in 849, and succeeded to the English throne in 871, on the death of Ethelred, the last survivor of his brother. From his accession to the year 877, he was engaged in almost continual contests with the Danes, who at last compelled him to abandon the throne, and conceal himself in disguise in the cottage of one of his herdsman. It was while he was thus concealed, that he was harshly reproved by his hostess, for having allowed some cakes to be burned, the baking of which she had directed him to watch. He next retired with a few followers to the isle of Athelney.

In this situation he formed the design of freeing his country. He ordered his subjects to hold themselves in readiness against the enemy, gave the intelligence of his retreat, and informed himself of the condition of the Danes. He went disguised as a harper, into the camp of Guthurn, and, having ascertained that the Danes felt themselves secure, hastened back to his troops, led them against the enemy, and gained such a decided victory, that the Danes begged for peace. Those who were already in the country he allowed to remain there, on the condition that they and their king should embrace Christianity. During a part of the remainder of his reign, he had to contend against repeated invasions, but was uniformly successful in repelling them. By sea or land he fought no less than fifty-six battles. As soon as he resumed his authority he began to cultivate the arts of peace. He reformed the laws; established trial by jury; divided the country into shires and hundreds; encouraged commerce and maritime discovery; invited learned men from all quarters; endowed seminaries; restored, if not founded, the university of Oxford; and gave lustre to literature in the eyes of the people, by himself composing and translating numerous works, on a variety of subjects. Scotus and Grimbold, from abroad; Asserius, Wenfred, Plegmund, Dunwuf, Wulfsig, and the abbot of St. Neot's, deserve the first rank among the literati who adorned the age of Alfred. He himself acquired an immortal name by the admirable progress he made in all kinds of elegant and useful knowledge. Among his other pious and learned labors, he translated into English Bede's Ecclesiastical History, Boetius De Consolatione, and the Book of Psalms. He died A. D. 900.

The history of Alfred, says the Encyclopædia Americana, considering the times in which he lived, presents one of the most perfect examples on record of the able and patriotic monarch united with the virtuous man.

"If the soul of Alfred," says Foster, "could return to the earth!"—"Were Alfred," says Mr. Douglas in his Advancement of Society, "restored to life, (as it was believed of the just that they should again tread the earth in the latter days, and enjoy the fruits of that which in their first life they planted in equity and righteousness,) that peerless king could, at this moment, with a touch set the social machine in movement."

ALGERIUS. In the year 1555, Algerius, a student in the university of Padua, and a man of great learning, having embraced the reformed religion, did all he could to convert others. For these proceedings he was accused of heresy to the pope, and being apprehended, was committed to prison at Venice, when being allowed the use of pen, ink, and paper, he wrote to his converts at Padua the following celebrated epistle:—

DEAR FRIENDS—I cannot omit this opportunity of letting you know the sincere pleasure I feel in my confinement: to suffer for Christ is delectable indeed; to undergo a little transitory pain in this world, for his sake, is cheaply purchasing a reversion of eternal glory, in a life that is everlasting.

Here I have found honey in the entrails of a lion; a paradise in a prison; tranquillity in the house of sorrow; when others weep, I rejoice; when others tremble and faint, I find strength and courage. The Almighty alone confers these favors upon me; he his the glory and the praise.

How different do I find myself from what I was before. I embraced the truth in its purity; I was then dark, doubtful, and in dread; I am now enlightened, certain, and full of joy. He that was far from me is present with me; he comforts my spirit, heals my griefs, strengthens my mind, refreshes my heart, and fortifies my soul. Learn, therefore, how merciful and amiable the Lord is, who supports his servants under temptation, expels their sorrows, lightens their afflictions, and even visits them with his glorious presence, in the gloom of a dungeon.

Your sincere friend,

ALGERIUS.

The pope being informed of Algerius's great learning, and surprising natural abilities, thought it would be of infinite importance to the church of Rome, if he could induce him to forsake the Protestant cause. But finding all his endeavors ineffectual, he ordered him to be burnt, which sentence was executed accordingly.—Fox.

ALL;—1. Every creature. Prov. 16: 4. Ps. 119: 91. or every part. Song 4: 7.—2. Every man. 2 Cor. 5: 10.—3. Plentiful, perfect. Rom. 15: 13. 1 Cor. 13: 2.—4. Men of all nations, ranks, and degrees. 1 Tim. 2: 4.—Tit. 2: 11.—5. Many, or the greatest part. Matt. 3: 5. Phil. 2: 21. Thus it is said, ALL the cattle of the land of Egypt died; the hail brake EVERY tree of the field. Exod. 9: 6, 9. ALL the people brake off the gold earrings which were in their ears. Exod. 32: 3. ALL the beasts of the nations lodged in the lintels of Nineveh. Zeph. 2: 14. The fame of David went forth into ALL lands. 1 Chron. 14: 17. ALL Judea, and ALL the region round about Jordan, went out to John and were baptized of him. ALL men held John as a prophet. The apostles were hated of ALL men. Matt. 3: 5, 6. 21: 26. 10: 32. ALL men came to Jesus. John 3: 26. Then were at Jerusalem, Jews of EVERY nation under heaven. Acts 2: 5. See WORLD. How evident then the folly of such as found their universal redemption on this word, that must be so often restricted! and which is frequently limited by the context, by the nature of the thing spoken of, or by the objects of it! Thus servants are required to please their masters well in ALL things. Tit. 2: 9.; and the Lord is said to uphold ALL that fall, and raise up ALL that are bowed down. Ps. 145: 14. The ALL men of Asia that turned away from Paul, denote a great many professed Christians there. 2 Tim. 1: 15. As the ultimate design of Christianity is the conversion of the world, and as this will be its actual effect during the glorious ages of the millennium, Dan. 2. Rev. 11: 15. 29: 1—6. it is no wonder that the sacred writers delight in the use of the most comprehensive and magnificent expressions when speaking of the influence of the Gospel on mankind. Hence those who are chosen to salvation may without impropriety be called ALL, or EVERY man; ALL the ends of the earth; ALL THE WORLD; because they spring from all nations, Jews and Gentiles; dwell in all places; are of every rank and condition; and are the substance of the earth; for whose behalf it is chiefly preserved and favored. See Gospel Advocate, (Boston,) June, 1821.—Williams.

ALLEGORY; a figurative mode of speech or composition, which consists in selecting something analogous to a subject, instead of the subject itself; and describing at length the particulars belonging to the former, in such a manner as to illustrate what we mean to enforce respecting the latter. It may be compared to an emblematical painting, in which we are left to discover the intention of the artist by our own meditation; with this difference, that in the one, colors and forms are employed, in the other, words only. Both exercise the judgment, as well as the imagination, by pointing out some striking relation between objects which may nevertheless be very different in many respects; but which agree so well in the circumstances brought before us, that though the representative object is alone placed in our view, the resemblance leads us at once to apply all the particulars to the subject represented. Our ingenuity is thus exercised in a pleasing manner, and we are at the same time instructed and informed.

An allegory, a metaphor, and a parable, are nearly allied; and we find each of them occasionally adopted by the inspired writers in conveying their instructions to us. The masters of rhetoric, indeed, seem at a loss to discriminate between the allegory and the parable; if there be any difference, it must be this, that in any allegory, the speaker or writer makes use of a real history to convey his instructions, but in a parable he often has recourse to a feigned or supposed one. It may, however, be remarked, that an allegory is made up of a chain or continuation of metaphors; and differs from a single trope, as a cluster on the vine does from only one or two grapes. In the eightieth Psalm is one of the most beautiful and perfect examples of the allegory that is to be found in any language. Here the real history of the Old Testament church is obviously made use of by the Psalmist, as an allegory. Thus also the apostle makes use of the history of Hagar and Ishmael on the one hand, and that of Sarah and Isaac on the other, to illustrate the subject of the two covenants. Gal. 4: 24—30. Hagar is there taken to represent the covenant which the Lord entered into with the children of Israel at Mount Sinai, when they were made the visible church of God, put in bondage to the law, and were, by its curse, excluded from the inheritance of heaven, if they had no other relation to Abraham than that of mere natural descent. And in confirmation of the allegorical meaning of the facts recorded by Moses, the apostle goes on further to observe, that, as Ishmael who was begotten according to the flesh, persecuted Isaac, who was begotten according to the Spirit, so the Jews, the natural seed of Abraham, persecuted Abraham's spiritual seed, the believing Jews and Gentiles. Thus, as in the circumstances of his birth and condition, as also in his character and in his actions, Ishmael was a fit type of the unbelieving Jews, Abraham's natural seed.

But with regard to Sarah and Isaac, he places them in direct contrast to the bond-woman and her son. For Sarah is taken to represent the new covenant, which God hath made, not with the fleshly seed of Abraham, but with believers of all nations, of whom she is figuratively termed the mother. Sarah conceived her son Isaac supernaturally, and so became a type of that covenant under which men are regarded, by the power of God accompanying his word, and so become the children of "Jerusalem which is above," and which is free from both the bondage and the curse of the law. And as Isaac was the child of promise, so he is taken to represent that innumerable company of regenerated believers, who were promised to the Redeemer by the Father, as the reward of his atoning sorrows. Isa. 53: 10—12.—James's Bib. Cyc.

ALLEGORICAL INTERPRETATION. See INTERPRETATION.

ALLELUIA, or HALLELU-JAH, praise the Lord; or praise to the Lord. This word occurs at the beginning, or at the end, of many Psalms. Alleluia was sung on solemn days of rejoicing. Sr. John, in the Revelation, 19: 1, 3, 4, 6, says, "I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, who cried, Alleluia; and the four living creatures fell down, and worshipped God, saying, Alleluia." This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church. At the funeral of Fabiola, "several Psalms were sung with loud alleluia," says Jerome, in Epitaphio Paula. The monks of Palestine were awaked at their midnight watchings, with the singing of alleluia. It is still occasionally used in devotional psalmody.—Watson.

ALLEIN. (JOSRU;) author of "the Alarm;" a non-conformist divine, was born at Devizes, in Wiltshire, in the year 1623. At a very early age, his great piety and love of learning displayed themselves; and he earnestly requested his father, Mr. Tobias Allein, to educate him for the important work of the Christian ministry; to which he afterwards devoted his life, his mental talents, and his worldly property. In his classical attainments, he made great progress, and at a very early age manifested so ardent a spirit to promote the glory of Christ and the salvation of souls, that whatever he considered to be conducive to those ends, he prosecuted with great vigor. At the age of sixteen he was sent to Lincoln college, Oxford; and in 1651, was removed to Corpus Christi college, a Wiltshire scholarship being then vacant. There he was diligent in prosecuting his studies, consistent in his conduct, and affable towards his fellow students. He was near attaining a fellowship, but did not urge it, in order that he might embrace the honorable office of chaplain, being pleased with so favorable an opportunity of exercising his gift in prayer, an employment in which he peculiarly excelled. In 1653 he was admitted bachelor of arts, and soon after married a n amiable and pious lady. His income being small, he determined on becoming a tutor, and very soon had a great number of pupils, some of whom became graduates of divinity placed under his care; and who, in after-life, repaid him for his anxiety, by their gratitude, affection, and usefulness. He was assisted in increasing his income by Mrs. Allein, who kept a ladies' boarding school, in which also Mr. Allein took great interest. In his work as a minister of the Gospel, he was very assiduous and laborious; and he was constantly employed, when out of the pulpit, in assisting his brethren, or in supplying destitute congregations. In 1665 he became co-pastor with the Rev. George Newton, at Taunton; was eminently useful, and employed those means which he thought would best promote the glory of God. When the unwise and persecuting act of uniformity was passed, he was ejected; and on the 26th of May, 1663, was committed to Ilchester gaol; where after being treated with great indignity, together with seven ministers and fifty quakers, he was indicted at the assizes for preaching on the 17th of May, of which he was found guilty, and sentenced to pay one hundred marks, and not to be released till they were paid. He declared in court, "that whatsoever he was charged with, he was guilty of nothing but doing his duty." He however continued in prison a whole year, and during that trying period improved his time to the greatest advantage, both of himself and his fellow prisoners. After his release he was even more zealous in propagating the Gospel, till his exertions brought on an illness, which disabled him from continuing to perform such duties. In 1665, he was again apprehended, while at prayer, and, with some of his friends, was committed to prison for sixty days. Such confinement increased his disorder, and he rapidly became worse, till in the month of November, 1668, he was released from his sufferings at the premature age of 35. Mr. Allein was a man of unaffected and fervent piety, of an amiable temper, and courteous conversation; his intellects were solid and good, and his affections lively; and he died as he lived, universally respected and beloved. His works are not numerous, but they are useful and pious. See Memoirs of Allein.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

ALLEN, (WILLIAM;) a Protestant martyr, in the reign of queen Mary. He was burnt at Walsingham, September, 1555, for refusing to follow the cross in procession. He had declared such constancy at his martyrdom, and had met credit with the justices, by reason of his well tried character among them, that he was suffered to go untied to his suffering, and then being fastened with a chain, stood quietly without shrinking till he died.—Fox.

ALLEN, (JOHN;) first minister of Dedham, Massachusetts, was born in England in 1596, and was driven from his native land during the persecution of the Puritans. He had been for a number of years a faithful preacher of the Gospel. Soon after he arrived in New-England, he was settled pastor of the church at Dedham, April 24, 1639. Here he continued till his death, August 26, 1671, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. He was a man of great meekness and humility, and of considerable distinction in his day. He published a defence of the nine positions, in which, with Mr. Shepard of Cambridge, he disowns the points of church discipline; and a defence of the synod of 1662, against Mr. Chauncy, under the title of Animadversions upon the Antisynodalia, 4to. 1664. This work is preserved in the New England library. The two last sermons, which he preached, were printed after his death.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALLEN, (THOMAS;) minister of Charlestown, Massachusetts, was born at Norwich in England, in 1608, and was educated at Cambridge. He was afterwards minister of St. Edmund's in Norwich, but was silenced by bishop Wren, about the year 1636, for refusing to read the Book of Sports, and conform to other impositions. In 1638 he fled to New England, and was the same year installed in Charlestown, where he was a faithful preacher of the Gospel till about 1651, when he returned to Norwich, and continued the exercise of his ministry till 1662. He afterwards preached to his church on all occasions, that offered, till his death, September 21, 1673, aged 65. He was a very pious man, greatly beloved, and an able, practical preacher.

He published an Invitation to Thirsty Sinners to come to their Savior; the Way of the Spirit in bringing Souls to Christ; the Glory of Christ set forth, with the Necessity of Faith, in several sermons; a Chain of Scripture Chronology, from the Creation till the Death of Christ, in seven periods. This was printed in 1658, and was regarded as a very useful and learned work. It is preserved in the New-England library, established by Mr. Prince, by whom the authors quoted in the book are written in the beginning of it in his own hand. Mr. A. wrote also with Mr. Shepard in 1645, a preface to a Treatise on Liturgies, &c. composed by the latter. He contends, that only visible saints and believers should be received to communion.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALLEN, (JAMES;) minister in Boston, came to this country in 1662, recommended by Mr. Goodwin. He had been a fellow of New College, Oxford. He was at this time a young man, and possessed considerable talents. He was ordained teacher of the first church, December 9, 1668, as colleague with Mr. Davenport, who was at the same time ordained pastor. Mr. Allen died September 22, 1710, aged seventy-eight years. He published Healthful Diet, a sermon; New-England's choicest Blessings, an election sermon, 1679; Serious Advice to Delivered Ones, Man's Self-reflection, a Means to further his Recovery from his Apostasy from God; two practical discourses.—Allen's B. Dict.

ALLEN, (JAMES;) first minister of Brookline, Massachusetts, was a native of Roxbury, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1710. He was ordained November 5, 1718, and after a ministry of twenty-eight years, died of a lingering consumption February 18, 1747, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, with the reputation of a pious and judicious divine. In his last hours he had a hope, which he would not part with, as he said, for a thousand worlds.

He published a Thanksgiving Sermon, 1722; a Discourse on Providence, 1727; the Doctrine of Merit exploded, and Humility recommended, 1727; a Fast Sermon occasioned by the Earthquake, 1727; a Sermon to a Society of Young Men, 1731; a Sermon on the Death of S. Aspinwall, 1733; an Election Sermon, 1744.—Allen's B. Dict.

ALLEN, (HENRY;) a preacher in Nova Scotia, was born at Newport, R. I., June 14, 1748, and began to propagate his singular sentiments about the year 1778. He was a man of good capacity, but of warm imagination and uncultivated mind. He died at the house of Rev. Dr. McClure, New Hampton, New-Hampshire, February 2, 1784. Since his death his party has much declined.

He published a volume of hymns, and several treatises and sermons.—Allen's B. Dict. See ALLENITES.

ALLEN, (MOSES;) was born in Northampton, Massachusetts, September 14, 1748. He was educated at the college in New-Jersey, where he was graduated in 1772. He was ordained at Christ's Church parish, about twenty miles from Charleston, S. C., March 26, 1775. In 1777 he removed to Midway, Georgia. The British army from Florida, under General Prevost, dispersed his society in 1778, and burned the meeting-house, almost every dwelling house, and the crops of rice then in stacks. In December he was taken prisoner by the British, and treated with great severity. Seeing no prospect of release from the prison-ship where he was confined, he determined to attempt the recovery of his liberty by jumping overboard and swimming to an adjacent point; but he was drowned in the attempt February 8, 1779, in the thirty-first year of his age. Mr. Allen was admired by the friends of independence for his popular talents, his courage, and his many virtues. The enemies of independence could accuse him of nothing more, than a vigorous exertion of all his powers in defending the rights of his injured country. He was an eminently pious man.—Allen's B. Dict.

ALLEN, (THOMAS;) brother of the preceding, and first minister of Pittsfield, Mass.; was born January 7, 1743, at Northampton. He was educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1762, being ranked among the best classical scholars of the day. After studying theology under the direction of Mr. Hooker of Northampton, Mr. Allen was ordained April 18, 1764. During a ministry of forty-six years he was unwearied in dispensing the glorious Gospel. Besides his stated labors on the Sabbath, he frequently delivered lectures, and in the course of his life preached six or seven hundred funeral sermons.

He was very charitable to the poor, and his house was the seat of hospitality. Towards other denominations of Christians, though strict in his own principles, he was yet exemplarily candid. At the commencement of the revo-ition, like most of his brethren, he engaged warmly in the support of the rights and independence of his country. Twice he went out with the army as a volunteer chaplain for a short time.

In Mr. Allen the strength of those affections which constitute the charm of domestic and social life, was remarkable; giving indeed peculiar poignancy to the arrows of affliction, but also swelling in a high degree the amount of good found in the pilgrimage of earth.

His health had been gradually declining for several years before his death, and more than once he was brought to the brink of the grave. For several months he was unable to preach. He was fully aware of his approaching dissolution, and the prospect of eternity brightened as he drew near the close of his life. Those precious promises, which with peculiar tenderness he had often announced to the rich and the dying, were now his support. The all-sufficient Savior was his only hope; and he rested on him with perfect confidence. He was desirous of departing, and was chiefly anxious lest he should be impatient.

Knowing his dependence upon God, he continually sought those, who were about his bed, to pray for him. He took an affecting leave of his family, repeating his pious counsels, and bestowing upon each one his valedictory blessing. When he was reminded by a friend of his great labors in the ministry, he disclaimed all merit for what he had done, though he expressed his belief, that he had plainly and faithfully preached the Gospel. He forgave and prayed for his enemies. When one of his children, a day or two before his death, pressed him to take some nourishment, or it would be impossible for him to live; he replied, "Live! I am going to live forever!" He frequently exclaimed, "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly." In the morning of the Lord's day, February 11, 1810, he fell asleep in Jesus in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the forty-seventh of his ministry.

He published several sermons; and some letters of his, on the sickness and death of his daughter, were published in the Edinburg Missionary Magazine.—Allen's B. Dict.

ALLEN, (SOLOMON;) a useful minister of the Gospel, brother of the preceding, was born at Northampton, February 23, 1751. He with four of his brothers entered the army in the revolutionary war. Mr. Allen, in the course of the war, rose to the rank of major, and bore an honorable part in those trying scenes. After the war he was a conspicuous officer in quelling the insurrection of Shays. At the age of forty his soul was conquered by the power of the Gospel, which till then he had resisted; in a few years afterwards he was chosen deacon of the church at Northampton. As his personal piety increased, he became anxious to preach the Gospel. But at the age of fifty, with no advantages of education, there were formidable obstacles in his way. The ministers around him suggested discouragements, as he could hardly acquire the necessary qualifications. But his pious zeal was irrepressible. There were various branches of learning, which he could not hope to gain; but, "one thing he could do,—he could bring all the force of a naturally robust intellect to the work of searching the Scriptures. This he did, and while in this way he enriched his understanding from their abundant treasures, his faith was strengthened, his hope brightened, and all the Christian graces were refreshed from that "fountain of living waters." He read also Howe's and Baxter's works, and from these sources drew his theology. He wrote out a few sermons, and thus commenced the labor of preaching, at first in a few small towns in Hampshire county, but for the last years of his life in the western part of the state of New-York. He rejoiced in fatigues and privations in the service of his beloved Master. Sometimes in his journeys he reposed himself with nothing but a blanket to protect him from the inclemency of the weather. But though poor, he was the means of enriching many with the inestimable riches of religion. Four churches were established by him, and he numbered about two hundred souls, as by his preaching reclaimed from perdition. Though poor himself, there were those connected with him, who were rich, and by whose liberality he was enabled to accomplish his benevolent purposes. From such sources he expended about a thousand dollars in books and clothing for the people in the wilderness, while at the same time he toiled incessantly in teaching them the way to heaven. Such an example of disinterestedness drew from an enemy of the Gospel the following remark;—"This is a thing I cannot get along with: this old gentleman, who can be as rich as he pleases, comes here and does all these things for nothing; there must be something in his religion."

In the autumn of 1820, after having been nearly twenty years a preacher in the new settlements of the west, his declining health induced him to bid adieu to his people, in order to visit once more his children and friends. His parting with his church at Brighton was like the parting of Paul with the elders of the church of Ephesus. Many of the members of the church accompanied him to the boat, and tears were shed and prayers offered on the shore of lake Ontario, as on the seacoast of Asia Minor. Even the passengers in the boat could not refrain from weeping at the solemnity and tenderness of the scene. The attachment of children to Mr. Allen was indeed remarkable. Wherever he went, children, while they venerated his white locks, would cling around his knees to listen to his interesting anecdotes, his warnings, and instructions.

At Pittsfield, where some of his relations lived, and where his brother had been the minister, Mr. Allen went through the streets, and entering each house, read a chapter in the Bible, exhorting all the members of the family to serve God; and praying fervently for their salvation. In like manner he visited other towns. He felt that the time was short, and he was constrained to do all the good in his power. With his white locks and the strong, impressive tones of his voice, and having a known character for sanctity, all were awed at the presence of the man of God. He went about with the holy zeal and authority of an apostle. In prayer Mr. Allen displayed a sublimity and pathos, which good judges have considered as unequalled by any ministers whom they have known. It was the energy of true faith and strong feeling. In November he arrived at New-York, and there, after a few weeks he expired in the arms of his children, January 28, 1821, aged seventy years.

As he went down to the grave he enjoyed an unbroken serenity of soul, and rejoiced and exulted in the assured hope of eternal life in the presence of his Redeemer in heaven. Some of his last memorable sayings have been presented by Rev. Mr. Danforth in his sketch of his last hours. If there are any worldly-minded ministers, who neglect the sheep and lambs of the flock,—any who repose themselves in learned indolence,—any who are not bold to reprove and diligent to instruct,—any who are not burning with holy zeal, nor strong in faith, nor fervent and mighty in prayer,—to them the ministry and faithfulness of Mr. Allen might show to what an height of excellence and honor they might reach, did they but possess his spirit.

Mr. Allen published no writings to keep alive his name upon the earth; but he has a record on high; and his benevolent, pious, zealous toils, have doubtless gained for him that honor, which cometh from God, and which will be green and flourishing, when the honors of science and of heroic exploits, and all the honors of earth shall wither away. In his life there is presented to the world a memorable example of the power in doing good, which may be wielded by one mind, even under the most unfavorable circumstances, when its energies are wholly controlled by a spirit of piety. Though found in deep poverty, such a pious zeal may mould the characters of those, who by their industry and enterprise acquire great wealth; and thus may be the remote cause of all their extensive charities.—Allen's B. Dict.

ALLEN, (SOLOMON M.;) professor of languages in Middlebury college, Vermont, was the son of Rev. T. Allen, of Pittsfield, and was born February 18, 1789. His father destined him to be a farmer, as he was athletic and fond of active life; but after he became pious, his friends being desirous that he should receive a collegiate education, he commenced the study of Latin at the age of twenty. In 1813 he graduated at Middlebury with a high reputation as a scholar. During a year spent at Andover, besides attending to the customary studies, he read a part of the New Testament in the Syriac language. After offciating for two years as a tutor, he was chosen in 1816 professor of the ancient languages, having arisen to this honor in seven years after commencing the study of Latin. He lived to accomplish but little, but long enough to show what the energy of pious zeal is capable of accomplishing. Respected and beloved by all his associates and acquaintances, his sudden and awful death overwhelmed them with sorrow. Being induced, on account of a defect in the chimney, to go imprudently upon the roof of the college building, he fell from it September 23, 1817, and in consequence died the same evening, aged 28 years. In his last hours his numerous friends crowded around him, "watching with trembling anxiety the flight of his immortal soul to the kindred spirits of a better world." Under the extreme anguish of his dying moments, he exclaimed:—"The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice!—O Father, thy will be done. So seemeth it good in thy sight, O Lord."—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALLEN, (RICHARD;) first bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal church, died at Philadelphia, March 26, 1831, aged 71.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALLEN, (BENJAMIN;) rector of St. Paul's church, Philadelphia, died at sea, in the brig Edward, on his return from Europe, January 27, 1829. He had been the editor of the Christian Magazine, and was a disinterested, zealous servant of God.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALLENITES, the disciples of Henry Allen, of Nova Scotia, who began to propagate his doctrines in that country about the year 1778, and died in 1783, during which interval he made many proselytes, and at his death left a considerable party behind him, though now much declined. He published several treatises and sermons, in which he declares, that the souls of all the human race are emanations, or rather parts of the one great Spirit; that they were all present in Eden, and were actually in the first transgression. He supposes that our first parents in innocence were pure spirits, and that the material world was not then made; but that in consequence of the fall, that mankind might not sink into utter destruction, this world was produced, and men clothed with material bodies; and that all the human race will, in their turn, be invested with such bodies, and in them enjoy a state of probation for immortal happiness.—H. Adams's Dict., from a MS. communicated by a clergyman of Nova Scotia, 1783.

ALLISON, (FRANCIS, D. D. ;) assistant minister of the first Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, was born in Ireland in 1705. After an early classical education at an academy, he completed his studies at the university of Glasgow. He came to this country in 1735, and was soon appointed pastor of a Presbyterian church at New London in Chester county, Pennsylvania. Here, about the year 1741, his solicitude for the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom, and his desire of engaging young men in the work of the ministry, and of promoting public happiness by the diffusion of religious liberty and learning, induced him to open a public school. There was at this time scarcely a particle of learning in the middle states, and he generally instructed all that came to him, without fee or reward.—About the year 1747 he was invited to take the charge of an academy in Philadelphia; in 1755 he was elected vice provost of the college, which had just been established, and professor of moral philosophy. He was also minister in the first Presbyterian church. In the discharge of the laborious duties, which devolved upon him, he continued till his death, November 28, 1777, aged 72.

Besides an unusually accurate and profound acquaintance with the Latin and Greek classics, he was well informed in moral philosophy, history, and general literature. To his zeal for the diffusion of knowledge, Pennsylvania owes much of that taste for solid learning and classical literature, for which many of her principal characters have been so distinguished. The private virtues of Dr. Allison conciliated the esteem of all that knew him, and his public usefulness has erected a lasting monument to his praise. For more than forty years he supported the ministerial character with dignity and reputation. In his public services he was plain, practical, and argumentative; warm, animated and pathetic. He was greatly honored by the gracious Redeemer in being made instrumental, as it is believed, in the salvation of many, who heard him. He was frank and ingenuous in his natural temper; warm and zealous in his friendships; catholic in his sentiments; a friend to civil and religious liberty. His benevolence led him to spare no pains nor trouble in assisting the poor and distressed by his advice and influence, or by his own private liberality. It was he who planned, and was the means of establishing the Widows' Fund, which was remarkably useful. He often expressed his hopes in the mercy of God unto eternal life, and but a few days before his death said to Dr. Ewing, that he had no doubt, but that, according to the Gospel covenant, he should obtain the pardon of his sins through the great Redeemer of mankind, and enjoy an eternity of rest and glory in the presence of God.

He published a sermon, delivered before the synods of New-York and Pennsylvania, May 24, 1758, entitled, Peace and Unity Recommended.—Assembly's Miss. Mag. i. 457—361; Miller's Retr. ii. 342; Holmes's Life of Stiles, 98, 99.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ALLIX, (PETER, D. D. ;) a very learned and eminent Protestant divine, born in France, at Alencon, in 1641, where he received a liberal education. In process of time he became minister of the reformed church at Rouen, where he soon began to distinguish himself as an author, by publishing some very learned and curious pieces, by which he acquired great reputation. It was owing to this that he was called from Rouen to Charenton, which was the principal church that the reformed had in France. This was a high honor conferred upon him; and being now in the zenith of his preferment, and finding himself in a condition for rendering great services to the church, he applied himself to the task with all possible zeal, defending the Protestant doctrine against the artful attempts of the bishop of Meaux, who was then laboring to overthrow the reformed religion. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, Mr. Allix found himself compelled to quit in 1685, on which he retired into England, where he met with a most favorable reception, on account of his extensive learning, and, more especially, his singular knowledge in ecclesiastical history, for which he was particularly esteemed. On his arrival in that country, he applied very closely to learning the English language, which he attained to a surprising degree of perfection, as is manifest from the various publications which issued from his pen. Among these may be particularly specified his "Reflections on the Books of the Holy Scriptures, designed to establish the truth of the Christian Religion," "Remarks on the Ecclesiastical History of the Ancient Churches of Piedmont," "Remarks upon the Ecclesiastical History of the Ancient Churches of the Albigenes." In these last treatises, he vindicates the Waldenses and Albigenes from the foul aspersions of Bossuet, the bishop of Meaux, and with great force retorts on him his own arguments, by showing, that a constant and vigorous opposition to the Church of Rome, founded not only on a disavowal of her authority, but also from an opposition to her corruptions in doctrine, discipline, and practice, is far from proving either heresy or schism in her opponents. In the course of his "Remarks," he is led into an examination of various important questions, and with freedom, learning, and impartiality, he traces the progress of the sentiments of the Albigenes into Spain, as well as their connection with the opinions of Wickliffe in England.

But the book which obtained him the highest credit was, "The Judgment of the Ancient Jewish Church, against the Unitarians, in the Controversy upon the Holy Trinity, and the Divinity of our blessed Savior." This was a great undertaking, requiring an extensive knowledge of Greek and Hebrew literature, which all must allow Dr. Allix to have exhibited, and that he managed the whole controversy with equal perspicuity and erudition. He enjoyed an uncommon share of health and spirits, as appears by his later writings, in which there is not only all the erudition, but all the quickness and vivacity which appeared in his earliest pieces. He was consulted by the greatest men of his age on the deepest and most intricate parts of learning, and was acknowledged to be a genius of the first order, by those whom the world have esteemed not only the most capable, but also the most unbiassed critics. Dr. Allix continued his application to the last, and died in London, in the 76th year of his age, on the 21st of February, 1717; leaving behind him the reputation of a man, assiduous in the discharge of all the offices of public and private life, and every way as amiable for his virtues and social qualities, as he was venerable for his uprightness and integrity, and famous for his various and profound learning.—Jones's Biog. Dict.

ALL MANNER OF CONVERSATION; a phrase which occurs in 1 Peter 1: 15. The Greek word anastrophe, conversation, which occurs frequently in the New Testament, has a much more extensive meaning than now belongs to the word conversation. It embraces not only colloquial intercourse, but the whole circle of habits and behavior. It corresponds most nearly to the English term conduct. The whole phrase here referred to, may be rendered, "Be ye holy in every turn, or, as we now say, in every walk of life."

ALL-SUFFICIENCY OF GOD; that power or attribute of his nature, whereby he is able to communicate as much blessedness to his creatures as he is pleased to make them capable of receiving. As his self-sufficiency is that whereby he has enough in himself to denominate him completely blessed, as a God of infinite perfection; so his all-sufficiency is that by which he hath enough in himself to satisfy the most enlarged desires of his creatures, and to make them completely blessed. We practically deny this perfection, when we are discontented with our present condition, and desire more than God has allotted for us. Gen. 3: 5. Prov. 19: 2.—2. When we seek blessings of what kind soever in an indirect way, as though God were not able to bestow them upon us in his own way, or in the use of lawful means. Gen. 27: 35.—3. When we use unlawful means to escape imminent dangers. 1 Sam. 21: 13. Gen. 20 and 26.—4. When we distrust his providence, though we have had large experience of his appearing for us in various instances. 1 Sam. 27: 1. Psalms 78: 19. 2 Chron. 16: 8. 2 Chron. 14: 9, 13. Josh. 7: 7, 9.—5. When we doubt of the truth or certain accomplishment of the promises. Gen. 18: 12. Psalms 77: 74. Isa. 49: 14.—6. When we decline great services, though called to them by God, under a pretence of our unfitness for them, Jer. 1: 6, 8.

The consideration of this doctrine should lead us, 1. To seek happiness in God alone, and not in human things, Jer. 2: 13.—2. To commit all our wants and trials to him. 1 Sam. 30: 6. Heb. 11: 19. 2 Cor. 12: 8, 9.—3. To be courageous in the midst of danger and opposition. Psalms 27: 1.—4. To be satisfied with his dispensations. Rom. 8: 28.—5. To persevere in the path of duty, however difficult. Gen. 17: 1.—Buck's Theol. Dict.; Ridley's Body of Div. ques. 17.; Saurin's Ser. ser. 5. vol. i.; Barrow's Works, vol. ii. ser. 11.; Dwight's Theology, vol. i. ser. 7, and 25.—See ALMIGHTY.

ALLUSH or ALUSH; Numb. 33: 13, 14.; a place situated in the desert of Sin, between Elim and Mount Sinai. The stations where the Israelites rested, are supposed to have been in the great valley El Sheikk and Feiran. Feiran is a continuation of the valley El Sheikk, says Burckhardt, and was considered the first valley on the whole Arabian peninsula. From the upper extremity, a row of gardens and date plantations extends downwards for four miles. In almost every garden is a well, by means of which the gardens are irrigated the whole year round. This is the valley described by Niebuhr under the name of Faran, through which the Israelites, doubtless, passed on their way to Sinai after leaving the desert of Sin; but which they probably did not pass through on their way from Sinai to Kadesh, as some have ventured to suppose. Here they could not want for water; nor did they murmur on this account until they came to Rephidim, which was most probably higher up among the mountains, and near the western base of Sinai itself. Indeed, monkish tradition pretends to assign the site of Rephidim, and to show the rock from which the waters gushed, in the narrow valley El Ledja, but the nature of the ground hardly admits the possibility of its being the true site.—Robinson's Bib. Repository.

ALMAH; a Hebrew word signifying properly a virgin, a young woman unacquainted with man. In this sense it occurs in the famous passage of Isaiah, 7: 14—"Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son." The Hebrew has no term that more properly signifies a virgin than almah. St. Jerome, in his commentary on this passage, observes, that the prophet declined using the word bethaul which signifies any young woman, or young person, but employed the term almah, which denotes a virgin never seen by man. This is the import of the word almah, which is derived from a root which signifies to conceal. It is very well known, that young women in the east do not appear in public, but are shut up in their houses, and their mothers' apartments, like nuns. The Chaldee paraphrast and the Septuagint translate almah "a virgin;" and Akiba, the famous rabbin, who was a great enemy to Christ and Christians, and lived in the second century, understands it in the same manner. The apostles and evangelists, and the Jews of our Savior's time, explained it in the same sense, and expected a Messiah born of a virgin.

The Jews, that they may obscure this plain text, and weaken the proof of the truth of the Christian religion, pretend that the Hebrew word signifies a young woman, and not a virgin. But this corrupt translation is easily confuted. 1. Because this word constantly denotes a virgin in all other passages of Scripture in which it is used. 2. From the intent of the passage, which was to confirm their faith by a strange and wonderful sign. It surely could be no wonder, that a young woman should conceive a child; but it was a very extraordinary circumstance, that a virgin should conceive and bear a son.—Jones.

ALMERICIANS; the followers of Almeric, (or Amauri,) professor of logic and theology at Paris, in the thirteenth century, who was burnt to death for his opinions, with several of his followers. He opposed the worship of saints and images: and his enemies charged him with maintaining, that as the reign of the Father continued during the Old Testament dispensation, and that of the Son from the Christian era, so in his time the reign of the Holy Spirit commenced, in which the sacraments and all external worship were to be abolished. Dr. Mosheim, and many other learned men, consider Almeric as a Pantheist, maintaining that the universe was God—that and must all return to the source from whence they were derived. Fox, however, has placed him among the martyrs to evangelical truth. Dr. Maclaine, also, in his notes to Mosheim, has vindicated Almeric from the charges of his enemies, and sustained the judgment of Fox.—Mosheim's Ecc. Hist. vol. iii. p. 287; Fleury's Ecc. Hist. lib. 76. sect. 59; Fox's Book of Martyrs, p. 133.

ALMIGHTY; a peculiar title of the Deity. Gen. 17: 1. The Hebrew name, Shaddai, signifies also all-sufficient, or all-bountiful. See Gen. 28: 3. 35: 11. 43: 14. 49: 25. Of the omnipotence of God, we have a most ample revelation in the Scriptures, expressed in the most sublime language. From the annunciation, by Moses, of a divine existence, who was "in the beginning," before all things, the very first step is to the display of his almighty power in the creation out of nothing, and the immediate arrangement, in order and perfection, of the "heavens and the earth;" by which is meant, not this globe only with its atmosphere, or even with its own celestial system, but the universe itself; for "he made the stars also." We are thus at once placed in the presence of an agent of unbounded power; for we must all feel that a being which could create such a world as this, must, beyond all comparison, possess a power greater than any which we experience in ourselves, than any which we observe in other visible agents, and to which we are not authorized, by our observation or knowledge, to assign any limits of space or duration.

2. That the sacred writers should so frequently dwell upon the omnipotence of God, has important reasons, which arise out of the very design of the revelation which they were the means of communicating to mankind. Men were to be reminded of their obligations to obedience; and God is therefore constantly exhibited as the Creator, the Preserver, and Lord of all things. His solemn worship and fear were to be enjoined upon them; and, by the manifestation of his works, the veil was withdrawn from his glory and majesty. Idolatry was to be checked and reproved, and the true God was therefore placed in contrast with the limited and powerless gods of the heathen: "Among the gods of the nations, is there no god like unto thee; neither are there any works like thy works." Finally, he is exhibited as the object of trust to creatures constantly reminded by experience of their own infirmity and dependence; and to them it is essential to know, that his power is absolute, unlimited, and irresistible, and that, in a word, he is "mighty to save."

3. In a revelation which was thus designed to awe and control the wicked, and to afford strength of mind and consolation to good men under all circumstances, the omnipotence of God is therefore placed in a great variety of impressive views, and connected with the most striking illustrations.

It is declared by the fact of creation, the creation of beings out of nothing; which itself, though it had been confined to a single object, however minute, exceeds finite comprehension, and overwhelms the faculties. This with God required no effort: "He spake and it was done, he commanded and it stood fast." The easiness and variety of his works enlarge the conception: "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy work." "He spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea; he maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south; he doeth great things, past finding out, yea, and wonders without number. He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. He bindeth up the waters in the thick clouds, and the cloud is not rent under them; he hath compassed the waters with bounds until the day and night come to an end." The ease with which he sustains, orders, and controls the most powerful and unruly of the elements, arrays his omnipotence with an aspect of ineffable dignity and majesty: "By him all things consist." "He brake up for the sea a decreed place, and set bars and doors, and said, Hitherto shalt thou come and no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." "He looketh to the end of the earth, and seeth under the whole heaven, to make the weight for the winds, to weigh the waters by measure, to make a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder." "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, meted heaven with a span, comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance." The descriptions of the divine power are often terrible: "The pillars of heaven tremble, and are astonished at his reproof; he divideth the sea by his power." "He removeth the mountains, and they know it not; he overturneth them in his anger; he shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble; he commandeth the sun and it riseth not, and sealeth up the stars." The same absolute subjection of creatures to his dominion is seen among the intelligent inhabitants of the material universe; and angels, mortals the most exalted, and evil spirits, are swayed with as much ease as the most passive elements: "He maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire." They veil their faces before his throne, and acknowledge themselves his servants: "It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers;" "as the dust of the balance, less than nothing and vanity." "He bringeth princes to nothing." "He setteth up one and putteth down another;" "for the kingdom is the Lord's, and he is governor among the nations." "The angels that sinned he cast down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment." The closing scenes of this world complete these transcendent conceptions of the majesty and power of God. The dead of all ages rise from their graves at his voice: and the sea gives up the dead which are in it. Before his face heaven and earth flee away; the stars fall from heaven, and the powers of heaven are shaken. The dead, small and great, stand before God, and are divided as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats. The wicked go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.

4. Of these amazing views of the omnipotence of God, spread through almost every page of the Scriptures, the power lies in their truth. They are not eastern exaggerations, mistaken for sublimity. Every thing in nature answers to them, and renews from age to age the energy of the impression which they cannot but make on the reflecting mind. The order of the astral revolutions indicates the constant presence of an invisible but incomprehensible power. The seas hurl the weight of their billows upon the rising shores, but every where find a "bound fixed by a perpetual decree." The tides reach their height; if they flowed on for a few hours, the earth would change places with the bed of the sea; but, under an invisible control, they become refluxent. The expression, "He toucheth the mountains and they smoke," is not merely imaginary:—every volcano is a testimony of its truth; and earthquakes proclaim, that, before him, "the pillars of the world tremble." Men collected into armies, or populous nations, give us vast ideas of human power; but let an army be placed amidst the sand-storms and burning winds of the desert, as in the east; or, before "his frost," as in our own day in Russia, where one of the mightiest armaments was seen retreating before, or perishing under, an unexpected visitation of snow and storm; or let the utterly helpless state of a populous country which has been visited by famine, or by a resistless pestilential disease, be reflected upon; and we feel that it is scarcely a figure of speech to say, that "all nations before him are less than nothing and vanity."

5. Nor, in reviewing this doctrine of Scripture, ought the great practical uses made of the omnipotence of God, by the sacred writers, to be overlooked. By them nothing is said for the mere display of knowledge, as in heathen writers; and we have no speculations without a subservient moral. To excite and keep alive in man the fear and worship of God, and to bring him to a felicitous confidence in that almighty power which pervades and controls all things, are the noble ends of those ample displays of the omnipotence of God, which roll through the sacred volume with a sublimity that inspiration only could supply. "Declare his glory among the heathen, his marvellous works among all nations; for great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised.—Glory and honor are in his presence, and strength and gladness in his place.—Give unto the Lord, ye kindreds of the people, give unto the Lord glory and strength; give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name.—The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?—The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?—If God be for us, who then can be against us?—Our help standeth in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth.—What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee."—Thus, as one observes, "our natural fears, of which we must have many, remit us to God, and remind us, since we know what God is, to lay hold on his almighty power."

6. Ample, however, as are these views of the power of God, the subject is not exhausted. As, when the Scriptures speak of the eternity of God, they declare it so as to give us a mere glimpse of that fearful peculiarity of the divine nature, that God is the fountain of being to himself, and that he is eternal, because he is the "I AM;" so we are taught not to measure God's omnipotence by the actual displays of it which we see around us. These are the manifestations of the fact, but not the measure of the attribute; and should we resort to the discoveries of modern philosophy, which, by the help of instruments, has so greatly enlarged the known boundaries of the visible universe, and add to the stars which are visible to the naked eye, those new exhibitions of the divine power in the nebulous appearances of the heavens which are resolvable into myriads of distinct celestial luminaries, whose immense distances commingle their light before it reaches our eyes; we thus almost infinitely expand the circle of created existence, and enter upon a formerly unknown and overwhelming range of divine operation. But still we are only reminded, that his power is truly almighty and measureless—"Lo, all these are parts of his ways; but how little a portion is known of him, and the thunder of his power who can understand?" It is a mighty conception that we form of a power from which all other power is derived, and to which it is subordinate; which nothing can oppose; which can beat down and annihilate all other power whatever; which operates in the most perfect manner, at once, in an instant, with the utmost ease; but the Scriptures lead us to the contemplation of greater and even unfathomable depths. The omnipotence of God is inconceivable and boundless. It arises from the infinite perfection of God, that his power can never be actually exhausted; and, in every imaginable instant in eternity, that inexhaustible power of God can, if it please him, be adding either more creatures to those in existence, or greater perfection to them; since "it belongs to self-existent Being, to be always full and communicative, and, to the communicated contingent being, to be ever empty and craving."

7. One limitation of the divine power it is true we can conceive, but it detracts nothing from its perfection. Where things in themselves imply a contradiction, as that a body may be extended and not extended, in a certain place and not in it, at the same time; such things cannot be done by God, because contradictions are impossible in their own nature. Nor is it any derogation from the divine power to say, they cannot be done; for as the object of the understanding, of the eye, and the ear, is that which is intelligible, visible, and audible; so the object of power must be that which is possible; and as it is no prejudice to the most perfect understanding, or sight, or hearing, that it does not understand what is not intelligible, or see what is not visible, or hear what is not audible; so neither is it any diminution to the most perfect power, that it does not do what is not possible. In like manner, God cannot do any thing that is repugnant to his other perfections: he cannot lie, nor deceive, nor deny himself; for this would be injurious to his truth. He cannot love sin, nor punish innocence; for this would destroy his holiness and goodness: and therefore to ascribe a power to him that is inconsistent with the rectitude of his nature, is not to magnify but debase him; for all unrighteousness is weakness, a defection from right reason, a deviation from the perfect rule of action, and arises from a want of goodness and power. In a word, since all the attributes of God are essentially the same, a power in him which tends to destroy any other attribute of the divine nature, must be a power destructive of itself. Well, therefore, may we conclude him absolutely omnipotent, who, by being able to effect all things consistent with his perfections, showeth infinite ability, and by not being able to do any thing repugnant to the same perfections, demonstrates himself subject to no infirmity.

8. Nothing certainly in the finest writings of antiquity, were all their best thoughts collected as to the majesty and power of God, can bear any comparison with the views thus presented to us by divine revelation. Were we to forget, for a moment, what is the fact, that their noblest notions stand connected with fancies and vain speculations which deprive them of their force, still their thoughts never rise so high; the current is broken, the round of lofty conception is not completed, and, unconnected as their views of divine power were with the eternal destiny of man, and the very reason of creation, we never hear in them, as in the Scriptures, "the THUNDER of his power."—Watson; Dwight's Theology, Ser. vii.

ALMOND TREE; a tree resembling the peach tree in its leaves and blossoms, but the fruit is longer and more compressed, the outer green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell of the stone is not so rugged. This stone, or nut, contains a kernel, which is the only esculent part. The whole arrives at maturity in September, when the outer tough cover splits open and discharges the nut. From the circumstance of its blossoming the earliest of any of the trees, beginning as soon as the rigor of winter is past, and before it is in leaf, it has its Hebrew name shakad, which comes from a verb signifying to make haste, to be in a hurry, or to awake early. To the forwardness of the almond tree there seems to be a reference in Jeremiah: "The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree. Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten my word to perform it," or, rather, "I am hastening, or watching over my word to fulfil it." Jer. i. 11, 12. In this manner it is rendered by the Seventy; and by the Vulgate, Vigilabo ego super verbum meum. This is the first vision with which the prophet was honored; and his attention is roused by a very significant emblem of that severe correction with which the Most High was hastening to visit his people for their iniquity; and from the species of tree to which the rod belonged, he is warned of its near approach. The idea which the appearance of the almond rod suggested to his mind, is confirmed by the exposition of God himself: "I am watching over, or on account of, my word to fulfil it;" and this double mode of instruction, first by emblem, and then by exposition, was certainly intended to make a deeper impression on the mind both of Jeremiah and of the people to whom he was sent.

It is probable that the rods which the princes of Israel bore, were scions of the almond tree, at once the ensign of their office, and the emblem of their vigilance. Such, we know, from the testimony of Scripture, was the rod of Aaron; which renders it exceedingly probable, that the rods of the other chiefs were from the same tree.

The hoary head is beautifully compared by Solomon to the almond tree, covered in the earliest days of spring with its snow-white flowers, before a single leaf has budded: "The almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail." Eccl. 12: 5. Man has existed in this world but a few days, when old age begins to appear, sheds its snows upon his head, prematurely nips his hopes, darkens his earthly prospects, and hurries him into the grave.—Watson.

ALMONER; one who is employed in the distribution of charities. This seems to have been an important branch of the office of deacons in the Christian church. Acts 6. We find Barnabas and Paul however employed in a similar service. Acts 11: 29—36. Gal. 2: 10. 2 Cor. 8: 4. It is an office of the faithful execution of which, while it demands much discretion, and in some circumstances great self-denial, is yet peculiarly acceptable to God, honorable and delightful. The Scriptures frequently enjoin and encourage labors of this sort. Ps. 41: 1. Matt. 19: 21. 25: 31—46. Acts 20: 33—35. Rom. 12: 13. James 1: 27. 1 Pet. 4: 10. 3 John 5.

ALMOST; in a great measure; next to entirely; and the opposite of altogether. Acts 26: 28. One is almost persuaded to be a Christian, when his knowledge of the Gospel, evidence of its truth, conviction of its importance, and admiration of its pure and elevated character, are such as only to be resisted and overborne by worldly desires and considerations, carried to a criminal excess. Such was the case of Agrippa. (See AGRIPPA, 2.) The reply of Paul is the most perfect and beautiful thing of the kind that ever was conceived. It is a master-piece to be studied by the human race.

It will be well for all (and there are vast multitudes) in the critical circumstances of Agrippa, to remember the suggestion of the poet,

Thou yet may'st find—too late—and to thy cost—
That to be almost saved, is wholly to be lost!

ALMS; what is given gratuitously for the relief of the poor, and in repairing the churches. That alms-giving is a duty, is every way evident from the variety of passages which enjoin it in the Sacred Scriptures. It is observable, however, what a number of excuses are made by those who are not found in the exercise of the duty: 1. That they have nothing to spare; 2. That charity begins at home; 3. That charity does not consist in giving money, but in benevolence, love to all mankind, &c.; 4. That giving to the poor is not mentioned in St. Paul's description of charity, 1 Cor. 13: 5; 5. That they pay the poor rates; 6. That they employ many poor persons; 7. That the poor do not suffer so much as we imagine; 8. That these people, give them what you will, will never be thankful; 9. That we are liable to be imposed upon; 10. That they should apply to their parishes; 11. That giving money encourages idleness; 12. That we have too many objects of charity at home. O the love of money, how fruitful is it in apologies for a contracted, mercenary spirit! In giving of alms, however, the following rules should be observed: 1. That they should be given with justice; only our own, to which we have a just right, should be given.— 2. With cheerfulness. Deut. 15: 10. 2 Cor. 9: 7.—3. With simplicity and sincerity. Rom. 12. Matt. 6: 3.—4. With compassion and affection. Isa. 58: 10. 1 John 3: 17.—5. Seasonily, Gal. 6: 10. Prov. 4: 27.—6. Bountifully. Deut. 18: 11. 1 Tim. 6: 18.—7. Prudently, according to every one's need. 1 Tim. 5: 8. Acts 4: 35. ALMUG TREE; a certain kind of wood mentioned 1 Kings 10: 11. 2 Chron. 2: 8. 9: 10, 11. Jerome and the Vulgate render it ligna thyna, and the Septuagint, wrought wood.* Several critics understand it to mean gummy wood; but a wood abounding in resin must be very unfit for the uses to which this is said to be applied. Celsus queries if it be not the sandal; but Michaelis thinks the particular species of wood to be wholly unknown to us. Dr. Shaw supposes that the almug tree was the cypress; and he observes that the wood of this tree is still used in Italy and other places for violins, harpsichords, and other stringed instruments.—Watson.

ALOES, *alva; an extensive tribe of plants, the principal species amounting to nine in number: they differ much in size. A very bitter gum is extracted from it, used for medicinal purposes, and anciently for embalming dead bodies. Nicodemus is said, John 19: 39. to have brought one hundred pounds weight of myrrh and aloes to embalm the body of Jesus. The quantity has been exclaimed against by certain Jews, as being enough for fifty bodies. But instead of hekaton, it might originally have been written dekaton, ten pounds weight. However, at the funeral of Herod there were five hundred spice-bearers; and at that of R. Gamaliel, eighty pounds of opobalsamum were used.

The wood which God showed Moses, that with it he might sweeten the waters of Marah, is called alvah. Exod. 15: 25. The word has some relation to aloe; and some interpreters are of opinion that Moses used a bitter sort of wood, that so the power of God might be the more remarkable. Mr. Bruce mentions a town, or large village, by the name of Elvah. It is thickly planted with trees; is the oasis parva of the ancients; and the last inhabited place to the west that is under the jurisdiction of Egypt. He also observes that the Arabs call a shrub or tree, not unlike our hawthorn, either in wood or flower, by the name of elvah. "It was this," say they, "with which Moses sweetened the waters of Marah; and with this, too, did Kalib Ibn el Walid sweeten those of Elvah, once bitter, and give the place the name of this circumstance." It may be that God directed Moses to the very wood proper for the purpose. M. Niebuhr, when in these parts, inquired after wood capable of this effect, but could gain no information of any such. It will not, however, from hence follow that Moses really used a bitter wood; but, as Providence usually works by the proper and fit means to accomplish its ends, it seems likely that the wood he made use of was, in some degree at least, corrective of that quality which abounded in the water, and so rendered it potable. This seems to have been the opinion of the author of Ecclesiasticus, 38: 5. That other water, also, requires some correction, and that such a correction is applied to it, appears from the custom in Egypt in respect to that of the Nile, which, though somewhat muddy, is rendered pure and salutary by being put into jars, the inside of which is rubbed with a paste made of bitter almonds. The first discoverers of the Floridas are said to have corrected the stagnant and fetid water they found there, by infusing in it branches of saffras; and it is understood that the first inducements of the Chinese to the general use of tea, was to correct the water of their ponds and rivers.

The LIGN-ALOE, or agallochum, Numb. 24: 6. Ps. 45: 9. and Cantic. 4: 14. is a small tree about eight or ten feet high. That the flower of this plant yielded a fragrance, is assured to us in the following extract from Swinburne's Travels, Letter xii. "This morning, like many of the foregoing ones, was delicious. The sun rose gloriously out of the sea, and all the air around was perfumed with the effluvia of the aloe, as its rays sucked up the dew from the leaves." This extremely bitter plant contains under the bark three sorts of wood. The first is black, solid, and weighty; the second is of a tawny color, of a light spongy texture, very porous, and filled with a resin extremely fragrant and agreeable; the third kind of wood, which is the heart, has a strong aromatic odor, and is esteemed in the East more precious than gold itself. It is used for perfuming habits and apartments, and is administered as a cordial in fainting and epileptic fits. These pieces, called calunbac, are carefully preserved in pewter boxes, to prevent their drying. When they are used, they are ground upon a marble with such liquids as are best suited to the purpose for which they are intended. This wood, mentioned Cantic. 4: 14. in conjunction with several other odoriferous plants there referred to, was in high esteem among the Hebrews for its exquisite exhalations.

The scented aloe, and each shrub that showers Gum from its veins, and odors from its flowers.

Thus the son of Sirach, Ecclesiasticus 24: 15. "I gave a sweet smell like the cinnamon and aspalathum. I yielded a pleasant odor like the best myrrh; like galbanum and onyx, and fragrant storax, and like the fume of frankincense in the tabernacle." It may not be amiss to observe that the Persian translator renders alhim, sandal-wood; and the same was the opinion of a certain Jew in Arabia who was consulted by Niebuhr.—Watson.

ALOGIANS, (from a neg. and logos;) persons who, according to Epiphanius, rejected the Gospel of John and the Revelation, which speak of Christ as the Logos, and ascribed them to Cerinthus. Dr. Lardner, however, is confident, that (though there might be individuals) there never was a sect which received the other books of the New Testament, and rejected these; nor are they mentioned by any writers pretending to be contemporary. He thinks this heresy was invented during the Millenarian controversy. Some Millenarians ascribed the Apocalypse to Cerinthus. Some of the orthodox said, they might as well ascribe the Gospel to Cerinthus—others said they did so; and thus was hatched the mendacium theologicum—the theological falsehood. Others, however, tell us, that the sect was founded by Artemon, in the second century, and supported by Beryllus.—Lardner's Heretics, 446; Turner's Hist. p. 73.—Williams.

ALPHA; the first letter of the Greek alphabet. Omega being the last letter. Hence the lofty title which our Lord appropriates to himself, (Rev. 1: 8. 21: 6. 22: 13.) as significant of his eternity and perfection. (See A., and ALPHA.)

ALPHAGE; archbishop of Canterbury, an illustrious English martyr of the eleventh century. He was descended from a noble family, and his parents, who were worthy Christians, and had given him an excellent education, had the happiness to see him become both the admired scholar and the devout Christian. He was distinguished for purity, humility, prudence, and piety. He strove to make the arts useful to the purposes of life, and to render philosophy subservient to the cause of religion. But being in some degree infected with the mistaken views of the age, he renounced his fortune and his home, and took the habit in the monastery of the Benedictines, that there he might at his leisure contemplate those divine perfections which he loved. Not satisfied however with this retirement, he afterwards shut himself up in a lonely cell at Bath. Here he remained, until the see of Winchester being vacated by the death of Ethelwold, and a dispute arising about a successor, Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, as primate of all England, was obliged to interpose; and, much to the satisfaction of all concerned, called Alpha to the vacant bishopric. The conduct of Alpha justified the hopes that were formed of him. Under his care piety flourished, unity was restored, and the church of Winchester recovered its lustre in such a manner as made the bishop the admiration of the whole kingdom. In 1006 he was elevated to the vacant see of Canterbury, according to the dying prayer of Dunstan, eighteen years before, that Alpha might be his successor.

After he had governed this metropolitan see forty years with growing reputation and success, the Danes made an incursion into England; and while Alpha, now venerable with years, animated with holy courage was employed in assisting and encouraging his people, Canterbury was taken by storm. The venerable prelate offered his own bosom to the swords of the furious enemy; beseeching them to make him the sacrifice, and to spare his people. But in vain. He was compelled to witness the horrible massacre even to decimation of his people, every tenth person only being left alive; while he himself bound, insulted, and abused, was thrown into a gloomy dungeon.

After several months' close confinement, the barbarous Danes put him to severe torment to oblige him to discover the treasure of his church; assuring him, if he would discover it, of his restoration to life and liberty. But Alphege, regarding the treasure of the church as sacred to the poor, remained inflexible, and only exhorted his enemies to forsake their idolatry and embrace the Gospel. The incensed soldiers dragged him out of the camp in a transport of rage, and began to beat him without mercy; a treatment which the meek prelate endured patiently, at the same time praying for his persecutors; until one soldier, who had been converted and baptized by him into the Christian faith, knowing that his death was determined on, and fired with indignant horror at the sight of his protracted sufferings, with a blow from his sword put the finishing stroke to his martyrdom. This transaction happened April 19, A. D. 1012, on the very spot where the church at Greenwich, dedicated to him, now stands.—Fox.

ALSTEDIUS, (JOHN HENRY, S. T. D. ;) a German divine, was born in 1558, at Hesborn, in Nassau, was professor of philosophy and theology in his native town, and subsequently at Weissemberg, in Transylvania. He died at the latter place in 1638. Among his numerous works may be mentioned, a treatise on the Millennium; an Encyclopedia; and a Biblical Encyclopedia, in which he attempts to prove, that the principles and materials of all the arts and sciences should be sought for in the Scriptures. Alstedius was such an indefatigable writer, that his name was anagrammatized into sedulitas (activity), by some of the word distorters of that age.—Davenport.

ALTAR; the place on which sacrifices were offered. Sacrifices are nearly as ancient as worship; and altars are of nearly equal antiquity. Scripture speaks of altars, erected by the patriarchs, without describing their form, or the materials of which they were composed. The altar which Jacob set up at Bethel, was the stone which had served him for a pillow; and Gideon sacrificed on the rock before his house. The first altars which God commanded Moses to raise, were of earth or rough stones; and the Lord declared, that if iron were used in constructing them, they would become impure. Exod. 20: 24, 25. The altar which Moses enjoined Joshua to build on mount Ebal, was to be of unpolished stones, (Deut. 27: 5. Josh. 8: 31.) and it is very probable, that such were those built by Samuel, Saul, and David. The altar which Solomon erected in the temple, was of brass, but filled, it is believed, with rough stones. 2 Chron. 4: 1, 2, 3. That built at Jerusalem, by Zerubbabel, after the return from Babylon, was of rough stones, as was that of the Maccabees. Josephus says, that the altar which was in his time in the temple, was of rough stones, fifteen cubits high, forty long, and forty wide. In the patriarchal times, altars were generally built near a grove of trees; and as idolatry prevailed in the world, and men, forsaking the worship of the true God, multiplied their deities in profusion, it became an universal practice among the heathen to erect their altars in such places as were calculated to inspire with religious dread, the mind of the deluded worshippers; particularly in groves, woods, and mountains. Judges 6: 25, and 2 Kings 21: 3. But when the abuses which this custom gave rise to, became flagrant, and impure and lascivious rites were founded upon it, the Jews were expressly forbidden to plant groves, or so much as a single tree near the altar of Jehovah. Deut. 16: 21. The divine precept in relation to altars, as delivered by Moses to the Jews, is in Exod. 20: 24.

Among the ancient Egyptian pictures that have been discovered at Herculaneum, are two of a very curious description, representing sacred ceremonies of the Egyptians, probably in honor of Isis. Upon these subjects Mr. Taylor has bestowed a good deal of labor, and the result throws some light upon more than one obscure passage of Scripture, particularly Prov. 26: 21. Ps. 84: 3. 118: 27.

Among the Romans, altars were of two kinds, the higher and the lower; the higher were intended for the celestial gods, and were called altaria, from altus; the lower were for the terrestrial and infernal gods, and were called ara. Those dedicated to the heavenly gods were raised a great height above the surface of the earth: those of the terrestrial gods were almost even with the surface; and those for the infernal deities were only holes dug in the ground, called Serobicali.

Before temples were in use, the altars were placed in the groves, highways, or on the tops of mountains, inscribed with the names, ensigns, or characters of the respective gods to whom they belonged. The great temples at Rome generally contained three altars; the first in the sanctuary, at the foot of the statue, for incense and libations; the second before the gate of the temple, for the sacrifice of victims; and the third was a portable one for the offerings and sacred vestments or vessels to lie upon. The ancients used to swear upon the altars upon solemn occasions, such as confirming alliances, treaties of peace, &c. They were also places of refuge, and served as an asylum and sanctuary to all who fled to them, whatever their crimes were.

The principal altars of the Jews, were that of burnt-offering and that of incense. The former, THE ALTAR OF

BURNT-OFFERING, which Moses commanded to be built for the use of the tabernacle in the wilderness, was a kind of chest or coffer of shittim-wood, covered with plates of brass. It was two yards and a half square, and a yard and a half high. Exod. 27: 1—3. Moses placed it to the east, before the entrance of the tabernacle, in the open air; that the fire, which first descended upon it from heaven, Lev. 9: 24, and which, therefore, was considered to be sacred, and kept perpetually burning upon it, might not soil the inside of the tabernacle. At each of the four corners of this altar, there was a spire, resembling a horn, wrought out of the same piece of wood as the altar itself, and covered with brass. Within the altar was a grate of brass, on which the fire was made, and through the grating the ashes fell in proportion as they increased upon the altar, and were received below in a pan which was placed under it. At the four corners of this grate were four rings fastened to four chains, which kept it suspended from the four horns of the altar. This altar was portable, and was carried on the shoulders of the priests by staves of shittim-wood covered with brass, and made to pass through rings which were affixed to the sides of the altar. When Solomon built the temple in Jerusalem, the altar which he caused to be erected was of much larger dimensions; it was twenty cubits long, twenty wide, and ten in height. 2 Chron. 4: 1—3. It was covered with thick plates of brass, and filled with rough stones, having on the east side an easy ascent leading up to it.

After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, and the building of the second temple by Zerubbabel, their altars differed a little from those in use before the captivity. Prideaux remarks, that from this time the altar of burnt-offerings was a large pile built all of unhewn stones, thirty-two cubits square at the bottom, and twenty-four at the top: the ascent was by a gentle rising, thirty-two cubits in length and sixteen in breadth.

THE ALTAR OF INCENSE, was a small table of shittim-wood, covered with plates of pure gold, one cubit square and two high. Exod. 30: 1—10. At each of the four corners of it there was a horn; around it was a small border, and over it a crown of gold. Every morning and evening, the officiating priest offered incense of a particular composition upon the altar, to perform which he entered with the smoking censer filled with fire from the burnt-offerings, into the sanctuary or holy place, in which this altar was placed facing the table of shew-bread. When the priest had placed the censer on it, he retired out of the sanctuary. This altar was also to be sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifices that were offered for the sins of ignorance committed either by priests or people. Exod. 30: 10. Lev. 4: 3—7.

ALTAR, is employed by a figure of speech, for the sacrifice or offering itself. "Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar, sweareth by it, and by all things thereon." Matt. 23: 20. Hence, in a typical sense, it occasionally signifies Christ, the sacrifice of atonement, "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." "We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. For the bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest, for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name." Heb. 13: 10—15. There were two altars employed in the service of the Jewish temple; one, without, the altar of burnt-offering, upon which the offerings of atonement were made for the people; the other, within the temple, upon which the incense was offered. In both of these, the typical signification is the same, for it is through Christ crucified alone—himself the altar—himself the sacrifice—that we can approach to the Father; and it is through him only that we can plead his merits, and offer up praises and thanksgiving before God. "And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne." Rev. 8: 3. And as in the temple worship, the sacrifice of atonement must first be made before the incense could be offered, so likewise in the services of God's spiritual temple, the atoning influence of Christ's sacrifice must be received into the heart by faith before any offerings of the believer can be acceptable to him. In a bad sense, the type applies to idol sacrifices, and the mediatorial object of idol worship. "Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar? What say I then, that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols, is any thing? But I say that the things that the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils." 1 Cor. 10: 18—21.

The first Christians acknowledged no temple made with hands, no material altar, no mortal priest, no carnal sacrifice; they considered that an end was put to all these things by the death of Christ; and to have continued the use of them would have been to deny, by their actions, what, in words, they professed to believe;—that God had now fulfilled the mercy promised unto their fathers by the prophets; that he had visited and redeemed his people; that Messiah had been cut off for the sins of others; and that he had, by his death, "finished transgression, made an end of sin-offerings, made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness." Ps. 40: 6—8. Isa. 53: 4—12. Dan. 9: 24, 25. Since the days of the apostles, indeed, the use of altars has been resumed in places professedly appropriated to the purposes of Christian worship; but this did not take place until Christianity became corrupted from its original simplicity, and men, forsaking the form of sound words, began to mingle their own inventions with the doctrines and precepts of the apostles. When their minds once became darkened as to the nature and import of the memorial of the Lord's death, and they began to consider it in the light of a sacrifice, the necessity of altars on which to offer them, as well as that of officiating priests, followed of necessary consequence; and hence the revival of these shadows in all national churches. But these things belong to the corruptions of Christianity, and are easily understood by such as have "an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." (See the article ANTICHRIST.)—Calmet; Watson; Sherwood; Jones.

ALTAR AT ATHENS, inscribed "to the unknown God." Acts 17: 22, 23. The following is Dr. Doddridge's note on the passage:—"The express testimony of Lucian sufficiently proves that there was such an inscription at Athens; and shows how unnecessary as well as unwarrantable it was in Jerome to suppose, that the apostle, to serve his own purpose, gives this turn to an inscription, which bore on its front a plurality of deities. Whence this important phenomenon arose, or to what it particularly referred, it is more difficult to say. Witsius, with Heinsius, understands it of Jehovah, whose name, not being pronounced by the Jews themselves, might give occasion to this appellation; and to this sense Mr. Biscoe inclines. Dr. Wellwood supposes that Socrates reared this altar, to express his devotion to the one living and true God, of whom the Athenians had no notion; and whose incomprehensible being he insinuated, by this inscription, to be far beyond the reach of their understanding, or his own. And in this I should joyfully acquiesce, could I find one ancient testimony in confirmation of the fact. As it is, to omit other conjectures, I must give the preference to that which Beza and Dr. Hammond have mentioned, and which Mr. Hallet has labored at large to confirm and illustrate; though I think none of these learned writers has set it in its most natural and advantageous light. Diogenes Laertius, in his life of Epimenides, assures us, that in the time of that philosopher (about six hundred years before Christ) there was a terrible pestilence at Athens; in order to avert which, when none of the deities to whom they sacrificed appeared able or willing to help them, Epimenides advised them to bring some sheep to the Areopagus, and letting them loose from thence, to follow them till they lay down, and then to sacrifice them to the god near whose temple or altar they then were. Now it seems probable, that Athens, not being then so full of these monuments of superstition as afterwards, these sheep lay down in places where none of them were near; and so occasioned the rearing what the historians call anonymous altars, or altars, each of which had the inscription, to the unknown God; meaning, thereby, the deity who had sent the plague, whoever he were; one of which altars, at least, however it might have been repaired, remained till Paul's time, and long after. Now, as the God whom Paul preached as Lord of all, was indeed the Deity who sent and removed this pestilence, the apostle might, with great propriety, tell the Athenians, he declared to them him whom, without knowing him, they worshipped; as I think the concluding words of the twenty-third verse may most fairly be rendered."

Dr. Lardner has an article on this subject, which may be consulted with advantage; it is in the quarto edition, vol. iv. p. 174.—Calmel; Taylor.

ALTING, (HENRY, D. D. ; ) professor of theology at Heidelberg and at Groningen, was born 1583 at Embden, of a very ancient and honorable family. His parents were both pious. He made such proficiency in his studies under the famous Piscator and others, that, at the age of twenty-two, he was allowed to teach philosophy and divinity. In 1605 he was chosen preceptor to the three young counts of Nassau, Solmes, and Issenberg, together with the electoral Prince Palatine. In 1612, being appointed to attend the young elector into England, he there became acquainted with archbishop Abbot, Dr. King and Dr. Hackwell, and was introduced also to King James. The marriage between the elector and the princess of England, having been solemnized at London, Feb. 1613, Alting returned home, and in the following August was chosen professor of theology at Heidelberg. In 1618, he obtained the second professorship for Scultetus.

Being sent with two other deputies to the synod of Dort, he greatly distinguished himself there by his learning. In 1622, count Tilli took Heidelberg by storm, and allowed his soldiers to commit all manner of devastations. Alting had an almost miraculous escape; for being met by a soldier, he was stopped by him in this manner: "I have killed with these hands ten men to-day; and doctor Alting should make the eleventh, if I could find him: who are you?" The doctor replied, "a schoolmaster at the collegium sapientia." The soldier did not understand this, and so let him escape. In 1623, the king of Bohemia employed him at the Hague to instruct his eldest son; and would not consent to his becoming minister of Embden, or professor at the university of Francker, situations which were offered him. In 1627, however, he gave him leave to accept of a professorship of theology at Groningen; where, though repeatedly called to other places, he continued until his death.

In 1639, he lost his eldest daughter, and in 1643, his wife; domestic afflictions which gave severe shocks to his health. In his last sickness, being visited by the excellent Dr. Maresius, Alting congratulated him as his designed successor; adding, "It much rejoices me that I shall leave to the church and university, one who is studious of peace, orthodox in judgment, and averse to novelties."

The day before his death, he sang the 130th Psalm with a great sense of God's presence and love, and passed the rest of his time in meditation and prayer. In the evening he blessed his children; and the next morning, finding within himself that his departure was at hand, he told those about him that before sunset he should depart, and be with the Lord. Grounding his faith on the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ, with the promises of his Gospel; strengthened and comforted by the gracious influence of the Holy Ghost, he waited for death without fear; bade the numerous circle of learned and pious relatives and friends around him farewell; and expressed his readiness and desire to be dissolved, and to be with his Master in Heaven. Thus peacefully did this good man depart, Aug. 25, 1644.

He was, says Middleton, a man of great worth, distinguished alike for his learning, diligence, public spirit, and benevolence to mankind. Among other important commissions in which he was employed, one was the revival of the New Dutch translation of the Bible at Leyden; and another to be sole general inspector of the county of Steinfurt, to set in order the churches, which had been threatened with an invasion of Socinianism. Alting, though attached to orthodoxy, was no quarrelsome divine, and wasted no time on insignificant matters; though zealous for ancient doctrine, he was an enemy to the subtleties of the schools; and though not fond of novelty, adhered closely to the instructions of the word of God.

His works, with the exception of his Theologia Historica, 1664, were published together in three volumes, with the title, Scripta Theologica Heidebergenia.—Middleton.

ALWAYS; continually, Deut. 5: 29.; habitually, Acts 10: 2.; through life, 2 Sam. 5: 10.; to the end of this world, Mark 14: 7.; forever, Job 7: 16. In Mat. 28: 20. the literal rendering is "And mark, I am with you all the days, until the conclusion of the world."

AM: I AM THAT I AM; One of the distinguishing names and characters of JEHOVAH. (Exod. 3: 14.) This solemn name demands our greater reverence and veneration, because it is the very name by which the Lord was pleased to reveal himself to Moses at the bush. The very expression carries with it its own explanation; that is, as far as creatures, such as we are, can enter into an apprehension of the meaning. When JEHOVAH saith, I AM THAT I AM, it is setting forth a right and power of existence, exclusive of every other. Of all others, some have been, some now are, and others may be; all are what they are from Him, and by his appointment. But He that is I AM, is, and must be, always and eternally the same. His is a self-existence, underived, independent, subject to no change, and impossible to be any other; "the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." Heb. 13: 8. Rev. 1: 8.

And what tends yet more to endear it to the heart of his people is, that the glorious name becomes the security of all his promises. I AM, gives certainty to all he hath said, and becomes a most sure security for the fulfilment of all that he hath promised. Oh! for grace to bend with the lowest humbleness to the dust, in token of our nothingness before this great and almighty I AM. And no less to rest in holy faith and hope, in the most perfect confidence, that he will perform all his promises.—(See JEHOVAH.)

AMALEKITES; a people whose country adjoined the southern border of the land of Canaan, in the north-western part of Arabia Petraea. They are generally supposed to have been the descendants of Amalek, the son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau. But Moses speaks of the Amalekites long before this Amalek was born; namely, in the days of Abraham, when Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, devastated their country, Gen. 14: 7.; from which it may be inferred that there was some other and more ancient Amalek, from whom this people sprang. The Arabians have a tradition that this Amalek was a son of Ham; and when we consider that so early as the march from Egypt, the Amalekites were a people powerful enough to attack the Israelites, it is far more probable that they should derive their ancestry from Ham, than from the then recent stock of the grandson of Esau. It may also be said that the character and fate of this people were more consonant with the dealings of Providence towards the families of the former. This more early origin of the Amalekites will likewise explain why Edom called them the "first of the nations."

They are supposed by some to have been a party or tribe of the shepherds who invaded Egypt, and kept it in subjection for two hundred years. This will agree with the Arabian tradition as to their descent. It also agrees with their pastoral and martial habits, as well as with their geographical position; which was perhaps made choice of on their retiring from Egypt, adjoining that of their countrymen the Philistines, whose history is very similar. It also furnishes a motive for their hostility to the Jews, and their treacherous attempt to destroy them in the desert. The ground of this hostility has been very generally supposed to have been founded in the remembrance of Jacob's depriving their progenitor of his birthright. But we do not find that the Edomites, who had this ground for a hatred to the Jews, made any attempt to molest them, nor that Moses ever reproaches the Amalekites for attacking the Israelites as their brethren; nor do we ever find in Scripture that the Amalekites joined with the Edomites, but always with the Canaanites and the Philistines. These considerations would be sufficient, had we no other reasons, for believing them not to be of the stock of Esau. They may, however, be deduced from a higher origin; and viewing them as Cuthite shepherds and warriors, we have an adequate explanation both of their imperious and warlike character, and of the motive of their hostility to the Jews in particular. If expelled with the rest of their race from Egypt, they could not but recollect the fatal overthrow at the Red sea; and if not participators in that catastrophe, still, as members of the same family, they must bear this event in remembrance with bitter feelings of revenge. But an additional motive is not wanting for this hostility, especially for its first act. The Amalekites probably knew that the Israelites were advancing to take possession of the land of Canaan, and resolved to frustrate the purposes of God in this respect. Hence they did not wait for their near approach to that country, but came down from their settlements, on its southern borders, to attack them unawares at Rephidim. Be this as it may, the Amalekites came on the Israelites, when encamped at that place, little expecting such an assault. Moses commanded Joshua, with a chosen band, to attack the Amalekites; while he, with Aaron and Hur, went up the mountain Horeb. During the engagement, Moses held up his hands to heaven; and so long as they were maintained in this attitude, the Israelites prevailed, but when through weariness they fell, the Amalekites prevailed. Aaron and Hur, seeing this, held up his hands till the latter were entirely defeated with great slaughter. Exod. 17.

The Amalekites were indeed the earliest and the most bitter enemies the Jews had to encounter. They attacked them in the desert; and sought every opportunity afterwards of molesting them. Under the Judges, the Amalekites, in conjunction with the Midianites, invaded the land of Israel; when they were defeated by Gideon. Judges 6: 7. But God, for their first act of treachery, had declared that he would "utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven;" a denunciation which was not long after accomplished. Saul destroyed their entire army, with the exception of Agag their king; for sparing whom, and permitting the Israelites to take the spoil of their foes, he incurred the displeasure of the Lord, who took the sceptre from him. Agag was immediately afterwards hewn in pieces by Samuel. 1 Sam. 15. It is remarkable that most authors make Saul's pursuit of the Amalekites to commence from the lower Euphrates, instead of from the southern border of the land of Canaan. (See Havilah.) David, a few years after, defeated another of their armies; of whom only four hundred men escaped on camels, 1 Sam. 30. after which event, the Amalekites appear to have been obliterated as a nation.—Watson.

AMANA; a mountain, mentioned in Cant. 4: 8. and by some supposed to be mount Amanus, in Cilicia. Jerome and the Rabins describe the land of Israel as extending northward to this mountain; and it is known that Solomon's dominion did extend so far. Mount Amanus, with its connections, separates Syria and Cilicia, and reaches from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates.

AMARIAH; eldest son of Meraioth, and father of the high priest Ahitub, was high priest in the time of the Judges, but we are not able to fix the years of his pontificate. His name occurs, 1 Chron. 6: 7, 11. and if he actually did exercise this office, he should be placed, as we think, before Eli, who was succeeded by Ahitub, who, in the Chronicles, is put after Amariah, ver. 7.

AMASA; son of Jether and Abigail, David's sister. Absalom, during his rebellion against David, placed his cousin, Amasa, at the head of his troops, (2 Sam. 17: 25.) but he was defeated by Joab, A. M. 2981. After the extinction of Absalom's party, David, from dislike to Joab, who had killed Absalom, offered Amasa his pardon, and the command of the army, in room of Joab, whose insolence rendered him insupportable. 2 Sam. 19: 13. On the revolt of Sheba, son of Bichri, David ordered Amasa to assemble all Judah against Sheba; but Amasa delaying, David directed Abishai to pursue Sheba, with what soldiers he then had about his person. Joab, with his people, accompanied him; and when they had reached the great stone in Gibeon, Amasa joined them with his forces. Joab's jealousy being excited, he formed the daring and cruel purpose of assassinating his rival—"Then said Joab to Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother? and took him by the beard with the right hand to kiss him;" but at the same time smote him with the sword. Such was the end of Amasa, David's nephew. Ch. 20: 4—10. A. M. 2982.

AMASAI; a Levite, who joined David with thirty gallant men, while in the desert, flying from Saul. David went to meet them, and said, "If ye be come peaceably to help me, mine heart shall be knit unto you: but if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no wrong in mine hands, the God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it." Then said Amasai, "Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse: peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers." David, therefore, received them; and gave them a command in his troops. 1 Chron. 12: 18.—Calmet.

AMAZEMENT; a term sometimes employed to express our wonder; but it is rather to be considered as a mixture of astonishment and terror. It is manifestly borrowed from the extensive and complicated intricacies of a labyrinth, in which there are endless mazes without the discovery of a clue. Hence an idea is conveyed of more than simple wonder; the mind is lost in wonder. (See WONDER.)

AMAZIAH; son of Joash, eighth king of Judah, (2 Chron. 24: 27.) succeeded his father, A. M. 3165. He was twenty-five years of age when he began to reign, and reigned twenty-nine years at Jerusalem. He did good in the sight of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart. When settled in his kingdom, he put to death the murderers of his father, but not their children; because it is written in the law, "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin." Deut. 24: 16. 2 Chron. 25: 1, 2, 3.

Amaziah reigned twenty-nine years at Jerusalem; but as he returned not to the Lord with all his heart, he was punished by a conspiracy formed against him at Jerusalem. He endeavored to escape to Lachish; but was assassinated, and brought back on horses, and buried with his ancestors, in the city of David, A. M. 3194.

AMBASSADOR. The ministers of the Gospel are called ambassadors, because they are appointed by God to declare his will to men, and to promote a spiritual alliance with him. 2 Cor. 5: 20.

AMBITION; the love of honor, a desire of excelling, or at least of being thought to excel, our neighbors in any thing. It is generally used in a bad sense for an immoderate or illegal pursuit of power or honor. (See PRAISE.) Paul uses it in a good sense, 2 Cor. 5: 9.

AMEDIANIANS; a congregation of religious in Italy; so called from their professing themselves amantes Deum, "lovers of God;" or rather amati Deo, "beloved of God." They wore a gray habit and wooden shoes, had no breeches, and girt themselves with a cord. They had twenty-eight convents, and were united by pope Pius V. partly with the Bistercian order, and partly with that of the Socolanti, or wooden shoe wearers.—Buck.

AMELIA, (the princess;) the eminently pious daughter of his majesty George the third: born 1753, and died 1810, aged 27 years. She was most tenderly beloved by her father, whose last illness is supposed to have been accelerated, if not brought on by her death. A beautiful picture of the venerable monarch and his daughter is given by a gentleman who was in the habit of close and official attendance on the princess Amelia during her last days. Being asked what was the nature of the interviews and conversations between her and his majesty, he replied, "they are of the most interesting kind." "Are they of a religious tendency?" "Decidedly so," replied the gentleman; "and the religion is exactly of that sort which you, as a serious Christian, would approve. His majesty speaks to his daughter, of the only hope of a sinner being in the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ. He examines her as to the integrity and strength of that hope in her own soul. The princess listens with calmness and delight to the conversation of her venerable parent, and replies to his questions in a very affectionate and serious manner. If you were present at one of these interviews, you would acknowledge with joy that the Gospel is preached in a palace, and that under highly affecting circumstances. "Nothing," added he, "can be more striking than the sight of the king, aged and nearly blind, bending over the couch on which the princess lies, and speaking to her about salvation through Christ, as a matter far more interesting to both than the highest privileges and most magnificent pomp of royalty."—Clissold.

AMEN; a Hebrew word, which, when prefixed to an assertion, signifies assuredly, certainly, or emphatically, so it is; but when it concludes a prayer, so be it, or so let it be, is its manifest import. In the former case, it is assertive, or assures of a truth or a fact; and is an asseveration, and is properly translated indeed. John 3: 3. In the latter case it is petitionary, and, as it were, epitomises all the requests with which it stands connected. Numb. 5: 22. Rev. 22: 20. This emphatical term was not used among the Hebrews by detached individuals only, but on certain occasions, by an assembly at large. Deut. 27: 14, 20. It was adopted, also, in the public worship of the primitive churches, as appears by that passage, 1 Cor. 14: 16. and was continued among the Christians in following times; yea, such was the extreme into which many run, that Jerome informs us, in his time, that, at the conclusion of every public prayer, the united amen of the people sounded like the fall of water, or the noise of thunder. Nor is the practice of some professors in our own time to be commended, who with a low though audible voice, add their amen to almost every sentence, as it proceeds from the lips of him who is praying. As this has a tendency to interrupt the devotion of those that are near them, and may disconcert the thoughts of him who leads the worship, it would be better omitted, and a mental amen is sufficient. The term, as used at the end of our prayers, suggests that we should pray with understanding, faith, fervor, and expectation.—(See Mr. Booth's Amen to Social Prayer.)

Amen is applied as a title to our Lord. Rev. 3: 14. Is a kind of fondness for this term peculiar to John? he recollecting, with much pleasure, after many years' interval, his Divine Master's manner of using it.—Buck.

AMES, (WILLIAM, D. D.;) an English divine, celebrated for his learning and able controversial writings. He was born 1576, in Norfolk, being the descendant of an ancient family; and educated at Christ church college, Cambridge, under the famous Mr. William Perkins; by whom, probably, he was brought to the knowledge of the truth, as it is in Jesus. He seems ever after to have been zealous in the maintenance of the truth, and vehement against every species of sin. He was also an uncompromising antagonist against the corruptions and idolatries of the church of Rome.

In 1610, a sermon of his at St. Mary's in the University, gave great offence; because in it he condemned all playing at cards and dice; affirming, among other things, "that as God invented the one-and-twenty letters whereby he made the Bible, the devil found out the one-and-twenty spots on the die." To prevent expulsion, he forsook the college. Soon after, he was chosen by the states of Friesland, professor of their university. In 1613, his dispute with Grevinchovius, minister at Rotterdam, appeared in print. In 1618, he was at the synod of Dort, and informed the ambassador of king James, from time to time, of the debates of the assembly.

In 1623, after having filled the professor's chair at Franeker twelve years, he resigned his professorship, and accepted the charge of the English congregation at Rotterdam. He was induced to this change chiefly in hope of gaining relief from the asthma, with which he was afflicted. But his constitution was so shattered, that the air of Holland did him no service. He determined, therefore, upon an emigration to New England; but a return of his complaint in the beginning of the next winter put an end to this expectation; for he died at Rotterdam, Nov. 14, 1633, aged 57 years. It so happened that the last of his works was published about the same time; the editor of which quaintly remarks, "that with the coming forth of this book into the light, the learned and famous author, Dr. Ames, left the light, or rather the darkness, of this world."

Dr. Ames, (to use the words of Mr. Leigh,) was a judicious and solid divine, a strict Calvinist in doctrine, and an Independent in discipline. The fame of his writings, it is affirmed, was in all Europe; and while he filled the chair of theological professor at Franeker, his celebrity drew many students from Hungary, Poland, Prussia, and Flanders; who would not have staid there but for their attachment to him.

His works are, 1. Sermons preached at St. Mary's, Cambridge: 2. Puritanismus Anglicanus, 8vo. 1610. In English, 4to, at London, 1641; 3. Disputatio Scholastica inter Nic. Grevinchovium, at Gul. Amesium, 4to. 8vo. Amsterdam, 1613, concerning Arminius's opinions of Election, &c. 4. Disputatio inter Amesium at Nic. Grevinchovium, 4to. Rotterdam, 8vo. 1615, 1617, 1633, about Reconciliation, by the death of Christ. 5. Coronis ad collationem Hagensem, 12mo. Ludg. Bat. 1618, 1628, 1630: confuting the Answers given by the Arminians to the Dutch Pastors. 6. Medulla Theologica, 12mo. Franeker, 1623, 1627, 1628, 1634, 1641; also in English. 7. Explicatio utrusque Epistola S. Petri, 12mo. Amsterdam, 1625, 1635; also in English, 4to. London. 8. De Incarnatione Verbi, 8vo. Franeker, 1626, against the Socinians. 9. Bellarminus enervatus, 8vo. Amsterdam, 1627, 1628, Oxon. 1629, London, 1633, &c., an excellent treatise against Popery. 10. De Conscientia, 4to. 12mo. Am. 1630, 1631, 1643, also in English 1643. 11. Antisynodalia, 4to. 12. Demonstratio Logica vera, 4to. 13. Disputatio Theologica, against Metaphysics. 14. Techonometria. 15. Reply to Bp. Morton. 16. A Fresh Suit against Human Ceremonies, &c. 17. A first and second Manuduction. 18. Rescriptio, 4to. 19. Christianæ catechisæ, sciographia. 20. Lectiones in Omnes Psalmos Davidis, besides prefaces and miscellaneous pieces. His Latin works were reprinted at Amsterdam in 1658, in five volumes, with a preface by Matthias Nethenus.—Middleton.

AMES, (FISHER, LL. D.;) a distinguished statesman, and an eloquent orator, was born at Dedham, April 9, 1758. His father was a physician. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1774, and after a few years commenced the study of the law in Boston. He began the practice of his profession in his native village; but his expansive mind could not be confined to the investigation of the law. Rising into life about the period of the American revolution, and taking a most affectionate interest in the concerns of his country, he felt himself strongly attracted to politics. His researches into the science of government were extensive and profound, and he began to be known by political discussions, published in the newspapers. A theatre soon presented for the display of his extraordinary talents. He was elected a member of the convention of his native state, which considered and ratified the federal constitution; and his speeches in this convention were indications of his future eminence. The splendor of his talents burst forth at once upon his country.

When the general government of the United States commenced its operations in 1789, he appeared in the national legislature as the first representative of his district, and for eight successive years he took a distinguished part in the national councils. He was a principal speaker in the debates on every important question. Towards the close of this period his health began to fail, but his indisposition could not prevent him from engaging in the discussion, relating to the appropriations, necessary for carrying into effect the British treaty. Such was the effect of his speech of April 28, 1796, that one of the members of the legislature, who was opposed to Mr. Ames, rose and objected to taking a vote at that time, as they had been carried away by the impulse of oratory. After his return to his family, frail in health and fond of retirement, he remained a private citizen. For a few years, however, he was persuaded to become a member of the council. But though he continued chiefly in retirement, he operated far around him by his writings in the public papers. A few years before his death he was chosen president of Harvard college, but the infirm state of his health induced him to decline the appointment. He died on the morning of July 4, 1805. He left seven children: his only daughter died in 1829.

Mr. Ames possessed a mind of a great and extraordinary character. He reasoned, but he did not reason in the form of logic. By striking allusions more than by regular deductions, he compelled assent. The richness of his fancy, the fertility of his invention, and the abundance of his thoughts were as remarkable as the justness and strength of his understanding. His political character may be known from his writings, and speeches, and measures. He was not only a man of distinguished talents, whose public career was splendid, but he was amiable in private life, and endeared to his acquaintance. To a few friends he unveiled himself without reserve. They found him modest and unassuming, untainted with ambition, simple in manners, correct in morals, and a model of every social and personal virtue. The charms of his conversation were unequalled.

He entertained a firm belief in Christianity, and his belief was founded upon a thorough investigation of the subject. He read most of the best writings in defence of the Christian religion, but he was satisfied by a view rather of its internal than its external evidences. He thought it impossible, that any man of a fair mind could read the Old Testament and meditate on its contents, without a conviction of its truth and inspiration. The sublime and correct ideas, which the Jewish Scriptures convey of God, connected with the fact that all other nations, many of whom were superior to the Jews in civilization and general improvement, remained in darkness and error on this great subject, formed in his view a conclusive argument. After reading the book of Deuteronomy he expressed his astonishment, that any man, versed in antiquities, could have the hardihood to say, that it was the production of human ingenuity. Marks of divinity, he said, were stamped upon it. His views of the doctrines of religion were generally Calvinistic. An enemy to metaphysical and controversial theology, he disliked the use of technical and sectarian phrases. The term trinity however he frequently used with reverence, and in a manner, which implied his belief of the doctrine. His persuasion of the divinity of Christ he often declared, and his belief of this truth seems to have resulted from a particular investigation of the subject, for he remarked to a friend, that he once read the evangelists with the sole purpose of learning what Christ had said of himself.

He was an admirer of the common translation of the Bible. He said it was a specimen of pure English; and though he acknowledged, that a few phrases had grown obsolete, and that a few passages might be obscurely translated, yet he should consider the adoption of any new translation as an incalculable evil. He lamented the prevailing disuse of the Bible in our schools. He thought, that children should early be made acquainted with the important truths which it contains, and he considered it as a principal instrument of making them acquainted with their own language in its purity. He said, "I will hazard the assertion, that no man ever did or ever will become truly eloquent, without being a constant reader of the Bible, and an admirer of the purity and sublimity of its language."

Mr. Ames made a public profession of religion in the first congregational church in Dedham. With this church he regularly communed, till precluded by indisposition from attending public worship. His practice corresponded with his profession. His life was regular and irreproachable. Few, who have been placed in similar circumstances, have been less contaminated by intercourse with the world. It is doubted, whether any one ever heard him utter an expression, calculated to excite an impious or impure idea. The most scrutinizing eye discovered in him no disguise or hypocrisy. His views of himself, however, were humble and abased. He was often observed to shed tears, while speaking of his closet devotions and experiences. He lamented the coldness of his heart and the wanderings of his thoughts, while addressing his Maker, or meditating on the precious truths which he had revealed. In his last sickness, when near his end, and when he had just expressed his belief of his approaching dissolution, he exhibited submission to the divine will and the hope of the divine favor. "I have peace of mind," said he. "It may arise from stupidity; but I think it is founded on a belief of the Gospel." At the same time he disclaimed every idea of meriting salvation. "My hope," said he, "is in the mercy of God, through Jesus Christ."

Mr. Ames's speech in relation to the British treaty, which was delivered April 28, 1796, is a fine specimen of eloquence. He published an oration on the death of Washington in 1800, and he wrote much for the newspapers. His political writings were published in 1809, in one volume, 8vo. with a notice of his life and character by president Kirkland.—Allen's Biog. Dict.; Panoplist, July, 1800; Dexter's Fan. Eulogy; Marshall's Washington, vi. 203; Ames's Works.

AMIANTHUS; an adjective derived from this word is used in I Pet. 1: 3, 4. The Amianthus is a greenish or silvery white mineral, of fibrous texture, which is generally known under the name of Asbestos; a term derived from the Greek, and signifying "unquenchable," "indestructible by fire."

This mineral, and particularly a silky variety of it, in long slender filaments, was well known to the ancients, who made it into an incombustible kind of cloth, in which they burned the bodies of their dead, and by which means they were enabled to collect and preserve the ashes without mixture. This cloth was purchased by the Romans at an enormous expense. Pliny states that he had seen table-cloths, towels, and napkins of amianthus taken from the table at a great feast, thrown into the fire, and burned before the company; and by this operation rendered cleaner than if they had been washed.

From its peculiar property of not being destroyed by fire, the term amianthus is figuratively used for imperishable, indestructible. Thus in Pet. 1: 3, 4, we read, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his great mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." This blessed inheritance is called aphtharton, incorruptible, because it will not, like the earthly Canaan, be corrupted with the sins of its inhabitants, (Lev. 18: 28.) for into the heavenly country entereth nothing that defileth. Rev. 21: 7. It is declared to be amianthon, indestructible, because it shall neither be destroyed by the waters of a flood as the earth has been, nor by fire, as in the end this world will be; and it is to be amaranton, unfading, because its joys will not wither, but remain fresh through all eternity.

AMMAH; a hill opposite to Giah, not far from Gibeon, where Asahel was slain by Abner. 2 Sam. 2: 24.

AMMANAH; in the Jewish writers, is the same as mount Hor; a mount in the northern boundary of the land. In the Jerusalem Targum, mount Hor is called mount Manns; Jonathan writes it Umanis. Inwards from Ammanah was within the land, beyond Ammanah was without the land, according to the opinions of the Talmudists.—Calmet.

AMMI; that is, my people; and RUHAMAH, or perhaps, more properly Rachamah, having obtained mercy. See Hos. 2: 1. This name being given to the ten tribes after their rejection, imports that in the latter days, or Millennium, God shall redeem them from their misery and bondage, and bring them into special covenant relation with himself.

Let the reader observe that the Lord commands the prophet to call by this name the brethren and sisters of the church. "Say ye to your brethren Ammi, and to your sisters Ruhamah; plead with your mother, plead." Though put away by reason of her gross infidelity, yet the provision made for her recovery in Christ is such that she shall return to her rightful Lord. "For this reason (saith the Lord) plead with your mother, plead;" work upon her maternal feelings; give her to see, that though by adulteries she is by law justly liable to be divorced forever, yet the right and interest of her (first) husband hath never been lost. He claims her as his own. Return again unto me, saith the Lord.

If the reader be led to consider the subject in this point of view, the expressions of Ammi and Ruhamah, with all the doctrines connected with both, become interesting and tender beyond all imagination.—Hacker.

I. AMMON, or No-Ammon, or Ammon-No; a city of Egypt. The prophets describe No-Ammon as being situ ated among the rivers; as having the waters surrounding it; having the sea as its rampart; and as being extremely populous. This description has induced Calmet, and the majority of interpreters, to consider No-Ammon as having been the same with Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter in Lower Egypt. The ruin of this city, so distinctly foretold by the prophets, occurred under Esarhaddon and Nebuchadnezzar; though its ruin may not be said to have been completed till the time of Sennacherib. (See NOAH, for a more full description.)

II. AMMON, or HAMMON, or HAMAUN, or JUPITER AMMON; a celebrated god of the Egyptians, was probably a deification of Ham, whose posterity peopled Africa, and who was the father of Mizraim, the founder of the Egyptian polity and power. Ammon had a famous temple in Africa, where he was adored under the symbolic figure of a ram. It was situated in a delicious spot, (the Oasis,) in the midst of a frightful desert, where was an oracle of great fame, which Alexander the Great consulted, at the risk of his life.

It has been thought that Ammon is an Egyptian compound, HAM-ON; i. e. Ham, the sun; On being the Egyptian name for that luminary, afterwards idolatrously referred to Ham; and in Josh. 7: 2. we find a temple dedicated to On or Aun; "Beth-Aven," in our translation. (See HAM, NOAH, TREBES, ARK.) Scripture says nothing of this false deity, in particular; but speaks of Ham, and of the city of Ammon, or No-Ammon, which was principally devoted to him, and which was very distant from the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, in the desert, just mentioned. Ammon, the god of the Egyptians, was, as already remarked, the Jupiter of the Greeks, for which reason, the latter call that city Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter, which is the former name, according to Calmet, No-Ammon, the rest or habitation of Ammon. (But see NOAH.) In after ages, the Egyptian and Greek names were united, and the deity was called Jupiter-Hammon.

III. AMMON, or Ben-Ammi; son of Lot, by his younger daughter. Gen. 19: 34, 35. His abode was east of the Dead sea and Jordan, in the mountains of Gilead, and he was the father of the Ammonites, a famous people, always at enmity with Israel. The name Ben-Ammi has usually been interpreted "the son of my people;" but this, as Mr. Taylor remarks, is impossible; Ben-Ammi might be their father, but not their son. But if we take aun or aun in the sense of generator, source of life, then this name is extremely applicable, importing ancestor or "grandfather's son;" which aptly describes the descent of this child from his father, yet his grandfather, who should have been one degree further removed in blood.—Calmet.

AMMONIANS. (See AMMONIUS SACCHUS; NEW PLATONISTS.)

AMMONITES; the descendants of Ammon, the son of Lot. They took possession of the country called by their name, after having driven out the Zamzummins, who were its ancient inhabitants. The precise period at which this expulsion took place, is not ascertained. The Ammonites had kings, and were uncircumcised, Jer. 9: 25, 26, and seem to have been principally addicted to husbandry. They, as well as the Moabites, were among the nations whose peace or prosperity the Israelites were forbidden to disturb. Deut. 2: 19, &c. However, neither the one nor the other were to be admitted into the congregation to the tenth generation, because they did not come out to relieve them in the wilderness, and were implicated in hiring Balaam to curse them. Their chief and peculiar deity is, in Scripture, called Moloch. Chemosh was also a god of the Ammonites.

The country anciently peopled by the Ammonites is situated to the east of Palestine, and is now possessed partly by the Arabs and by the Turks. It is naturally one of the most fertile provinces of Syria, and it was for many ages one of the most populous. The Ammonites often invaded the land of Israel, and at one period, united with the Moabites, they retained possession of a great part of it, and grievously oppressed the Israelites for the space of eighteen years. Jephthah repulsed them, and took twenty of their cities, but they continued afterward to harass the borders of Israel—and their capital was besieged by the forces of David, and their country rendered tributary.

They regained and long maintained their independence, till Jotham, king of Judah, subdued them, and exacted from them an annual tribute of a hundred talents, and thirty thousand quarters of wheat and barley: yet they soon contested again with their ancient enemies, and exulted in the miseries that befel them when Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem and carried its inhabitants into captivity. In after-times, though successively oppressed by the Chaldeans, (when some of the earliest prophecies respecting it were fulfilled,) and by the Egyptians and Syrians, Ammon was a highly productive and populous country, when the Romans became masters of all the provinces of Syria, and several of the allied cities which gave name to the celebrated Decapolis were included within its boundaries.

Even when first invaded by the Saracens, this country, including Moab, was enriched by the various benefits of trade, covered with a line of forts, and possessed some strong and populous cities. Volney bears witness, "that in the immense plains of the Hauran; ruins are continually to be met with, and that what is said of its actual fertility perfectly corresponds with the idea given of it in the Hebrew writings." The fact of its natural fertility is corroborated by every traveller who has visited it. And "it is evident," says Burckhardt, "that the whole country must have been extremely well cultivated, in order to have afforded subsistence to the inhabitants of so many towns," as are now visible only in their ruins. While the fruitfulness of the land of Ammon, and the high degree of prosperity and power in which it subsisted, long prior and long subsequent to the date of the predictions, are thus indisputably established by historical evidence and by existing proofs, the researches of recent travellers (who were actuated by the mere desire of exploring these regions and obtaining geographical information) have made known its present aspect; and testimony the most clear, unexceptionable, and conclusive, been borne to the state of dire desolation to which it is and has long been reduced.

It was prophesied concerning Ammon, "Son of man, set thy face against the Ammonites, and prophesy against them. I will make Rabbah of the Ammonites a stable for camels and a couching place for flocks. Behold, I will stretch out my hand upon thee, and deliver thee for a spoil to the heathen; I will cut thee off from the people, and cause thee to perish out of the countries; I will destroy thee. The Ammonites shall not be remembered among the nations. Rabbah," (the chief city) "of the Ammonites, shall be a desolate heap. Ammon shall be a perpetual desolation." Ezek. 25: 2, 5, 7, 10. 21: 32. Jer. 49: 2. Zeph. 2: 9.

Ammon was to be delivered to be a spoil to the heathen—to be destroyed, and to be a perpetual desolation. "All this country, formerly so populous and flourishing, is now changed into a vast desert." (Seetzen's Travels.) Ruins are seen in every direction. The country is divided between the Turks and the Arabs, but chiefly possessed by the latter. The extortions of the one, and the depredations of the other, keep it in "perpetual desolation," and make it "a spoil to the heathen." "The far greater part of the country is uninhabited, being abandoned to the wandering Arabs, and the towns and villages are in a state of total ruin." (Ibid.) "At every step are to be found the vestiges of ancient cities, the remains of many temples, public edifices, and Greek churches." (Burckhardt's Travels.) The cities are left desolate. "Many of the ruins present no objects of any interest. They consist of a few walls of dwelling-houses, heaps of stones, the foundations of some public edifices, and a few cisterns filled up; there is nothing entire, though it appears that the mode of building was very solid, all the remains being formed of large stones. In the vicinity of Ammon there is a fertile plain interspersed with low hills, which for the greater part are covered with ruins." (Burckhardt's Travels in Syria.) While the country is thus despoiled and desolate, there are valleys and tracts throughout it, which "are covered with a fine coat of verdant pasture, and are places of resort to the Bedouins, where they pasture their camels and their sheep." (Buckingham's Travels in Palestine.) "The whole way we traversed," says Seetzen, "we saw villages in ruins, and met numbers of Arabs with their camels," &c. Mr. Buckingham describes a building among the ruins of Ammon, "the masonry of which was evidently constructed of materials gathered from the ruins of other and older buildings on the spot. On entering it at the south end," he adds, "we came to an open square court, with arched recesses on each side, the sides nearly facing the cardinal points. The recesses in the northern and southern wall were originally open passages, and had arched door-ways facing each other; but the first of these was found wholly closed up, and the last was partially filled up, leaving only a narrow passage, just sufficient for the entrance of one man and of the goats, which the Arab keepers drive in here occasionally for shelter during the night." He relates that he lay down among "flocks of sheep and goats," close beside the ruins of Ammon; and particularly remarks that, during the night, he "was almost entirely prevented from sleeping by the bleating of flocks." So literally true is it, although Seetzen, and Burckhardt, and Buckingham, who relate the facts, make no reference or allusion whatever to any of the prophecies, and travelled for a different object than the elucidation of the Scriptures,—that "the chief city of the Ammonites is a stable for camels, and a couching-place for flocks."

"The Ammonites shall not be remembered among the nations." While the Jews, who were long their hereditary enemies, continue as distinct a people as ever, though dispersed among all nations, no trace of the Ammonites remains; none are now designated by their name, nor do any claim descent from them. They did exist, however, long after the time when the eventual annihilation of their race was foretold; for they retained their name, and continued a great multitude until the second century of the Christian era. (Justin Martyr.) "Yet they are cut off from the people. Ammon has perished out of the countries; it is destroyed." No people is attached to its soil; none regard it as their country and adopt its name: "And the Ammonites are not remembered among the nations."

"Rabbah," (Rabbah Ammon, the chief city of Ammon,) "shall be a desolate heap." Situated, as it was, on each side of the borders of a plentiful stream, encircled by a fruitful region, strong by nature and fortified by art, nothing could have justified the suspicion, or warranted the conjecture in the mind of an uninspired mortal, that the royal city of Ammon, whatever disasters might possibly befall it in the fate of war or change of masters, would ever undergo so total a transmutation as to become a desolate heap. But although, in addition to such tokens of its continuance as a city, more than a thousand years had given uninterrupted experience of its stability, ere the prophets of Israel denounced its fate; yet a period of equal length has now marked it out, as it exists to this day, a desolate heap, a perpetual or permanent desolation. Its ancient name is still preserved by the Arabs, and its site is now "covered with the ruins of private buildings—nothing of them remaining, except the foundations and some of the door-posts. The buildings, exposed to the atmosphere, are all in decay." (Burckhardt's Travels in Syria.) so that they may be said literally to form a desolate heap. The public edifices, which once strengthened or adorned the city, after a long resistance to decay, are now also desolate; and the remains of the most entire among them, subjected as they are to the abuse and spoliation of the wild Arabs, can be adapted to no better object than "a stable for camels." Yet these broken walls and ruined palaces, says Mr. Keith, which attest the ancient splendor of Ammon, can now be made subservient, by means of a single act of reflection, to a far nobler purpose than the most magnificent edifices on earth can be, when they are contemplated as monuments on which the historic and prophetic truth of Scripture is blended in one bright inscription.—Keith on the Evidence of Prophecy; Watson.

AMMONIUS SACCAS; a Christian philosopher of Alexandria, lived towards the end of the second century. He is considered as the founder of the mystic philosophy, known as the Alexandrian, or neo-platonic. Plotinus, Longinus, and Origen, were among his pupils. His system was, in fact, a crude mass of heterogeneous opinions, borrowed from various schools. He is said by some to have apostatized from Christianity, but this is denied by others.—Davenport.

AMORITES; a people descended from Amorrhæus, the fourth son of Canaan. They first peopled the mountains west of the Dead sea, but afterwards extended their limits, and took possession of the finest provinces of Moab and Ammon, on the east, between the brooks Jabbok and Arnon. Josh. 5: 1. Numb. 13: 29. 21: 29. Moses took this country from their king, Sihon, (A. M. 2553,) who refused the Israelites a passage, on their way out of Egypt, and attacked them with all his force. The lands which the Amorites possessed on this side Jordan, were given to the tribe of Judah, and those beyond the Jordan to the tribes of Reuben and Gad. Amos (ch. 2: 9.) speaks of their gigantic stature and valor, and compares their height to the cedar, their strength to the oak. The name Amorite is often taken in Scripture for Canaanite in general. We must distinguish three people of this name: 1. In mount Lebanon, east of Phœnicia.—2. Another people in mount Gilead, between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon.—3. A third people, who inhabited the mountain of Paran, between Sinai and Kadesh Barnea. Gen. 15: 16, 21.

AMORY, (THOMAS, D. D. ; ) a celebrated dissenting minister of the eighteenth century, was born at Taunton, Somersetshire, Jan. 28, 1701. In 1717, he was placed under the academical instruction of Mr. S. James, and Mr. H. Grove, who, during the reign of queen Anne, had been joint tutors at Taunton, at an academy for bringing up young men to the work of the ministry. Under their instruction Mr. Amory went through the usual preparatory studies and attainments; and in 1722 was approved of as a candidate for the Christian ministry. Though but twenty-one years of age, he was serious and devout; and spent much time in reading the Bible and in private prayer. In 1730 he was ordained, at Paul's meeting in Taunton, to the pastoral office; and from that time co-operated with Mr. Batser, his joint pastor, in the performance of the important duties which belong peculiarly to that sacred office. On the death of Mr. Grove, in 1738, Mr. Amory was unanimously appointed chief tutor in the academy at Taunton, and conducted the business of that institution with the same ability, and enlarged and liberal views, as his predecessor. In 1740, he was married to a pious and intelligent daughter of Mr. Baker, a dissenting minister in Southwark, who survived Mr. Amory, to whom he was much attached, and with whom he lived in affection and harmony. Five children were the fruit of their marriage, four of whom survived their father. At Taunton he was greatly esteemed, not only by his own congregation and sect, but by all the neighboring congregations and ministers, as well of the Independent and Baptist denominations, as of the Church of England. With the celebrated, pious, intelligent, and useful Mrs. Rowe, he was very intimate. Though thus beloved and happy at Taunton, and in the neighborhood, Mr. Amory was induced to quit his situation, and in October, 1759, removed to London, to be afternoon preacher to the society in the Old Jewry, belonging to Dr. S. Chandler. To be useful was his object. The salvation of the human race occupied all his thoughts; and when he removed to the vast metropolis, it was only in order that such objects might be more extensively promoted. In London he was not, however, so popular. "His delivery was clear and distinct, and his discourses were excellent; but his voice was not powerful enough to rouse the bulk of mankind, who are struck with noise and parade; and his sermons, though practical and affecting to the attentive hearer, were rather too close, judicious, and philosophical for the common run of congregations." To bigotry and intolerance he was a sworn foe; and he took for his motto the precept of Christ—"Judge not, that ye be not judged." To intelligent and rational dissenters his preaching was, however, peculiarly acceptable; and on him was bestowed every mark of distinction, which could be paid to the most eminent Presbyterian divine. When the dissenting ministers, in 1772, formed a design of endeavoring to procure an enlargement of the Toleration Act, Dr. Amory was one of the committee appointed for that purpose. After a long and useful life, he died on the 24th of June, 1774, aged seventy-three years. The character of Dr. Amory was pre-eminently excellent; his piety was wise, yet fervent. It was an habitual, operative principle—it influenced all his actions and opinions—it induced him to perform all the duties of life with singleness of heart, pleasing God—it was manifested by his conversation and conduct—by his general benevolence and humanity—by his affability and generosity, patience, self-denial, and love to the whole human race. His sermons were close, accurate, solid, and affectionate. His learning was very considerable. He was a sound theologian, a good biblical critic, and an excellent scholar and philosopher. His works, which are principally theological, consist of Sermons; A Letter to a Friend on the Perplexities to which Christians are exposed, and on the means of solving them; A Dialogue on Devotion; and Forms of Devotion for the Closet. In addition to such works, he wrote the Life, and edited the Writings, of the Rev. Mr. Grove;—also edited the Sermons of Grove, and Grove's System of Moral Philosophy; he wrote the Life, and edited the Writings, of Dr. George Benson; and edited the Posthumous Sermons of Dr. Chandler.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

AMOS; the fourth of the minor prophets, belonged to the little town of Tekoah, in Judah. There is no proof, however, that he was a native of this place, except his retirement there, when driven from Bethel. It is probable that he was born in the territories of Israel, to which his mission was principally directed. He prophesied in Bethel, where the golden calves were erected, under Jeroboam II. about A. M. 3215; and Amaziah, high priest of Bethel, accused him before the king, as conspiring against him. Amos answered Amaziah, "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was a herdsman, and a dresser of sycamore fruit; and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel." Amos 7: 10, to end. (See SYCAMORE.) He then retired into the kingdom of Judah, and dwelt in Tekoah, where he continued to prophesy. Amos complains in many places of the violence offered to him, to oblige him to silence; and bitterly exclaims against the crying sins of the Israelites, such as idolatry, oppression, wantonness, and obsequy. Nor does he spare the sins of Judah, such as their carnal security, sensuality, and injustice. He utters frequent threatenings against them both, and predicts their ruin. It is observable in this prophecy, that, as it begins with denunciations of judgment and destruction against the Syrians, Philistines, Tyrians, and other enemies of the Jews, so it concludes with comfortable promises of the restoration of the tabernacle of David, and the establishment of the kingdom of Christ. Amos was called to the prophetic office in the time of Uzziah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam, the son of Joash, king of Israel.

Some writers, in adverting to the condition of Amos, have, with a minute affectation of criticism, pretended to discover a certain rudeness and vulgarity in his style; and even Jerome is of opinion that he is deficient in magnificence and sublimity. He applies to him the words St. Paul speaks of himself, that he was rude in speech, though not in knowledge; "and his authority," says bishop Lowth, "has influenced many commentators to represent him as entirely rude, and void of elegance; whereas, it requires but little attention to be convinced that he is not a whit behind the very chiefest of the prophets;" equal to the greatest in loftiness of sentiment, and scarcely inferior to any in the splendor of his diction, and in the elegance of his composition. Mr. Locke has observed, that his comparisons are chiefly drawn from lions, and other animals, because he lived among, and was conversant with, such objects. But, indeed, the finest images and allusions, which adorn the poetical parts of Scripture, in general are drawn from scenes of nature, and from the grand objects that range in her walks; and true genius ever delights in considering these as the real sources of beauty and magnificence. The whole book of Amos is animated with a fine and masculine eloquence.—Watson.

AMPHIPOLIS; a city between Macedonia and Thrace, but dependent on Macedonia. Paul and Silas, being delivered out of prison, left Philippi, and going to Thessalonica, passed through Amphipolis. Acts 17: 1. It was also called Chrysopolis, or Christopolis. In the division of Macedonia, by Paulus Emilius, it was made the chief city of the first region of Macedonia, and a metropolis.—Calmet.

AMSDORFIANS; a sect, in the sixteenth century, who took their name from Amsdorf, their leader. They maintained that good works were not only unprofitable, but were obstacles to salvation.—Buck.

AMULET; a charm, or supposed preservative against diseases, witchcraft, or any other mischief. They were very frequent amongst the Jews, the Greeks, and the Romans, and were made of stone, metal, animal substances, or, in short, any thing which a weak imagination suggested. The Jews were very superstitious in the use of amulets, but the Mishna forbids them, unless received from some person, of whose cures at least three instances could be produced. The phylacteries worn by the Pharisees and others of the Jewish nation, were a sort of amulets.

Amulets, amongst the Greeks, were called phylakteria, peripta, apotelesmata, periammata, brebia, and exkolpia. The Latins called them amuleta, appensa, pentacula, &c. Remains of this superstition continue among ignorant people even in this country, which ought to be strongly discountenanced as weak or wicked. The word amulet is probably derived from amula, a small vessel with lustral water in it, anciently carried in the pocket for the sake of purification and expiation.—Watson.

AMYRALD, OR AMYRAUT, (MOSES, S. T. D.); a French Protestant divine, born at Bourgeuil, in 1596, was educated for the civil law, but preferred theology, and became professor of divinity at Saumur. In that profession he acquired the highest reputation. Such was his influence, that he succeeded in introducing the doctrine of Arminius into the French reformed churches, to the great displeasure of the zealous Calvinists. Being a friend to the doctrine of passive obedience, he was looked on with a favorable eye by Richelieu and Mazarine. Amyraut was a man of moderation and candor, and had the good fortune to be esteemed by men of all sects. His theological works are numerous. He died in 1664.—Davenport.

AMYRALDISM; a name given by some writers to the doctrine of universal grace, as explained and asserted by Amyraldus, or Moses Amyraut, and others, his followers, among the reformed in France, towards the middle of the seventeenth century. This doctrine principally consisted of the following particulars, viz: that God desires the happiness of all men, and none are excluded by a divine decree; that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance, that they may improve this power to saving purposes; and that they may perish through their own fault. Those who embraced this doctrine were called Universalists; though it is evident they rendered grace universal in words, but in reality restricted; at least in its highest exercises and effectual operation. (See CAMERONITES.)

ANABAPTISTS; those who maintain that baptism ought always to be performed by immersion. The word is compounded of ana, "new," and baptistes, "a Baptist," signifying that those who have been baptized in their infancy, ought to be baptized anew. It is a word which has been indiscriminately applied to Christians of very different principles and practices. The English and Dutch Baptists do not consider the word as at all applicable to their sect; because those persons whom they baptize they consider as never having been baptized before, although they have undergone what they term the ceremony of sprinkling in their infancy.

The Anabaptists of Germany, besides their notions concerning baptism, depended much upon certain ideas which they entertained concerning a perfect church establishment, pure in its members, and free from the institutions of human policy. The most prudent part of them considered it possible, by human industry and vigilance to purify the church; and seeing the attempts of Luther to be successful, they hoped that the period was arrived in which the church was to be restored to this purity. Others, not satisfied with Luther's plan of reformation, undertook a more perfect plan, or, more properly, a visionary enterprise, to found a new church entirely spiritual and divine.

This sect was soon joined by great numbers, whose characters and capacities were very different. Their progress was rapid; for, in a very short space of time, their discourses, visions, and predictions, excited great commotions in a great part of Europe. The most pernicious faction of all those which composed this motley multitude, was that which pretended that the founders of this new and perfect church were under a divine impulse, and were armed against all opposition by the power of working miracles. It was this faction that, in the year 1521, began their fanatical work under the guidance of Munzer, Stubner, Storck, &c. These men taught, that among Christians, who had the precepts of the Gospel to direct, and the Spirit of God to guide them, the office of magistracy was not only unnecessary, but an unlawful encroachment on their spiritual liberty; that the distinctions occasioned by birth, rank, or wealth, should be abolished; that all Christians, throwing their possessions into one stock, should live together in that state of equality which becomes members of the same family; that as neither the laws of nature, nor the precepts of the New Testaments, had prohibited polygamy, they should use the same liberty as the patriarchs did in this respect.

They employed, at first, the various arts of persuasion, in order to propagate their doctrines; and related a number of visions and revelations, with which they pretended to have been favored from above; but, when they found that this would not avail, and that the ministry of Luther and other reformers was detrimental to their cause, they then madly attempted to propagate their sentiments by force of arms. Munzer and his associates, in the year 1525, put themselves at the head of a numerous army, and declared war against all laws, governments, and magistrates of every kind, under the chimerical pretext that Christ himself was now to take the reins of all government into his hands: but this seditious crowd was routed and dispersed by the elector of Saxony and other princes, and Munzer, their leader, put to death.

Many of his followers, however, survived and propagated their opinions through Germany, Switzerland, and Holland. In 1533, a party of them settled at Munster, under two leaders of the names of Matthias and Bockholdt. Having made themselves masters of the city, they deposed the magistrates, confiscated the estates of such as had escaped, and deposited the wealth in a public treasury for common use. They made preparations for the defence of the city; invited the Anabaptists in the Low Countries to assemble at Munster, which they called Mount Zion, that from thence they might reduce all the nations of the earth under their dominion. Matthias was soon cut off by the bishop of Munster's army, and was succeeded by Bockholdt, who was proclaimed by a special designation of heaven, as the pretended king of Zion, and invested with legislative powers like those of Moses. The city of Munster, however, was taken, after a long siege, and Bockholdt punished with death.

It must be acknowledged that the true rise of the insurrections of this period ought not to be attributed to religious opinions. The first insurgents groaned under severe oppressions and took up arms in defence of their civil liberties; and of these commotions the Anabaptists seem rather to have availed themselves, than to have been the prime movers. That a great part were Anabaptists, seems indisputable; at the same time it appears from history, that a great part also were Roman Catholics, and still a greater part of those who had scarcely any religious principles at all. Indeed, when we read of the vast numbers that were concerned in these insurrections, of whom it is reported that one hundred thousand fell by the sword, it appears reasonable to conclude that they were not all Anabaptists. (See Robertson's History of Charles V. Enc. Brit. vol. i. p. 644; and articles BAPTISTS and MENNONITES.)

"The following," says Benedict, "seems the only satisfactory solution of this mysterious affair. All parties are anxious to clear themselves of the reproach of an unsuccessful and unpopular enterprise. Such a one was that of the German peasants. The Catholic historians of the times excuse all their brethren, who were concerned in it, and lay the whole blame at the door of Luther and the reformation. The Lutheran historians, from whom the English took their accounts, endeavored to clear themselves, by accusing the Anabaptists of being the prime movers and principal promoters of the insurrection. The papists were doubtless very unfair and erroneous, in charging the reformation with being the direct cause of the troubles, wars, and commotions, of which it was certainly no more than the indirect and innocent occasion; but they were not mistaken when they charged the Lutherans with being deeply engaged in the rustic war. The Lutherans have conceded that some of their party perverted and misconstrued the reformer's doctrine of Christian liberty, and flocked to the standard of the rebels. But the papists are not content with these concessions, they have constantly laid the whole mischief of this intestine dissension at the door of Luther and his disciples; 'This,' say they, 'is the fruit of the new doctrine! This is the fruit of Luther's gospel!'

"It is certain that the disturbances in the very city of Munster were begun by a Pedobaptist minister of the Lutheran persuasion, whose name was Bernard Rotman, or Rethman; that he was assisted in his endeavors by other ministers of the same persuasion; and that they began to stir up tumults, that is, teach revolutionary principles, a year before the Anabaptist ringleaders, as they are called, visited the place. These things the papists knew, and they failed not to improve them to their own advantage. They uniformly insisted that Luther's doctrine led to rebellion, that his disciples were the prime movers of the insurrections, and they also asserted that a hundred and thirty thousand Lutherans perished in the rustic war.

"Such were the aspersions cast upon the Lutheran party by the papists. And though many Catholics were engaged in the war, yet the Lutherans knew it would be unavailing to retort upon them; for whatever resistance the oppressed Catholics had shown, the Catholic doctrine did not lead to it, for that taught nothing but blind and dumb submission to every law of their superiors, whether civil or religious. But as the Anabaptists were the advocates for liberty, and as many of them had taken a part in the war which they hoped would set them free, the Lutherans found it easy to cast all the blame upon them. And they, having no one to tell their story as it was, nor put in any plea for them, which could be heard, the Munster affair, as it was first related by the Lutheran historians, has been transmitted from one generation to another, without any correction or amendment; it has been transcribed by a thousand Pedobaptist pens, as a salutary memento for the seditious dippers; it is the dernier resort of every slanderous declaimer against them; it is the great gun, the ultima ratio of every disputant, which they keep in reserve against the time of need.

"But why all this din about Munster and the war of the peasants, since every body knows, who knows any thing of the matter, that it was not a quarrel about baptism, but about the feudal system; that it was not for water, but in opposition to the horrid oppression of the princes, that the German peasants rose? Why are not the Independents and the Congregationalists, their offspring, visited from age to age with the deeds of a few of their zealous predecessors, and of the promiscuous multitude, who attached themselves to their cause, and bore their name? They were accused by their enemies of every thing horrid and flagitious. 'The most eminent English writers,' says Mosheim, 'not only among the patrons of Episcopacy, but even among those very Presbyterians with whom they are now united, have thrown out against them the bitterest accusations, and the severest invectives the imagination could suggest. They have not only been represented as delirious, mad, fanatical, illiterate, factious, and ignorant both of natural and revealed religion, but also as abandoned to all kinds of wickedness and sedition, and as the only authors of the odious parricide committed on the person of Charles I. Rapin represents the Independents under such horrid colors, that were his portrait just, they could not deserve to enjoy the light of the sun, or breathe the free air of Britain, much less to be treated with indulgence and esteem by those who have the cause of virtue at heart.'

"But Mosheim could discover the tongue of slander in these representations; he could apologise for the Independents so far, that Dr. Maclean has thought it necessary to give him a check. He could, in giving their history, adopt the wise and prudent maxim, not to judge of the spirit and principles of a sect, from the actions or expressions of a handful of its members, but from the manners, customs, opinions, and behavior of the generality of those who compose it,' &c. But no such things could be thought of, in treating of the German Anabaptists. Why this partiality, in cases so exactly alike? The answer is plain, the Independents held to infant baptism, which the Anabaptists rejected.

"The respectable body of Presbyterians have, at different times, been loaded with the foulest aspersions. Millot, in speaking of the parliament army, says, 'it breathed only the fervor of Presbyterianism, and the rage of battle; and knew no pleasures but prayer and military duty.' We forbear to select examples of the kind, and these we have related with no other view, than to show the reader the impropriety of judging of the character of a sect or party, from the accounts of its adversaries.

"The American war terminated in a glorious manner, and all who were concerned in it were loaded with applauses, and hailed as the deliverers of their country. But the grievances of the American people were trifling, compared with those of the German peasants. But suppose the fortune of war had turned against the struggling Americans, how different would have been their fate! What, in such a case, would have been said of those Baptists, who enlisted under the revolutionary standard, whose eulogium was pronounced by the immortal Washington? What character would have been given of those ministers, who promoted the war, by every means in their power, who became chaplains in the armies, and dwelt in the camp of the warriors?—Backus, Gano, Stillman, Manning, Smith, Rogers, and others, instead of being the subjects of eulogium for the part they took in the war, would have been loaded with infamy, and branded with the infamous names of rebels, fanatics, and the ringleaders of a seditious multitude. They would have been the Muncers, Stubners, Storks, Bockholds, Phuffers, and Knip-perdolings of America."

It is but justice to observe, also, that the Baptists in Holland, England, and the United States, are to be considered as entirely distinct from those seditious and fanatical individuals above-mentioned: as they profess an equal aversion to all principles of rebellion on the one hand, and of enthusiasm on the other.—Buck's Theol. Dict.; Miner's Church History; Robinson's Eccl. Researches; Encyclopaedia Americana; Benedict's History of the Baptists.

ANACHORETS. (See ANCHORETS.)

ANAGOGICAL, signifies mysterious, transporting; and is used to express whatever elevates the mind, not only to the knowledge of divine things, but of divine things in the next life. The word is seldom used, but with regard to the different senses of Scripture. The analogical sense is, when the sacred text is explained with regard to eternal life, the point which Christians should have in view; for example, the rest of the Sabbath, in the analogical sense, signifies the repose of everlasting happiness.

ANAH; son of Zibcon, the Hivite, and father of Aholibamah, Esau's wife, Gen. 36: 24. While feeding asses in the desert, he discovered "springs of warm water," not mules, as the English translators and several others understand the Hebrew janim. Scripture never calls mules janim, nor are such creatures hinted at till after the time of David. And Robinson remarks that five or six miles south-east of the Dead Sea, and consequently in the neighborhood of Mount Seir, is a place celebrated among the Greeks and Romans for its warm baths.

ANAK; ANAKIM, famous giants in Palestine. Anak, father of the Anakim, was son of Arba, who gave name to Kirjath-Arba, or Hebron. He had three sons, Sheshai, Ahimai, and Talmi, whose descendants were terrible for their fierceness and stature. The Hebrew spies reported, that, in comparison to those monstrous men, they themselves were but grasshoppers. Some have thought, that the name Phœnician, given to the Canaanites, and particularly to the Sidonians, was originally from Bene-Anak, sons of Anak. Caleb, assisted by the tribe of Judah, took Kirjath-Arba, and destroyed the Anakim. Josh. 15: 14. Judges 1: 20. A. M. 2559. (See GIANT.)

ANALOGY; the science which, standing on the confines of what is known, points out the direction in which truth probably lies, in the region that is unknown. The laws of this science rest upon the two following self-evident principles: First, A part of any system which is the work of an intelligent agent, is similar, so far as the principles it involves are concerned, to the whole of that system. And, secondly, The work of an intelligent and moral being must bear, in all its lineaments, the traces of the character of its Author. And, hence, he will use analogy the most skillfully, who is most thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the system, and, at the same time, most deeply penetrated with a conviction of the attributes of the First Cause of all things.—Wayland on the Philosophy of Analogy.

ANALOGY OF FAITH; the correspondence of the several parts of Divine Revelation in one consistent whole. Rom. 12: 6. This is considered as furnishing a grand rule for understanding the true sense of Scripture. For, it is evident that the Almighty doth not act without a design in the system of Christianity any more than he does in the works of nature. Now this design must be uniform; for as in the system of the universe every part is proportioned to the whole, and made subservient to it, so in the system of the Gospel all the various truths, doctrines, declarations, precepts, and promises, must correspond with, and tend to, the end designed. For instance, supposing the glory of God in the salvation of man by free grace, in a way of righteousness and holiness, be the grand design: then whatever doctrine, assertion, or hypothesis, agree not with this, it is to be considered as false.—Great care, however, must be taken in making use of this method, that the inquirer previously understand the whole scheme, and that he harbor not a predilection only for a part; without attention to this we shall be liable to error. If we come to the Scriptures with any preconceived opinions, and are more desirous to put that sense upon the text which quadrates with our sentiments rather than the truth, it becomes then the analogy of our faith, rather than that of the whole system. This was the source of the error of the Jews, in our Savior's time. They searched the Scriptures; but, such were their favorite opinions, that they could not, or would not, discover that the sacred volume testified of Christ. And the reason was evident, for their great rule of interpretation was, what they might call the analogy of faith; i. e. the system of the Pharisean scribes, the doctrine then in vogue, and in the profound veneration of which they had been educated. Perhaps there is hardly any sect but what has more or less been guilty in this respect.

This analogy, however, may be of use to the serious and candid inquirer; for as some texts may seem to contradict each other, and difficulties present themselves, by keeping the analogy of faith in view, he will the more easily resolve those difficulties, and collect the true sense of the sacred oracles. What "the aphorisms of Hippocrates are to a physician, the axioms in geometry to a mathematician, the adjudged cases in law to a counsellor, or the maxims of war to a general, such is the analogy of faith to a Christian." OF THE ANALOGY OF RELIGION TO THE CONSTITUTION AND COURSE OF NATURE, we must refer our readers to bishop Butler's excellent treatise on that subject.—Buck; Wayland's Discourses; Campbell's Lectures on Systematic Theology; Douglas on the Truths of Religion; Shuttenworth on the Consistency of Revelation.

ANALYSIS OF THEOLOGY. The whole range of theological science may be conveniently divided into four parts. Indeed, theology itself, in accordance with this division, has received a fourfold appellation, viz. exegetical, systematical, historical, and pastoral theology. The object of this article is merely to give an analytical view of what is comprehended under each of these departments, reserving all further explanations for a future article on theological education.

I. EXEGETICAL THEOLOGY.

This department comprehends

- I. Biblical Introduction; which treats of the age, origin, contents, and character of the sacred writings.
- II. Biblical Criticism; distinguished into
  1. The Verbal Criticism, which relates to the integrity of the original text.
  2. The Higher Criticism, which examines the authenticity of the several books.
- III. Biblical Interpretation, or Hermeneutics.
- IV. Biblical Exposition, or Exegesis.

II. SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

This department comprehends

I. Theoretical Theology, or Dogmatics; distinguished into

1. Biblical; which draws its system exclusively from the Scriptures.

2. Ecclesiastical; which exhibits systematically the doctrines of a church.

3. Polemic; which undertakes to refute false exhibitions on the spot.

4. Apologetic; which is the defence and confirmation of Christianity in general.

II. Practical Theology, or Christian Ethics; which systematically applies the Christian rules of duty to

1. The Internal Affections and Motives.

2. The Visible Actions of Mankind.

III. Didactic Theology. This further distinction arises from the mode in which Systematic Theology is taught; which may be

1. Scientific; which puts in requisition all the aids of learning.

2. Popular; which leaves out of view all that cannot be apprehended without learned attainments.

III. HISTORICAL THEOLOGY.

This department comprehends

I. The General History of Religion among Mankind.

II. The History of the Christian Religion, or Church History.

III. History of Doctrines, (including Patristics, or the Writings of the Fathers.)

IV. History of Creeds and Denominations.

V. Antiquities, Jewish and Christian, or Archæology.

VI. Theological Literature, or Bibliography.

IV. PASTORAL THEOLOGY.

This department comprehends

I. Sacred Rhetoric; which is divided into

1. Homiletics, or the Preparation for the Pulpit.

2. Catechetics, or the Instruction of the Young.

II. Pastoral Duties; including

1. Official Character and Habits.

2. Forms of Worship, and Devotion.

III. Ecclesiastical Discipline, or Law; which is

1. General, or common to all Christian denominations.

2. Special, or belonging peculiarly to his own.

The sciences above enumerated complete the circle of theological learning. (See THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.)

ANANIM; second son of Mizraim. (Gen. 10: 13.) He peopled the Mareotis, if we may rely on the paraphrast Jonathan, son of Uzziel; but rather, the Pentapolis of Cyrene, according to the paraphrast of Jerusalem. Borchart was of opinion, that these Ananim dwelt in the countries around the temple of Jupiter Ammoo, and in the Nasamonitis. We believe the Ananians and Garamantes to be descended from Ananim. The Hebrew Ger, or Gar, signifies a passenger or traveller. The name of Ger-amanim may be derived from Ger-amanim: their capital is called Garamania, in Solinus.—Calmet.

ANAMMELECH. It is said (2 Kings 17: 31.) that the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, sent from beyond the Euphrates into Samaria, burned their children in honor of Anammelech and Adramelech. Mr. Taylor has suggested that Adramelech signified the sun, or splendid king, and Anammelech the moon, or gentle king; but this name, he further remarks, may be composed of anan, a cloud, and melek, a king. "The king of clouds," is no less a proper poetical epithet for the moon, than "region of night," as one of our own poets calls that planet. Perhaps, the distinguishing symbol of this idol was a cloud of gold, or some other splendid material, annexed to its statue. (See ADRAMELECH, and BAAL.)

I. ANANIAS; a professed Christian of the city of Jerusalem, who, in concert with his wife, Sapphira, sold an estate, and secreting part of the purchase-money, carried the remainder to the apostles, as the whole price of his inheritance. Acts 5: 1.

A number of conjectures have been formed as to the reasons which induced the Holy Spirit so visibly and suddenly to punish the falsehood of Ananias and Sapphira. Mr. Taylor thinks they might possibly be as follows:—1. In the infancy of the church, to give a solemn notoriety and a self-evident sanction to the doctrine introduced; not merely by miracles of advantage, (as healing.) but by miracles of punishment.—2. To deter those who through worldly motives of gain, or with a design to participate in the profits of the goods sold, might join the Christian church.—3. To deter spies, and false brethren, who could not be aware of the danger of detection, in all cases, after this event. If Ananias only had died, he remarks, it might have seemed a mere sudden death, produced by a natural cause. By this awful event, the Gospel was in some degree assimilated to the law. Directly after the injunction of the Sabbath was given, the Sabbath-breaker was ordered to be stoned; (Numb. 15: 35, 36.) so after the consecration of the holy altar, the sons of Aaron, who offered profane fire in their censers, were destroyed. Lev. 10: 1, 2. The same thing occurred in the case of Achan, (Josh. 7.) and in other instances.

It is evident, that in this and similar events, there must have been a conviction produced in the minds of spectators, that some extraordinary power was exerted. Had it been thought that Peter himself slew Ananias, he had, no doubt, been rendered amenable to the laws as a murderer. But, if it was evident that the apostle only forewarned him that he should die, then (as no man has power to kill another by his word only) it must have been equally evident that the power which attended the word of Peter, did not proceed from himself, but from God, who, only, has the keys of life and death. So, in like manner, the power which opened the earth to swallow down Korah, was not from Moses, personally, but from him in whose name he spake; (Numb. 16: 24.) though the people afterwards stupidly accused him of having killed the people of the Lord.

II. ANANIAS; a disciple of Christ, at Damascus, whom the Lord directed to visit Paul, then recently converted and arrived at Damascus. Acts 9: 10. The modern Greeks maintain, that he was one of the seventy disciples, bishop of Damascus; a martyr; and buried in that city. There is a very fine church where he was interred; and the Turks, who have made a mosque of it, preserve a great respect for his monument.

III. ANANIAS; son of Nebedæus, and high priest of the Jews, succeeded Joseph, son of Camith, A. D. 47. He was sent by Quadratus, governor of Syria, to Rome, to answer for his conduct to the emperor Claudius; but he justified himself, was acquitted, and returned. In the meantime, Jonathan had been appointed high priest in his place. But he being soon after murdered, Ananias appears to have assumed the functions from which he had been deposed, before a successor was appointed by Agrippa. It was at this point of time that Paul was brought before him. Acts 23: 1. Paul commenced his defence, but Ananias immediately commanded those who were near him to strike him on the face. To this injury and insult the apostle replied, "God is about to smite thee, thou whitened wall; for thou sittest to judge me according to the law, but commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law." Being rebuked for thus addressing himself to the high priest, the apostle excused himself by alleging, very properly, that he was ignorant of his office. (See PAUL.)

The assembly being divided in opinion, the tribune ordered Paul to Cesarea, and thither Ananias, and other Jews, went to accuse him before Felix. (Acts 24.) Ananias was considered the first man of the nation in point of riches, friends and fortune. Yet was the prediction of the apostle fulfilled, for he was slain by a seditious faction, at the head of which was his own son, at the commencement of the Jewish wars. Some writers, not distinguishing what Josephus relates of Ananias, when high priest, from what relates of him after his deposition, have made two persons of the same individual.

ANANUS; son of Seth, and high priest of the Jews; called Annas. Luke 3: 2. John 18: 13. He succeeded Joazar, son of Simon, and enjoyed the high priesthood eleven years, when he was deposed, and succeeded by Ishmael, son of Phabi. After his deposition, however, he retained the title of high priest, and had a great share in the management of public affairs. He is called high priest, in conjunction with Caiaphas, his son-in-law, when John the Baptist entered on the exercise of his mission, though at that time he did not, strictly speaking, possess that character. Luke 3: 2. Our Savior was carried before Annas, directly after his seizure in the garden of Olives.

ANASTASIA; a martyr of the fourth century. She was descended from an illustrious Roman family. Her mother Flavia was a Christian, and dying while her daughter was an infant, she bequeathed her to the care of Chrysgonus, a worthy Christian of Aquila, with a strict injunction to instruct her in the principles of Christianity. This Chrysgonus punctually performed, though it cost him his life. But the father of the young lady, being a Pagan, gave her in marriage to a man of his own faith named Publius: who though of good family, was of bad morals, and, after spending both his own and his wife's patrimony, had the baseness to inform against her as a Christian. Her husband dying soon after, Anastasia was released; but in consequence of her many charitable offices to distressed Christians, she was again apprehended, and delivered up to Florus, governor of Illyricum. By his command she was put to the torture; but her constancy in the Christian faith remaining unshaken, Florus ordered her to be burnt to death; which sentence was executed December 25, A. D. 304, about one month after the martyrdom of Chrysgonus her instructor. What a meeting thus the mother, the daughter, and the instructor, have had in heaven!—Fuz.

ANATHEMA; from anathemi, signifies—something set apart, separated, devoted. It is understood principally to denote the absolute, irrevocable, and entire separation of a person from the communion of the faithful, or from the number of the living, or from the privileges of society; or the devoting of any man, animal, city, or thing, to be extirpated, destroyed, consumed, and, as it were, annihilated. The Hebrew cherem, signifies properly to destroy, exterminate, devote. The word cherem, or anathema, is sometimes taken for that which is irrevocably consecrated, vowed, or offered to the Lord, so that it may no longer be employed in, or returned to, common uses. Lev. 27: 28, 29. "No devoted thing (absolutely separated) that a man shall devote (absolutely separate) to the Lord, of man, beast, or field, shall be sold or redeemed." In the old Greek writers, anathema is used for a person, who, on some occasion, devoted himself for the good of his country; or as an expiatory sacrifice to the infernal gods. Here the reader will recollect Codrus and Curtius.

Some particular persons devoted themselves, if they did not accomplish some specific purpose. In Acts 23: 12, 13. it is said that above forty persons bound themselves with an oath, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. The Essenians were engaged by oath to observe the statutes of their sect; and those who incurred the guilt of excommunication, were driven from their assemblies, and generally starved to death, being obliged to feed on grass like beasts, not daring to receive food which might be offered them, because they were bound by the vows they had made, not to eat any.—Calnet.

ANATHEMA MARANATHA. We meet with this form of expression but once in Scripture, (1 Cor. 16: 22.) where the apostle Paul, in reference to the faction which had sprung up in the church, and betrayed a great disregard to the authority of Christ, says, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha." To give additional force and solemnity, he appears to have written it with his own hand. Why these two words were not translated is not obvious. Anathema signifies Accursed, that is to say, condemned and devoted to utter destruction. Maranatha signifies The Lord cometh. They are the words with which the Jews began their greater excommunication; whereby they not only excluded sinners from their society, but delivered them to the divine curse, (Hebrew cherem,) including both misery in this life, and perdition in that which is to come. They used this form, because Enoch's prophecy of the second coming of Christ to judge the world, and punish the wicked, began with these words; as we learn from Jude, who quotes the first sentence of that prophecy. Ver. 14. When the apostle, therefore, uses this form of solemn malediction, it is equivalent to saying of the sinner who loves not the Saviour, "It exceeds my power to express what ought to be the consequence of your crime. I therefore leave you to the Lord when He comes, to judge the quick and the dead."—Calnet; Jones; Hawker; Watson. Also, Macknight's note on 1 Cor. 16: 22.

ANATHOTH; a city of Benjamin, (Josh. 21: 18.) about three miles from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius and Jerome, or twenty furlongs, according to Josephus, where the prophet Jeremiah was born. It was given to the Levites of Kohath's family, and was a city of refuge. John 21: 18.

ANCHOR OF THE SOUL; so Christ our hope and forerunner in the heavens is called. Heb. 6: 18, 19. (See SHR.)

ANCIENT OF DAYS. God is so called, because he existed from all eternity. Dan. 7: 9. The Lord's ancients, before whom he will reign gloriously, are his ancient people of Judah and Israel, whom, in the glorious millennium, he will convert to the Christian faith, and rule over as a glorious church. Isa. 24: 23. Three times in the prophecy of Daniel, and in the same chapter, we find the Lord distinguished by this name, and in no other part of Scripture. Dan. 7: 9, 13, 22.

AND; a conjunction generally signifying addition, but occasionally only emphasis. For the sake of some, it may not be unimportant to remark, that in the English version of the Scripture, the word and sometimes occurs, where the proper translation would be even. Thus we read, "God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," where it should be "God, even the Father, &c." Several other passages will be clearer if this observation is remembered.

ANDREAS, (JAMES, D. D. ;) a famous Lutheran divine of the sixteenth century, was born at Waibling, in the Duchy of Wirtemberg, March 25, 1528. His parents were poor, but such were the marks of promising genius in this son, that several persons of distinction united in giving him a liberal education. In 1545, he became master of arts at Tubingen, and in 1553, took his degree of D. D. and was appointed pastor of Gopping and superintendent of the neighboring churches. In 1557, he was one of the secretaries at the conference of Worms. In 1559, he was sent to Augsburg, and in 1561 to Paris as one of the commissioners. On his return from the latter, he was appointed chancellor and rector of the university of Tubingen. From 1565 to 1589, he was continually employed by various princes in efforts to settle differences of faith, and to reform the churches. He labored much and strove long, in person and by his pen, to promote concord; but he fared much as people do who interpose between combatants—getting blows from both sides, and thanks from neither. Happily the reward of the peacemaker is not from men, but from God. Matt. 5: 9.

When he found death drawing near, this excellent man declared his constancy in the faith which he had preached and published for forty-four years. When his physician inquired how he found himself, he answered, "By nothing separated from my God." Soon afterwards, hearing the clock strike, he asked what hour it was; and upon being told it was six, he added, "my hour shall soon draw near." At length, after many edifying and grateful expressions, he breathed out his soul in the words, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit," and fell asleep, January 7, 1590, in the seventy-second year of his age. Nine only out of eighteen children by his excellent wife, survived him.

"He was (says Melchior Adam) an excellent preacher. He had an easy manner of instructing the people; and delivered the most obscure points in such a perspicuous style, that they were understood by the generality of his audience. When he exhorted them to the reformation of their lives, or remonstrated against sin, he made use of great energy of language and elevation of voice, being extremely well qualified, both by nature and art, for moving the passions; and when there was occasion for it, his eloquence was forcible like thunder, and he spoke with such vehemence, that he would sweat all over his body, even in the midst of winter. In executing the several branches of his duty, he spared no labor, and was deterred by no fatigue. He was perpetually engaged in composing some works or other, or in writing letters upon various subjects to persons of all ranks who consulted him; these things he dispatched with admirable quickness and success. There was hardly a day passed but he gave advice to several persons; being always ready to gratify those who solicited his assistance. He was in great favor with some princes and men of the highest rank, his conversation being very agreeable and sometimes facetious. It gave him extreme sorrow to hear that any person had abandoned the religion he professed; for his zeal for religion was warm."

Such was the character reared from the depths of indignity by the hand of charity. What a reward to the generous friends who drew him from the obscurity of a carpenter's shop, and fostered his rising genius!—Dr. Andrews wrote a great number of books, the most remarkable of which are his book "On Concord," and some treatises on the "Ubiquity of Christ."—Middleton.

ANDREW, the apostle, was a native of Bethsaida, and brother of Peter. He was first a disciple of John the Baptist, whom he left, to follow our Savior, after the testimony of John. John 1: 40. Andrew introduced his brother Simon, and after accompanying our Savior at the marriage in Cana, they returned to their ordinary occupation, not expecting, perhaps, to be further employed in his service. Some months after, Jesus met them while fishing, and called them to a regular attendance on his person and ministry, promising to make them fishers of men. Matt. 4: 19. John 6: 1. Some of the ancients are of opinion, that Andrew preached in Scythia; others, that he preached in Greece; others, in Epirus, Achaia, or Argos. The modern Greeks make him founder of the church of Byzantium, or Constantinople, which the ancients knew nothing of. The Acts of his Martyrdom, which are of considerable antiquity, though critics do not allow them to be authentic, affirm that he suffered martyrdom at Patras, in Achaia, being sentenced to be executed on a cross by Egæus, proconsul of that province.—Calmet.

ANDREWS, (Ep. LANCELOT, D. D.) an eminent English divine, was born in London 1565, and educated at Cambridge. While residing there, it was his custom to come up to London once a year, about Easter, to visit his father and mother, with whom he usually staid a month; during which time, with the assistance of a master, he applied himself to the attaining some language, or art to which he was before a stranger; and by this means, in a few years, he had laid the foundation of all the arts and sciences, and acquired a competent skill in most of the modern languages. While a fellow at the university, he became so celebrated as a theologian, casuist and preacher, that he attracted the patronage of the earl of Huntingdon, and of sir Francis Walsingham; and in no long time rose to be master of Pembroke Hall, (his own college,) chaplain to queen Elizabeth, and dean of Westminster. He might have had a bishopric from Elizabeth, if he would have submitted to the spoliation of its revenues. Under her successor, James I. he attained that dignity; being by him preferred to all others as a preacher, and chosen to vindicate his sovereignty, against Bellarmine. Andrews was successively raised to the sees of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester; besides being appointed lord almoner, and a privy counsellor of England and Scotland; which trusts he discharged with singular fidelity. The following anecdote of him, about this time, is recorded by Waller. Neale, bishop of Durham, and Andrews, were standing together behind the king's chair at dinner, when James suddenly turned to them, and said, My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money when I want it, without all this formality in parliament? Bishop Neale readily answered, God forbid, sir, but you should; you are the breath of our nostrils. The king turned to the bishop of Winchester, Well my lord, and what say you? Sir, replied Andrews, I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases. The king answered, no put-offs, my lord; answer me immediately. "Then sir, said he, I think it lawful for you to take my brother Neale's money, for he offers it."

King James had such a veneration for this excellent prelate, that in his presence he refrained from all levity. And he was in no less reputation and esteem with Charles I. His life was a life of prayer. A great part of five hours every day was spent in the exercises of devotion. And in his last sickness, he continued while awake to pray audibly till his strength failed; and then by lifting his hands and eyes shewed that he still prayed; and when both voice and hands and eyes failed in their office, his countenance showed that he still prayed and praised God, in his heart. September 25, 1626, it pleased God to receive him to himself; he being then in his seventy-first year. A monument of marble and alabaster was erected to his memory; and Milton thought him worthy of a Latin Elegy, which will be found among the works of the great poet.

Bishop Andrews was charitable and munificent. He was a patron of learning. His own admirable knowledge in the learned tongues, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldean, Syriac, Arabic, besides modern languages to the number of fifteen, was such and so rare, that he may well be ranked among the first linguists in Christendom. The style of his works is however deformed by the bad taste and pedantry of the age.—He published much; but his most celebrated productions are his Tortura Torti, against Bellarmine, and his Manual of Private Devotions and Meditations for every day in the week. He had a share in the translation of the Pentateuch; and the authorized version of the historical books, from Joshua to the first book of Chronicles, was executed by him exclusively, "in which being dead he yet speaketh."—Middleton; Davenport.

ANDRONA; a term used for that part in churches which was destined for the men. Anciently it was the custom for the men and women to have separate apartments in places of worship, where they performed their devotions asunder, which method is still religiously observed in the Greek church.

ANDRUS, (JOSEPH R.) agent of the Colonization Society, was graduated at Middlebury college in 1812, and after studying theology at New Haven and Andover, and also under bishop Griswold at Bristol, R. I., received episcopal ordination. It had been for years his purpose to devote himself to the welfare of the degraded and oppressed race of Africans. Being appointed agent of the Colonization Society, he sailed early in 1821, and proceeded with his associate, C. Bacon, in April, from Sierra Leone to the Bassa country, to negotiate with king Ber for a place of settlement. It was well for the proposed colony, that the attempt was unsuccessful, for a more healthful and eligible territory was afterwards purchased by Dr. Ayres at Montserado. Mr. Andrus died at Sierra Leone, and was buried July 29, 1821.—Allen's Biog. Dict.

ANGEL; a spiritual, intelligent substance, the first in rank and dignity among created beings. The word angel, is not properly a denomination of nature, but of office; denoting as much as nuncius, messenger, a person employed to carry one's orders, or declare his will. Thus it is St. Paul represents angels. Heb. 1: 14. where he calls them "ministering spirits;" and yet custom has prevailed so much, that angel is now commonly taken for the denomination of a particular order of spiritual beings, of great understanding and power, superior to the souls or spirits of men. Some of these are spoken of in Scripture in such a manner, as plainly to signify that they are real beings of a spiritual nature, of high power, perfection, dignity, and happiness. Others of them are distinguished as not having kept their first station. Jud. 6. These are represented as evil spirits, enemies of God, and intent on mischief. The devil as the head of them, and they as his angels, are represented as the rulers of the darkness of this world, or spiritual wickedness, or wicked spirits. Eph. 6: 12; which may not be unfitly rendered, "the spiritual managers of opposition to the kingdom of God."

The existence of angels is supposed in all religions, though it is incapable of being proved a priori. Indeed, the ancient Sudducees are represented as denying all spirits; and yet the Samaritans and Caraites, who are reputed Sudducees, openly allowed them: witness Abusaid, the author of an Arabic version of the Pentateuch; and Aaron, a Carait Jew, in his comment on the Pentateuch; both extant in manuscript in the king of France's library. In the Alcoran we find frequent mention of angels. The Mussulmen believe them of different orders or degrees, and to be destined for different employments both in heaven and on earth. They attribute exceedingly great power to the angel Gabriel, as that he is able to descend in the space of an hour from heaven to earth; to overturn a mountain with a single feather of his wing. &c. The angel Israël, they suppose is appointed to take the souls of such as die; and another angel, named Esraphil, they tell us, stands with a trumpet ready in his mouth to proclaim the day of judgment.

The heathen philosophers and poets were also agreed as to the existence of intelligent beings, superior to man; as is shown by St. Cyprian in his treatise of the vanity of idols; and from the testimonies of Plato, Socrates, Trisnegistus, &c. They were acknowledged under different appellations; the Greeks calling them demons, and the Romans genii, or lares. Epicurus seems to have been the only one among the old philosophers who absolutely rejected them.

2. Authors are not so unanimous about the NATURE, as about the existence, of angels. Though it be now a universal opinion that angels are of a spiritual and incorporeal nature, yet some of the fathers, misled by a passage in Gen. 6: 2. where it is said, "The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose," imagined them to be corporeal, and capable of sensual pleasures. But, without noticing all the wild reveries which have been propagated by bold or ignorant persons, let it suffice to observe, that by "the sons of God" we are evidently to understand the descendants of Seth, who, for the great piety wherein they continued for some time, were so called; and that "the daughters of men" were the progeny of wicked Cain.

The fathers who believed angels had bodies, were Clement Alexandrinus, Origen, Cæsarius, Tertullian, and several others. Athanasius, St. Basil, St. Gregory Nicensis, St. Cyril, St. Chrysostom, &c., held them to be mere spirits. It has been the more current opinion, especially in later times, that they are substances entirely spiritual, who can, at any time, assume bodies, and appear in human or other shapes. Ecclesiastical writers make a hierarchy of nine orders of angels. Others have distributed angels into nine orders, according to the names by which they are called in Scripture, and reduced these orders into three hierarchies; to the first of which belong seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; to the second, dominions, virtues, and powers; and to the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. The Jews reckon four orders or companies of angels, each headed by an archangel; the first order being that of Michael; the second, of Gabriel; the third, of Uriel; and the fourth, of Raphael. Following the scripture account, we shall find mention made of different orders of these superior beings; for such a distinction of order seems intimated in the names given to different classes. Thus we have thrones, dominions, principalities, or principedoms, powers, authorities, living ones, cherubim, and seraphim. That some of these titles may indicate the same class of angels, is probable; but that they all should be but different appellations of one common and equal order, is improbable. We learn also from Scripture, that they dwell in the immediate presence of God; that they "excel in strength;" that they are immortal; and that they are the agents through which God very often accomplishes his special purposes of judgment and mercy. Nothing is more frequent in Scripture than the missions and appearances of good and bad angels, whom God employed to declare his will; to correct, teach, reprove, and comfort. God gave the law to Moses, and appeared to the old patriarchs, by the mediation of angels, who represented him, and spoke in his name. Acts 7: 30, 35. Gal. 3: 19. Heb. 13: 2.

3. Though the Jews, in general, believed the existence of angels, there was a sect among them, the Sadducees, who denied the existence of all spirits whatever, God only excepted. Acts 23: 8. Before the Babylonish captivity, the Hebrews seem not to have known the NAMES of any angel. The Talmudists say they brought the names of angels from Babylon. Tobit, who is thought to have resided in Nineveh some time before the captivity, mentions the angel Raphael, Tob. 3: 17. 11: 2-7. and Daniel, who lived at Babylon, some time after Tobit, has taught us the names of Michael and Gabriel. Dan. 8: 16. 9: 21. 10: 21. In the New Testament, we find only the two latter mentioned by name. Luke 1: 19. Rev. 12: 7.

2. There are various opinions as to the time when the angels were created. Some think this took place when our heavens and the earth were made. For this opinion, however, there is no just foundation in the Mosaic account.

Others think that angels existed long before the formation of our solar system; and Scripture seems to favor this opinion. Job 28: 4-7. where God says, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?—and all the sons of God shouted for joy."

5. The exact NUMBER of angels is nowhere mentioned in Scripture; but it is always represented as very great; Dan. 7: 10. says of the Ancient of Days, "A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him." Jesus Christ says, that his heavenly Father could have given him more than twelve legions of angels, that is, more than seventy-two thousand, Matt. 26: 53. and the Psalmist declares, that the chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels. 68: 17. These are all intended not to express any exact number, but indefinitely a very large one. (See also HEB. 12: 22.)

6. AS to their CHARACTER, though all the angels were created alike good, yet Jude informs us, verse 6. that some of them "kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation;" and these God hath "reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." Speculations on the cause and occasion of their fall are all vain and trifling. Milton is to be read on this subject as on others, not as a divine, but as a poet. All we know is, that they are not in their first "estate," or in their original place; that they are not in their first "estate," or in their original place; that this was their own fault, for "they left their own habitation;" that they are in chains, yet with liberty to tempt; and that they are reserved to the general judgment. (See DEVILS.)

7. On the question of guardian angels, Bishop Horsley observes: "That the holy angels are often employed by God in his government of this sublunary world, is indeed to be clearly proved by holy writ. That they have power over the matter of the universe, analogous to the powers over it which men possess, greater in extent, but still limited, is a thing which might reasonably be supposed, if it were not declared. But it seems to be confirmed by many passages of holy writ; from which it seems also evident that they are occasionally, for certain specific purposes, commissioned to exercise those powers to a prescribed extent. That the evil angels possessed before their fall the like powers, which they are still occasionally permitted to exercise for the punishment of wicked nations, seems also evident. That they have a power over the human sensory, which they are occasionally permitted to exercise, and by means of which they may inflict diseases, suggest evil thoughts, and be the instruments of temptations, must also be admitted. But all this amounts not to any thing of a discretionary authority placed in the hands of tutelar angels, or to an authority to advise the Lord God with respect to the measures of his government. Confidently I deny that a single text is to be found in holy writ, which, rightly understood, gives the least countenance to the abominable doctrine of such a participation of the holy angels in God's government of the world. In what manner then, it may be asked, are the holy angels made at all subservient to the purposes of God's government? This question is answered by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews, in the last verse of the first chapter; and this is the only passage in the whole Bible, in which we have any thing explicit upon the office and employment of angels: 'Are they not all,' saith he, 'ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them that shall be heirs of salvation? They are all, however high in rank and order, nothing more than 'ministering spirits,' or, literally, 'serving spirits;' not invested with authority of their own, but 'sent forth,' occasionally sent forth, to do such service as may be required of them, 'for them that shall be heirs of salvation.'" (See MATT. 18: 10. 1 COR. 11: 10. ECCLES. 5: 6.)—Buck; Watson; Calmet; Jones; Works of R. Hall, vol. iii. But no writer on the subject of angels has equalled Dwight. (See his Theology, Ser. xviii. xix.)

ANGELS OF THE CHURCHES. This title is some disputed. Dr. Prideaux observes, that the minister of the synagogue, who officiated in offering the public prayers, being the mouth of the congregation, delegated by them, as their representative, messenger, or angel, to address God in prayer for them, was in Hebrew called sheliack-zibbor, that is, the angel of the church; and that from hence the chief ministers of the seven churches of Asia are in the Revelation, by a name borrowed from the synagogue, called angels of those churches.—Jones.

ANGEL OF THE LORD, or THE ANGEL JEHOVAH; a title, as is supposed, of Christ in his appearances to the patriarchs and others in the Old Testament. For example, when the angel of the Lord found Hagar in the wilderness, "she called the name of Jehovah that spake to her, THOU GOD SEEST ME." The angel of the Lord appeared to Moses in a flame of fire; but this same angel "called to him out of the bush, and said, I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; and Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God." To omit many other passages, St. Stephen, in alluding to the history of Moses, in his speech before the council, says, "There appeared to Moses in the wilderness of Mount Sinai, an angel of the Lord in a flame of fire," showing that the phraseology was in use among the Jews in his day, and that this angel and Jehovah were regarded as the same being; for he adds, "Moses was in the church in the wilderness with the angel which spoke unto him in mount Sinai." There is one part of the history of the Jews in the wilderness, which so fully shows that they distinguished this angel of Jehovah from all created angels, as to deserve particular attention. In Exod. 23: 20. God makes this promise to Moses and the Israelites: "Behold, I send an angel before thee to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared. Beware of him, and obey his voice; provoke him not; for he will not pardon your transgressions, for my name is in him." Of this angel let it be observed, that he is here represented as the guide and protector of the Israelites; to him they were to owe their conquests and their settlement in the promised land, which are in other places often attributed to the immediate agency of God; that they are cautioned to "beware of him," to reverence and stand in dread of him; that the pardoning of transgressions belongs to him; finally, "that the name of God was in him." This name must be understood of God's own peculiar name, JEHOVAH, I AM, which he assumed as his distinctive appellation at his first appearing to Moses; and as the names of God are indicative of his nature, he who had a right to bear the peculiar name of God, must also have his essence. This view is put beyond all doubt by the fact, that Moses and the Jews so understood the matter; for afterwards, when their sins had provoked God to threaten not to go up with them himself, but to commit them to "an angel who should drive out the Canaanite," &c., the people mourned over this as a great calamity, and Moses betook himself to special intercession, and rested not until he obtained the repeal of the threat, and the renewed promise, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." Nothing, therefore, can be more clear than that Moses and the Israelites considered the promise of the angel, in whom was "the name of God," as a promise that God himself would go with them. With this uncreated angel, this presence of the Lord, they were satisfied, but not with "an angel" indefinitely, who was by nature of that order of beings usually so called, and therefore a created being; for at the news of God's determination not to go up with them, Moses hastens to the tabernacle to make his intercessions, and refuses an inferior conductor:—"If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence."

The Jews held this Word, or Angel of the Lord, to be the future Messiah, as appears from the writings of their older Rabbins. So that he appears as the Jehovah of all the three dispensations, and yet is invariably described as a separate person from the unseen Jehovah, who sends him. He was then the Word to be made flesh, and to dwell for a time among us, to open the way to God by his sacrifice, and to rescue the race, whose nature he should assume, from sin and death. This he has now actually effected; and the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Christian religions are thus founded upon the same great principles,—the fall and misery of mankind, and their deliverance by a Divine Redeemer.—Watson.

ANGELICS; an ancient sect, supposed by some to have got this appellation from their excessive veneration of angels; and by others from maintaining that the world was created by angels.—Buck.

ANGELITIS; a sect in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, about the year 491; so called from Angelium, a place in the city of Alexandria, where they held their first meetings. They were called likewise Severites, from Severus, who was the head of their sect; as also Theodosians, from one Theodosius, whom they made pope at Alexandria. They held that the persons of the trinity are not the same; that none of them exists of himself, and of his own nature; but that there is a common God or Deity existing in them all, and that each is God by a participation of this Deity.—Buck.

ANGELO BUONARATTI, (MICHAEL;) one of the most distinguished names in the history of modern art, eminent alike in painting, sculpture, and architecture, and withal no mean poet, was born at Caprese or Chiusi, Italy, in 1474; and died in 1563, aged 89.

He was one of those favorites of nature, who combine in their single persons the excellencies of many highly gifted men. In his sixteenth year, his talents began to develop themselves to the admiration of all. The senate hall, and the Laurentian library at Florence; the Sistine and Pauline chapels, together with the new sacristy and St. Peter's church at Rome, contain everlasting monuments of his wonderful genius. His Last Judgment, in the Sistine chapel, is his master-piece in painting. It was unwillingly undertaken by him when sixty years old. But naturally inclined as he was to deep and earnest thought; preferring the sublime conceptions of Dante to all other poetry; having by a constant study of anatomy investigated the most secret mechanism of the muscles, and conscious of his own power; he endeavored in this work to strike out a new path, and to surpass his predecessors, particularly Luca Signoretti, by a display of terrible power. Perhaps, also, he had a higher and holier aim than critics have assigned him; an aim more worthy of a Christian. The picture is grand, nay gigantic, like the mind which created it. It represents Christ in the act of judging, or rather at the moment of condemning. Martyrs are seen, who show to the Judge of the living and dead the instruments of their torture; souls ascend to the choirs of angels hovering above; the condemned strive in vain to break loose from the grasp of the devils; there the evil spirits burst into shouts of triumph at the sight of their prey; the lost who are dragged down endeavor to cling to the good, who remain in Christ's kingdom; the gulf of eternal damnation is seen opening; Jesus Christ is seen surrounded by the apostles, who place a crown on his head, and by a multitude of saints, while angels above carry in triumph the symbols of his passion; and lower down another company of angels sound the trumpets intended to awaken the dead from their tombs, and call them to judgment. With these scenes of fear and despair, of judgment and heavenly beatitude, the wall of the chapel, which is of great height and breadth, is filled; and every thing is executed with the lofty spirit of a master.

Yet this prince of artists was a humble and affectionate Christian. Every virtue seemed united in his character. His soul was elevated above human glory. He was beloved and sought after by the great; but he shunned them. And the last words he uttered on earth were a charge to his attendants, "IN YOUR PASSAGE THROUGH THIS LIFE, REMEMBER THE SUFFERINGS OF JESUS!"—Clissold; Doenport; Ency. Amer.

ANGER; a painful passion of the mind, arising from the actual, or supposed reception of an injury, with a present purpose of punishment. All anger is by no means sinful; it was designed by the Author of our nature for self-defence: nor is it altogether a selfish passion, since it is excited by injuries offered to others as well as ourselves, and sometimes prompts us to reclaim offenders from sin and danger. Eph. 4: 26. But it becomes sinful when conceived upon trivial occasions or inadequate provocations; when it breaks forth into outrageous actions; vents itself in reviling language, or is concealed in our thoughts to the degree of hatred. To suppress this passion, the following reflections of archdeacon Paley, may not be unsuitable: "We should consider the possibility of mistaking the motives from which the conduct that offends us proceeded; how often our offences have been the effect of inadvertency, when they were construed into indications of malice; the inducement which prompted our adversary to act as he did, and how powerfully the same inducement has, at one time or other, operated upon ourselves; that he is suffering, perhaps under a contrition, which he is ashamed, or wants opportunity to confess; and how ungenerous it is to triumph, by coldness or insult, over a spirit already humbled in secret; that the returns of kindness are sweet, and that there is neither honor, nor virtue, nor use in resisting them; for some persons think themselves bound to cherish and keep alive their indignation, when they find it dying away of itself. We may remember that others have their passions, their prejudices, their favorite aims, their fears, their cautions, their interests, their sudden impulses, their varieties of apprehension, as well as we: we may recollect what hath passed in our own minds, when we have got on the wrong side of a quarrel, and imagine the same to be passing in our adversary's mind now: when we became sensible of our misbehavior, what palliations we perceived in it, and expected others to perceive; how we were affected by the kindness, and felt the superiority of a generous reception, and ready forgiveness; how persecution revived our spirits with our enmity, and seemed to justify the conduct in ourselves, which we before blamed. Add to this the indecency of extravagant anger; how it renders us, while it lasts, the scorn and sport of all about us, of which it leaves us, when it ceases, sensible and ashamed; the inconveniences and irretrievable misconduct into which our irascibility has sometimes betrayed us; the friendships it has lost us; the distresses and embarrassments in which we have been involved by it; and the repentance which, on one account or other, it always costs us. But the reflection calculated, above all others, to allay that haughtiness of temper which is ever finding out provocations, and which renders anger so impetuous, is that which the Gospel proposes; namely, that we ourselves are, or shortly shall be, supplicants for mercy and pardon at the judgment-seat of God. Imagine our secret sins all disclosed and brought to light; imagine us thus humbled and exposed; trembling under the hand of God; casting ourselves on his compassion; crying out for mercy; imagine such a creature to talk of satisfaction and revenge; refusing to be entreated, disdaining to forgive; extreme to mark and to resent what is done amiss; imagine, I say, this, and you can hardly feign to yourself an instance of more impious and unnatural arrogance."—Paley's Mor. Phil. ch. 7. vol. 1.; Falconet's excellent treatise on Anger; Seed's Posth. serm. 11.—Buck.

ANGER OF GOD. (See WRATH.)

ANGLO-CALVINISTS; a name given by some writers to the members of the Church of England agreeing with the other Calvinists in most points, excepting church government.—Buck.

ANIMAL; an organized and living body, endowed with sensation. Minerals are said to grow or increase, plants to grow and live, and animals alone to have sensation. The Hebrews distinguished animals into pure and impure, clean and unclean; or those which might be eaten and offered, and those whose use was prohibited. The sacrifices which they offered, were, 1. Of the beeve kind; a cow, bull, or calf. The ox could not be offered, because it was mutilated; and when it was said oxen were sacrificed, we are to understand bulls. Levit. 22: 18, 19. Calmet thinks, that the mutilation of animals was neither permitted, nor used, among the Israelites.—2. Of the goat kind; a he-goat, a she-goat, or kid. Levit. 22: 24.—3. Of the sheep kind; a ewe, ram, or lamb. When it is said sheep are offered, rams are chiefly meant, especially in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin; for as to peace-offerings, or sacrifices of pure devotion, a female might be sometimes offered, provided it was pure, and without blemish. Levit. 3: 1.

Besides these three sorts of animals used in sacrifices, many others might be eaten, wild or tame; as the stag, the roe-buck, and in general all that have cloven feet, or that chew the cud. Levit. 9: 2, 3, &c. All that have not cloven hoofs, and do not chew the cud, were esteemed impure, and could neither be offered nor eaten. The fat of all sorts of animals sacrificed was forbidden to be eaten. The blood of all kinds of animals generally, and in all cases, was prohibited on pain of death. Levit. 3: 17: 7:

23—27. Neither did the Israelites eat animals which had been taken and touched by a devouring or impure beast, as a dog, a wolf, a boar, &c. Exod. 22: 3.; nor of any animal that died of itself. Whoever touched its carcase was impure until the evening; and till that time, and before he had washed his clothes, he did not return to the company of other Jews. Levit. 9: 39, 40. 17: 15. 22: 8. Fish that had neither fins nor scales were unclean. Levit. 11: 10. Birds which walk on the ground with four feet, as bats, and flies that have many feet, were impure. The law, however, excepts locusts, which have their hind feet higher than those before, and rather leap than walk. These were clean, and might be eaten, Levit. 11: 21, 22, as they still are in Palestine.—The distinction between clean and unclean animals has been variously accounted for. Some have thought it symbolical, intended to teach the avoidance of those evil qualities for which the unclean animals were remarkable; others, that, in order that the Hebrews might be preserved from idolatry, they were commanded to kill and eat many animals which were sacred among the Egyptians, and were taught to look with abhorrence upon others which they revered. Others have found a reason in the unwholesomeness of the flesh of the creatures pronounced by the law to be unclean, so that they resolve the whole into a sanative regulation. But it is not to be forgotten that this division of animals into clean and unclean, existed both before the law of Moses, and even prior to the flood. The foundation of it was therefore clearly sacramental; for before the deluge it could not have reference to health, since animal food was not allowed to man prior to the deluge; and as no other ground for the distinction appears, except that of sacrifice, it must therefore have had reference to the selection of victims to be solemnly offered to God, as a part of worship, and as the means of drawing near to him by expiatory rites for the forgiveness of sins. Some, it is true, have regarded this distinction of clean and unclean beasts as used by Moses by way of prolepsis, or anticipation,—a notion which, if it could not be refuted by the context, would be perfectly arbitrary. Not only are the beasts, which Noah was to receive, spoken of as clean and unclean; but it will be noticed, that, in the command to take them into the ark, a difference is made in the number to be preserved,—the clean being to be received by sevens, and the unclean by two of a kind. This shows that this distinction among beasts had been established in the time of Noah; and thus the assumption of a prolepsis is refuted. The critical attempts which have been made to show that animals were allowed to man for food, previous to the flood, have wholly failed.

A second argument is furnished by the prohibition of blood for food, after animals had been granted to man for his sustenance along with the "herb of the field." This prohibition is repeated by Moses to the Israelites, with this explanation:—"I have given it upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls." From this it has indeed been argued, that the doctrine of the atoning power of blood was new, and was then, for the first time, announced by Moses, or the same reason for the prohibition would have been given to Noah. To this we may reply, 1. That unless the same be supposed as the ground of the prohibition of blood to Noah, as that given by Moses to the Jews, no reason at all can be conceived for this restraint being put upon the appetite of mankind from Noah to Moses.—2. That it is a mistake to suppose, that the declaration of Moses to the Jews, that God had "given them the blood for an atonement," is an additional reason for the interdict, not to be found in the original prohibition to Noah. The whole passage in Levit. 17. is, "And thou shalt say to them, Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood, I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and I will cut him off from among his people: FOR THE LIFE OF THE FLESH IS IN THE BLOOD; and I have given it upon the altar, to make atonement for your souls: For it is the blood (or LIFE) that maketh atonement for the soul." The great reason, then, of the prohibition of blood is, that it is the LIFE; and what follows respecting atonement is exegetical of this reason; the life is the blood, and the blood of life is given as an atonement. Now, by turning to the original prohibition in Genesis, we find that precisely the same reason is given: "But the flesh with the blood, which is the life thereof, shall ye not eat." The reason then, being the same, the question is, whether the exegesis added by Moses must not necessarily be understood in the general reason given for the restraint to Noah. Blood is prohibited for this cause, that it is the life; and Moses adds, that it is "the blood," or life, "which makes atonement." Let any one attempt to discover any cause for the prohibition of blood to Noah, in the mere circumstance that it is "the life," and he will find it impossible. It is no reason at all, moral or instituted, except that as it was life substituted for life, the life of the animal in sacrifice for the life of man, and that it had a sacred appropriation. The manner, too, in which Moses introduces the subject is indicative that, although he was renewing a prohibition, he was not publishing a "new doctrine;" he does not teach his people that God had then given, or appointed, blood to make atonement; but he prohibits them from eating it, because he had made this appointment without reference to time, and as a subject with which they were familiar. Because the blood was the life, it was sprinkled upon, and poured out at the altar: and we have in the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, and the sprinkling of its blood, a sufficient proof, that before the giving of the law, not only was blood not eaten, but was appropriated to a sacred sacrificial purpose. Nor was this confined to the Jews; it was customary with the Romans and Greeks, who, in like manner, poured out and sprinkled the blood of victims at their altars, a rite derived, probably, from the Egyptians, as they derived it, not from Moses, but from the sons of Noah. The notion, indeed, that the blood of the victims was peculiarly sacred to the gods, is impressed upon all ancient pagan mythology.

If, therefore, the distinction of animals into clean and unclean existed before the flood, and was founded upon the practice of animal sacrifice, we have not only a proof of the antiquity of that practice, but that it was of divine institution and appointment, since Almighty God gave laws for its right and acceptable performance. Still further, if animal sacrifice was of divine appointment, it must be concluded to be typical only, and designed to teach the great doctrine of moral atonement, and to direct faith to the only true Sacrifice which could take away the sins of men;—"the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,"—the victim "without spot," who suffered the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. (See SACRIFICES.)—Watson.

ANIMAL FEELING; a term used (of late) by theological writers to describe that sort of religious excitement which may be produced through sympathy and the imagination, or merely physical causes in some way associated with religion, while neither the reason, the conscience, or the heart, are brought into their proper action. The term is derived from the fact, that affections of this kind have their source and seat, not in the mind strictly speaking, but in the animal frame; and are liable to be mistaken for the genuine affections of piety, while in truth they may and do exist, often in the highest degree, where the subject of them exhibits incontestible evidence of being still unrenewed in the spirit of his mind.

Many, even of the truly pious, it is to be feared, judge of their spiritual state, under the mistaken supposition, that the force of the religious affections is to be mainly estimated by the physical thermometer—by the degree of mere animal fervor—by ardors, and transports, and raptures, of which, from constitutional temperament, a person may be easily susceptible; or into which, daily experience must convince us, that people of strong conceptions, and warm passions, may work themselves, without much difficulty, where their hearts are by no means truly or deeply interested. Every tolerable actor can attest the truth of this remark. These high degrees of the passions, bad men may experience; good men may want. They may be the natural operations of either a genuine or a fictitious piety; and therefore cannot be the true standard by which to determine either the nature or the strength of the religious affections.

To ascertain the true nature of our feelings, we must examine, 1. Whether they are grounded in evangelical knowledge. Animal feelings are ignorant, erroneous, or vague; but evangelical affections have their root in strong and just conceptions of the supreme excellence of their object; and lead us to count all things loss, in comparison with the knowledge of Christ, and an interest in his great salvation.—2. Whether they are permanent, or habitual. Animal feelings are but occasional visitants; evangelical affections are the abiding inmates of the soul.—3. Whether they are of holy tendency. Animal feelings often coincide with some vicious passion or propensity; but evangelical affections are irreconcilably opposed to every sin.—4. Whether they exert a conscientious control over the whole man. Animal feelings generally disturb the intellect, and often overpower and exhaust the frame by their violence; but evangelical affections, when most intense, regulate the appetites, and moderate all the inferior desires, which are culpable only in their excess; thus striving to reign serenely in the bosom, with a settled, undisputed predominance.—Above all, 5. Whether they are practical in their influence. Animal feelings end in the mere terror, or luxury, of the excitement; but evangelical affections prompt to the active discharge of the duties of life; the personal, domestic, and relative, the professional, and social, and civil duties.—Here the wideness of their range, and the universality of their influence, will generally serve to distinguish the evangelical feelings from those which are merely animal. From the daily incidents of conjugal and domestic life, we learn that a heat of affection, occasionally vehement, but superficial and transitory, may consist too well with a course of conduct, exhibiting incontestible proofs of neglect and unkindness. BUT IF A MAN LOVE ME, SAYS CHRIST, HE WILL KEEP MY SAYINGS. JOHN 14: 23. Without suffering ourselves, therefore, to derive too much complacency from transient fervors of devotion, we should carefully and frequently prove ourselves by this unequivocal test, given us by our Savior and Judge; impartially examining our daily conduct; and often comparing our actual with our possible services; the fair amount of our exertions, with our natural or acquired means, and multiplied opportunities of usefulness among men.—Wilberforce's View; Natural History of Enthusiasm; Macdlaurin's Essays; Spring's Essays; Edwards on the Affections.

ANISE; an annual umbelliferous plant, the seeds of which have an aromatic smell, a pleasant, warm taste, and a carminative quality. But by anithon, Matt. 23: 23. the dill is meant. Our translators seem to have been first misled by a resemblance of the sound. No other versions have fallen into the mistake. The Greek of anise is anison; but of dill, anithon.

ANNA; the daughter of Phanuel, a prophetess and widow, of the tribe of Asher. Luke 2: 36, 37. She was married early, and had lived only seven years with her husband. Being then disengaged from the ties of marriage, she thought only of pleasing the Lord; and continued without ceasing in the temple, serving God night and day, with fasting and prayer, as the evangelist expresses it. However, her serving God at the temple, night and day, says Dr. Prideaux, is to be understood no otherwise than that she constantly attended the morning and evening sacrifice at the temple; and then with great devotion offered up her prayers to God; the time of morning and evening sacrifice being the most solemn time of prayer among the Jews, and the temple the most solemn place for this devotion. Anna was fourscore years of age when the holy virgin came to present Jesus in the temple; and, entering accidentally, while Simeon was pronouncing his thanksgiving, she likewise began to praise God, and to speak of the Messiah to all those who waited for redemption in Jerusalem. We know nothing more either of the life or death of this holy woman.—Watson.

ANNAS, or ANANUS, as Josephus calls him, was the son of Seth, and high priest of the Jews. He succeeded Joazar, the son of Simeon, enjoyed the high priesthood eleven years, and was succeeded by Ishmael, the son of Phabi. After he was deposed, he still preserved the title of high priest, and had a great share in the management of public affairs. He is called high priest in conjunction with Caiaphas, when John the Baptist entered upon the exercise of his mission; though Calmet thinks that at that time he did not, strictly speaking, possess or officiate in that character. Luke 3: 2. On the contrary, Macknight and some others are of opinion, that at this time Caiaphas was only the deputy of Annas. He was father-in-law to Caiaphas; and Jesus Christ was carried before him, directly after his seizure in the garden of Olives. John 18: 13. Josephus remarks, that Annas was considered as one of the happiest men of his nation, for five of his sons were high priests, and he himself possessed that great dignity many years. This was an instance of good fortune, which, till that time, had happened to no person.—Watson.

ANNIHILATION; the act of reducing any created being into nothing. The sentiments of mankind have differed widely as to the possibility and impossibility of annihilation. According to some, nothing is so difficult: it requires the infinite power of God to effect it: according to others, nothing so easy. Existence, say they, is a state of violence; all things are continually endeavoring to return to their primitive nothing: it requires no power at all; it will do itself: nay, more, it requires an infinite power to prevent it. With respect to human beings, it appears probable from reason, but it is confirmed by Scripture, that they will not be annihilated, but exist in a future state. Matt. 10: 28. Eccl. 12: 7. John 5: 24. 1 Thess. 5: 10. Matt. 25: 34, 41. Luke 16: 22, 28. 20: 37, 38. 1 Cor. 15: (See p. 158, &c. vol. i. Massillon's Ser. Eng. Trans.; No. 129, Guardian; Blair's Ser. vol. i. p. 461; and articles DESTRUCTIONISTS, RESURRECTION, SOUL.)—Buck.

ANNUNCIATION; the tidings brought by the angel Gabriel to the virgin Mary, of the incarnation of Christ. It is also used to denote a festival kept by the church, on the 25th of March, in commemoration of these tidings.—Buck. (See MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION.)

ANOINTING, or UNCTION, was a ceremony in frequent use among the Hebrews. They anointed and perfumed, from principles of health and cleanness, as well as religion. They anointed the hair, head, and beard. Psalm 133: 2. At their feasts and rejoicings, they anointed the whole body; but sometimes only the head or the feet. John 12: 3. Luke 7: 37. Matt. 6: 17. The anointing of dead bodies was also practised, to preserve them from corruption. Mark 14: 8. 16: 1. Luke 23: 56. They anointed kings and high priests at their inauguration, (Exod. 29: 29. Lev. 4: 3. Judg. 9: 8. 1 Sam. 9: 16. 1 Kings 19: 15, 16.) as also the sacred vessels of the tabernacle and temple. Exod. 30: 25, &c.

Anointing, in general, was emblematical of a particular sanctification; a designation to the service of God, to a holy and sacred use. God prescribed to Moses the manner of making the oil, or the perfumed ointment, with which the priests and the vessels of the tabernacle were to be anointed. It was composed of the most exquisite perfumes and balsams, and was prohibited for all other uses. Ezekiel upbraids his people with having made a like perfume for their own use. Chap. 23: 41.

Under the law, persons and things set apart for sacred purposes, were anointed with the holy oil; which appears to have been a typical representation of the communication of the Holy Ghost to Christ and to his church. See Exod. 28: 29. Hence the Holy Spirit is called an unction or anointing, 1 John 2: 20, 27. and our Lord is called the "Messiah," or "Anointed One," to denote his being called to the offices of mediator, prophet, priest, and king, to all of which he was consecrated in our nature by the anointing of the Holy Ghost. Matt. 3: 16, 17.

When we hear of the anointing of the Jewish kings, we are to understand by it the same as their inauguration; inasmuch as anointing was the principal ceremony on such an occasion. 2 Sam. 2: 4. 5: 3. As far as we are informed, however, unction, as a sign of investiture with the royal authority, was bestowed only upon Saul and David, and subsequently upon Solomon and Joash, who ascended the throne under such circumstances, that there was danger of their right to the succession being forcibly disputed. 1 Sam. 10: 24. 2 Sam. 2: 4. 5: 1—3. 1 Chron. 11: 1, 2. 2 Kings 11: 12—20. 2 Chron. 23: 1—21. The ceremony of regal anointing needed not to be repeated in every instance of succession to the throne, because the unction which the first one who held the sceptre in any particular line of princes had received, was supposed to suffice for the succeeding incumbents in the same descent.

In the kingdom of Israel, those who were inducted into the royal office, appear to have been inaugurated with some additional ceremonies. 2 Kings 9: 13. The private anointings which we learn to have been performed by the prophets, (2 Kings 9: 3. comp. 1 Sam. 10: 1. 16: 1—13.) were only prophetic symbols, or intimations that the persons who were thus anointed, should eventually receive the kingdom.

The holy anointing oil, which was made by Moses, (Exod. 30: 22—33.) for the maintaining and consecrating of the king, the high priest, and all the sacred vessels made use of in the house of God, was one of those things, as Dr. Prideaux observes, which was wanting in the second temple. The oil, made and consecrated for this use, was commanded to be kept by the children of Israel, throughout their generations, and therefore it was laid up in the most holy place of the tabernacle, and the first temple.—Calmet; Watson.

ANOMOEANS; the name by which the pure Arians were called in the fourth century, in contradistinction to the Semi-Arians. The word is formed from the Greek anomios, different. (See ARIANS and SEMI-ARIANS.)—Buck.

ANOTHER GOSPEL; a phrase used on several occasions by St. Paul, to express, in the strongest manner, the ruinous character of those legal perversions, which the Judaizing teachers introduced. Gal. 1: 7. 2 Cor. 11: 14. He assures them that a scheme which tended to transfer their reliance for salvation, from Christ to themselves, or any other object, however much, in other inferior points, it might resemble the Gospel of Christ, and shelter itself under his name and authority, was, in reality, not the same as the Gospel of Christ; and that, instead of saving, it would, in fact, subvert their souls. Acts 15: 24. Hence, he gave place to them by subjection, no, not for an hour. Gal. 2: 5. Hence, even Peter, by his apparent compromise, drew upon himself public and solemn reproof. Gal. 2: 11. And hence, the reiterated, fearful warning and malediction of the apostle, against such as introduce into Christianity an element which corrupts it. Gal. 1: 6—9. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.

ANSARIANS, or ENSARIANS; the inhabitants of a chain of mountains in Syria, whose religion is a compound of paganism and Mahometanism, which they were taught by an old man, who inhabited the village of Nasar, near Koufa; who, by his austerities, passed for a saint and a prophet, for which his only qualifications were a life of outward austerity, and a high degree of enthusiasm—if he were not rather an impostor. He made many disciples, and their descendants partly worship the sun, or other material objects; and partly following no rule but their own wild imaginations and depraved passions. (See ASSASSINS.)—Enc. Perth; Williams.

ANSWER; beside the common usage of this word, in the sense of a reply, it has other significations. Moses, having composed a thanksgiving, after the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam, it is said, answered, "Sing ye to the Lord," &c.—meaning, that Moses, with the men on one side, and Miriam, with the women, on the other side, sung the same song, as it were, in two choruses, or divisions; of which one answered the other. Num. 21: 17. "Then Israel sang this song, Spring up, O well, answer unto it;" that is, sing responsively, one side (or choir) singing first, and then the other. 1 Sam. 29: 5. "Is not this David, of whom they sung one to another in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands?" They sung this song to his honor in distinct choruses.

This word is taken likewise for, to accuse or to defend any one, judicially. Gen. 30: 33. "My righteousness shall answer for me;" it shall be my advocate before thee. Deut. 31: 21. "The song which thou shalt compose and teach them, shall testify (answer) against them as a witness." Isaiah says, "The show of their countenance will testify (answer) against them;" their impudence will be like a witness and an accuser. Hosea 5: 5. "The pride of Israel doth testify (answer) to his face."

To answer, is likewise taken in a bad sense; as when it is said that a son answers his father insolently, or a servant his master. Rom. 9: 20. "Who art thou that repliest against God?" that is, to contest or debate with him. John 18: 22. "Answerest thou the high priest so?" St. Paul declares that he "had in himself the answer (or sentence) of death;" 2 Cor. 1: 9. like a man who has had notice of condemnation, he had a certain assurance of dying.

To answer, is also used in Scripture for the commencement of a discourse, when no reply to any question or objection is intended. This mode of speaking is often used by the evangelists, "And Jesus answered and said." It is a Hebrew idiom.—Watson.

ANSWER OF A GOOD CONSCIENCE; a phrase which occurs in 1 Pet. 3: 21. The meaning of it, as well as of the whole verse in which it is found, has been long and often drawn into dispute, in the course of the baptismal controversy, for the last three hundred years. The following is an accurate translation of the verse: "A form corresponding to which [antitypos, to the ark of Noah, in which few, that is, eight souls, were perfectly saved, through the water which surrounded them,] doth now also save us, baptism, (not the putting off of the defilement of the flesh, but the consulting of God's will by a good conscience,) through the resurrection of Jesus Christ." It is submitted, with diffidence, whether the sense be not this: "Baptism, though in itself a visible outward form, like Noah's ark, not able by any intrinsic efficacy, to purify us from our sins; yet, as an act of conscientious and obedient faith like his, taking refuge in the appointed means of salvation, (Rom. 4: 23, 25.) is equally effectual to our deliverance from that wrath, which is to come upon the world of the ungodly." Heb. 15: 7. 2 Pet. 2: 5. Rom. 5: 9, 10. 10: 8—13. Acts 22: 16.

ANT, gemeh; in the Turkish and Arabic, neml, Prov. 6: 6. 30: 25. It is a little insect, famous from all antiquity for its social habits, its economy, unwearied industry, and prudent foresight. It has afforded a pattern of commendable frugality to the profuse, and of unceasing diligence to the slothful. Solomon calls the ants "exceeding wise; for though a race not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer." He therefore sends the sluggard to these little creatures, to learn wisdom, foresight, care, and diligence.

"Go to the ant; learn of its ways, be wise:
It early heaps its stores, lest want surprise.
Skilled in the various year, the prescient sage Beholds the summer chilled in winter's rage.
Survey its arts; in each partitioned cell
Economy and plenty deign to dwell."

That the ant hoarded up grains of corn against winter for its sustenance, was very generally believed by the ancients, though modern naturalists seem to question the fact. Thus Horace says,

—"Sicut
Pareula (nam exemplo est) magni formica laboris
Ore trahit quodcumque potest, atque addit acerco
Quem struit, haud ignara ac non incauta futuri;
Quæ simul inversum contristat aquarius annum,
Non usquam prorepti, et illis utitur ants
Quæsitis sapiens."

Sat. l. i. v. 33.

"For thus the little ant (to human lore
No mean example) forms her frugal store,
Gathered with mighty toil on every side,
Nor ignorant nor careless to provide
For future want; yet, when the stars appear
That darkly sadden the declining year,
No more she comes abroad, but wisely lives
On the fair stores industrious summer gives."

The learned Bochart, in his Hieroicozon, has displayed his vast reading on this subject, and has cited passages from Pliny, Lucian, Ælian, Zoroaster, Origen, Basil, and Epiphanius, the Jewish rabbins and Arabian naturalists, all concurring in opinion that ants cut off the heads of grain, to prevent their germinating; and it is observable that the Hebrew name of the insect is derived from the verb gemel, which signifies to cut off, and is used for cutting off ears of corn. Job 24: 24.

The following remarks are from "the Introduction to Entomology," by Kirby and Spence:—

"Till the manners of exotic ants are more accurately explored, it would be rash to affirm that no ants have magazines of provisions; for, although, during the cold of our winters in this country, they remain in a state of torpidity, and have no need of food, yet in warmer regions, during the rainy seasons, when they are probably confined to their nests, a store of provisions may be necessary for them. Even in northern climates, against wet seasons, they may provide in this way for their sustenance and that of the young brood, which, as Mr. Smeatham observes, are very voracious, and cannot bear to be long deprived of their food; else why do ants carry worms, living insects, and many other such things, into their nests? Solomou's lesson to the sluggard has been generally adduced as a strong confirmation of the ancient opinion: it can, however, only relate to the species of a warm climate, the habits of which are probably different from those of a cold one; so that his words, as commonly interpreted, may be perfectly correct and consistent with nature, and yet be not at all applicable to the species that are indigenous to Europe."

The ant, according to the royal preacher, is one of those things which are little upon the earth, but exceeding wise. The superior wisdom of the ant has been recognised by many writers. Horace, in the passage from which the preceding quotation is taken, praises its sagacity; Virgil celebrates its foresight, in providing for the wants and infirmities of old age, while it is young and vigorous:—

—atque inopi metuens formica senectæ.

And we learn from the Hesiod, that among the earliest Greeks it was called Idris, that is, wise, because it foresaw the coming storm, and the inauspicious day, and collected her store. Cicero believed that the ant is not only furnished with senses, but also with mind, reason, and memory:—In formica non modo sensus sed etiam mens, ratio, memoria. The union of so many noble qualities in so small a corpuscule, is indeed one of the most remarkable phenomena in the works of nature.—Watson.

ANTEDILUVIANS; a general name for all mankind who lived before the flood, including the whole human race, from the creation to the deluge. For the history of the antediluvians, see Book of Genesis; Whiston's Josephus; Cockburn's Treatise on the Deluge; and article DELUGE.—Buck.

ANTELOPE. This animal is not mentioned in our translation of the Bible: but it is generally agreed, that the zebi, which our translators take for the roe, is the gazelle, or antelope. The former animal is extremely rare in Palestine, and the adjoining countries; while the latter is common in every part of the Levant. Add to this, that the zebi was allowed to the Hebrews, as an article of food, (Dent. 12: 5, &c.) and scarcely a doubt can remain on the subject.

The name of this animal, which is from a verb signifying to assemble, or collect together, is very characteristic of the gregarious character of the antelope, which live together in large troops, to the number sometimes of two or three thousand. The Septuagint, or Greek version of the Bible, uniformly translates the Hebrew word beauty; and it is so translated, 2 Sam. 1: 19. Isaiah 4: 2. Ezek. 7: 20, &c.

The gazelle forms a connecting species between the goat and the deer kinds; somewhat resembling the former internally, and the latter externally, except its horns, which are annulated, or ringed round, with longitudinal depressions running from the bottom to the point. Of all animals in the world, the gazelle is said to have the most beautiful eye.

From Dr. Russell we learn, that the inhabitants of Syria distinguish between the antelope of the mountain, and that of the plain. The former is the most beautifully formed, and it bounds with surprising agility; the latter is of a much lighter color, and is neither so strong nor so active. Both, however, are so fleet, that the greyhounds, though reckoned excellent, cannot come up with them, without the aid of the falcon, except in soft, deep ground. It is to the former species of this animal, apparently, that the sacred writers allude, since they distinctly notice their fleetness; upon the mountains. 1 Chron. 12: 8. Cant. 2: 8, 9, 17. 8: 14.

The usual method of taking the antelope is by hunting it with the falcon, or the ounce; but it is sometimes taken by the following expedient. A tame antelope, bred up for the purpose, is taught to join those of its kind wherever it perceives them. When the hunter, therefore, discovers a herd of these together, he fixes a noose round the horns of the tame animal, in such a manner, that if the rest but touch it, they are entangled; and thus prepared, he sends his antelope among the rest. The tame animal no sooner approaches, but the males of the herd instantly sally forth to oppose him; and in butting with their horns, are caught in the noose. Finding itself taken in the snare, terror lends it additional strength and activity, and it makes the most vigorous exertions to disentangle itself, and escape before the hunter can come up with it. Its effort under these circumstances is proposed for imitation to the person who had rashly become surety for his neighbor: "Deliver thyself as an antelope from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler." Prov. 6: 5. That is, "Thou hast imprudently placed thyself in perilous circumstances, suffer no delay in making an effort for thy release."

There seems to be something so highly figurative in the exclamation of the bride, (Cant. 1: 7.) "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest," &c. that it has never occurred to critics, that the speaker, assuming the metaphorical character of a gazelle, or antelope, inquires for the resting place of the flock, wherein she, also, might rest. They have usually supposed that she makes this inquiry in the character of a shepherdess, meaning to accompany her shepherd, and to associate with him at the noontide of day, when he would be reposing.—Abbott's Script. Nat. History.

ANTEROS; a Grecian, bishop of Rome, who suffered martyrdom in the third century, for collecting the acts of the martyrs, after holding his office only forty days. His death happened, A. D. 235.

ANTHEM; a church song, performed in cathedral service, by chorists who sung alternately. It was used to denote both psalms and hymns, when performed in this manner; but, at present, anthem is used in a more confined sense, being applied to certain passages, usually taken out of the Scriptures, and adapted to a particular solemnity. Anthems were first introduced in the reformed service of the English church, in the beginning of the reign of queen Elizabeth.—Buck.

ANTHONY, (SUSANNA;) an eminently pious female, of Newport, Rhode Island, was born in 1726, and died June 23, 1791, aged sixty-four years. Her parents were Quakers. Dr. Hopkins published the memoirs of her life, consisting chiefly of extracts from her writings, of which there was a second edition in 1810. She devoted herself chiefly to prayer.—Allen.

ANTHROPOMORPHITES; a sect of ancient heretics, who were so denominated from two Greek words, anthropos, man, and morphe, shape. They understood every thing spoken in Scripture in a literal sense, and particularly that passage in Genesis, in which it is said, "God made man after his own image." Hence they maintained, that God had a human shape.—Watson.

ANTHROPOPATHY; a metaphor, by which things belonging to creatures, and especially to man, are ascribed to God. Instances of this abound in the Scriptures, by which they adapt themselves to human modes of speaking, and to the limited capacities of men. These anthropopathies we must however interpret in a manner suitable to the majesty of the divine nature. Thus, when the members of a human body are ascribed to God, we must understand by them those perfections of which such members in us are the instruments. The eye, for instance, represents God's knowledge and watchful care; the arm, his power and strength; the ears, the regard he pays to prayer, and to the cry of oppression and misery, &c. Farther, when human affections are attributed to God, we must so interpret them, as to imply no imperfection, such as perturbed feeling in him. When God is said to repent, the antecedent, by a frequent figure of speech, is put for the consequent; and, in this case, we are to understand an altered mode of proceeding on the part of God, which in man is the effect of repenting.—Watson.

ANTI-BAPTISTS. It is well known that the society of Friends have, from the beginning, rejected water baptism, as long since superseded by the baptism of the Holy Spirit—the "one baptism" of Christ, which they alone admit. That Christian baptism is not an external rite, they argue from 1 Pet. 3: 21. and other passages, which speak of baptism as a moral and spiritual rite. These, however, are not the persons here chiefly intended by Anti-baptists. An ingenious writer, under the signature of Agnostos, has lately argued much at length, and with considerable force, that baptism is a proselyting ordinance, and to be applied only to converts from other religions to Christianity, and is not, therefore, applicable to their descendants, whether infant or adult. This he infers from the words of the commission—"Teach (or disciple) all nations, baptizing them;"—from the practice of the apostles and first Christians, who (so far as appears) baptized none but converts from Judaism or heathenism, and their families;—from baptizing not forming any part of the pastoral office, but being peculiar to apostles or evangelists; and from the facilities which his hypothesis affords to Christian union, as removing the great barrier between Pedobaptists and Anti-pedobaptists. From another writer, under the signature of Vindex, we learn that there are in Ireland several societies of Anti-baptists, which seem not unlikely to form a considerable denomination.

This view of baptism, however, admits of, and even requires, its perpetuity, so long as there are Jews, pagans, or infidels, to be baptized; but transfers the work rather to missionaries than settled ministers. At the same time, the admission of penitent Atheists, or even Deists, into the Christian church, appears to make them as properly the subjects of the ordinance as Jews or pagans; and leaves open the question as to the mode of administration, and the qualification of infants to receive it.—Barclay's Apol. prop. 12; Emlyn on Baptism; Thoughts on Baptism, by Agnostos, (1819); Vindex's Letter to a member of the Church meeting in Stafford-street, Dublin; Williams.

ANTI-BURGHERS; a numerous and respectable body of dissenters from the church of Scotland, who differ from the established church chiefly in matters of church government; and who differ, also, from the Burgher seceders, with whom they were originally united, chiefly, if not solely, respecting the lawfulness of taking the Burgess oath. (For an account of their origin and principles, see SECEDERS.)—Buck.

ANTICHRIST. This is a very important subject. The word is derived from the Greek Antichristos, and, according to bishop Hurd, signifies "a person of power, actuated with a spirit opposite to that of Christ." For, to adopt the illustration of the same learned writer, "as the word CHRIST is frequently used in the apostolic writings, for the doctrine of Christ, in which sense we are said to 'put on Christ,' to 'grow in Christ,' or to 'learn Christ;' so ANTICHRIST, in the abstract, may be taken for a doctrine subversive of the Christian; and when applied to a particular man, or body of men, it denotes one who sets himself against the spirit of that doctrine." Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies, Sermon vii. In this general sense, every person who is hostile to the authority of Christ, as Lord or Head of the church, and to the spirit of his religion, may be called Antichrist; and the term occurs as thus used by the apostle John, when, referring to certain false teachers, who corrupted the truth from its simplicity, he says, "even now are there many antichrists." 1 John 2: 18. and ch. 4: 3. But the name is generally employed to denigrate a great power, that was to arise at a period subsequent to the days of the apostles, and which, in an extraordinary degree, was to corrupt the doctrine, blaspheme the name, and persecute the followers of Christ. 2 Thess. 2: 3—10. 1 Tim. 4: 1—4. and 2 Tim. 3: 1—5.

No one subject has probably given rise to a greater diversity of opinion, than the question, "Who is Antichrist?" And the reader, whose curiosity may prompt him to examine it, may be gratified by turning to the article "Antichrist," in the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, where he will find no fewer than FOURTEEN different theories adduced in answer to that question; nor would it be any difficult task to extend the list to at least an equal number! This remark, however, must not be understood as intended to insinuate that the question, "who or what is Antichrist?" is incapable of a satisfactory solution; for that would be to impeach divine revelation, which has pronounced "a blessing on him that readeth, and on those that hear the words of the prophecy," concerning Antichrist, "and that keep the things that are written therein." Rev. 1: 3. Besides, the great variety of the opinions that have been broached on this point, is easily accounted for, by considering that those who have propagated them, have, with scarcely an exception to the contrary, all been the advocates of national establishments of religion; and thus, setting out from an erroneous principle, common to each, they have wandered in endless perplexity, contradicting and confuting one another! Truth is one, and always consistent with itself, but the mazes of error are infinite.

It must be obvious to any attentive reader of the apostolic writings, that Antichrist is therein described under the terms, "the man of sin," "that wicked one," "the son of perdition." 2 Thess. 2: 3, 4, 8. These phrases, in which the antichristian apostasy is personified, are borrowed from the language in which the apostles describe the true church of God as "one new man," and "a perfect man," made up of Jews and Gentiles; sometimes also called "the body of Christ," of which every real believer is a member, a body which is always represented as holy, being sanctified by his blood, and dedicated to his service. Eph. 2: 15. Ch. 1: 22, 23. Ch. 4: 13. 1 Pet. 2. Again, as the true church is spoken of in Scripture, under the appellation of "the bride," "the Lamb's wife," and is said to be "presented to him a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing," so is this antichristian power represented by "a woman," and distinguished from the true church by her lewdness and impurity; as "a great whore," and "the mother of harlots," having daughters who imitate her wicked example. Rev. 17: 1, 4, 6. and ch. 18: 7, 9. Sometimes Antichrist is spoken of as "the mystery of iniquity," and in that view it is the proper contrast of "the mystery of godliness," or the mystery of the faith held in a pure conscience, even as the mystery of iniquity is the mystery of departing from the faith under a profession of it. Further, as ancient Babylon was the enemy of God's people Israel, so she was a type of the false or apostate church, which is particularly held up to us under that figure in the book of Revelation, ch. 17. and 18. Lastly, the true church of God is his kingdom, of which the Son of David is Lord, and who "sits upon his throne, and in his kingdom, having the government of it upon his shoulders, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth, even forever." Is. 9: 7, 8. So Antichrist is described as "the son of perdition, who opposeth [himself to Christ], and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God." 2 Thess. 2: 4. These few hints may serve to show the general contrast which the inspired writers have drawn between Christ and Antichrist, or between the true and the false church; the bride, the Lamb's wife, and the great whore, the mother of harlots; but the subject may receive a more ample illustration, by considering the genius or spirit of the doctrine of Christ, with the nature of his kingdom; and glancing at some of the leading corruptions of both, which have appeared under the Christian name. For, as bishop Hurd has justly remarked, in the words quoted from him at the outset of this article, it must ever be kept in view, that Antichrist denotes a person, power, or body of men, which sets itself against the spirit of the doctrine of Christ.

The papists imagine they view, in the prophetic picture of Antichrist, imperial Rome, elated by her victories, exulting in her sensuality and her spoils, polluted by idolatry, persecuting the people of God, and finally falling like the first Babylon; whilst a new and holy city, represented by their own communion, filled with the spotless votaries of the Christian faith rises out of its ruins, and the victory of the cross is completed over the temples of paganism. This scheme has had its able advocates, at the head of whom may be placed Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, Grotius, and Hammond. But in order to establish the resemblance, they violate the order of time, disregard the opinions of the primitive Christians, and overlook the appropriate descriptions of the apostles. After the point had been maturely debated at the council of Gap, held in 1603, a resolution was taken thereupon to insert an article in the confession of faith, whereby the pope is formally declared to be Antichrist. Pope Clement VIII. was stung with this decision; and even king Henry IV. of France, was not a little mortified, to be thus declared, as he said, an imp of Antichrist.

With respect to the commonly received opinion, that the church of Rome is Antichrist, Mede and Newton, Daubuz and Clarke, Lowman and Hurd, Jurieu, Vitrings, and many other members of the Protestant churches, who have written upon the subject, concur in maintaining, that the prophecies of Daniel, St. Paul, and St. John, point directly to this church. This was likewise the opinion of the first reformers; and it was the prevalent opinion of Christians, in the earliest ages, that Antichrist would appear soon after the fall of the Roman empire. Gregory the great, in the sixth century, applied the prophecies concerning the beast, in the Revelation, the man of sin, and the apostasy from the faith, mentioned by St. Paul, to him who should presume to claim the title of universal priest, or universal bishop, in the Christian church; and yet his immediate successor, Boniface III. received from the tyrant Phocas, the precise title which Gregory had thus censured. At the synod of Rheims, held in the tenth century, Arnulphus, bishop of Orleans, appealed to the whole council, whether the bishop of Rome was not the Antichrist of St. Paul, "sitting in the temple of God," and perfectly corresponding with the description of him given by St. Paul. In the eleventh century, all the characters of Antichrist seemed to be so united in the person of pope Hildebrand, who took the name of Gregory VII. that Johannes Aventinus, a Romish historian, speaks of it as a subject in which the generality of fair, candid, and ingenious writers agreed, that at that time was the reign of Antichrist. And the Albigenes and Waldenses, who may be called the Protestants of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, expressly asserted, in their declarations of faith, that the church of Rome was the whore of Babylon.

Among the writings of the ancient Waldenses, those noble witnesses of the truth, during the dark ages, one of an extremely interesting character, is a Treatise concerning Antichrist, Purgatory, Invocation of Saints, and the Sacraments, bearing date A. D. 1120, and attributed, not without probability, to the pen of the celebrated Peter de Bruys. It thus describes Antichrist:

"Antichrist is not any particular person, ordained to any degree, or office, or ministry; but it is a system of falsehood, adorning itself with a show of beauty and piety, yet (as by the names and offices of the Scriptures, and the sacraments, and various other things, may appear) very unsuitable to the church of Christ. The system of iniquity thus completed, with its ministers, great and small, supported by those who are induced to follow it with an evil heart, and blindfold—this is the congregation, which, taken together, comprises what is called Antichrist, or Babylon, the fourth beast, the whore, the man of sin, the son of perdition. His ministers are called false prophets, lying teachers, the ministers of darkness, the spirit of error, the apocalyptic whore, the mother of harlots, clouds without water, trees without leaves, twice dead, plucked up by the roots, wandering stars, Balaamites, and Egyptians.

“He is termed Antichrist, because, being disguised under the names of Christ and his church and faithful members, he opposes the salvation which Christ wrought out, and which is truly administered in his church—and of which salvation believers participate by faith, hope, and charity. Thus he opposes the truth by the wisdom of this world, by false religion, by counterfeit holiness, by ecclesiastical power, by secular tyranny, and by the riches, honors, dignities, with the treasures and delicacies of this world. It should therefore be carefully observed, that Antichrist could not come, without a concurrence of all these things, making up a system of hypocrisy and falsehood. These must be, the wise of this world, the religious orders, the pharisees, ministers, and doctors; the secular power, with the people of the world, all mingled together. For although Antichrist was conceived in the times of the apostles, he was then in his infancy, imperfect and unformed, rude, unshapen, and wanting utterance. He then wanted those hypocritical ministers, and human ordinances, and the outward show of religious orders, which he afterwards obtained. As he was destitute of riches and other endowments, necessary to allure to himself ministers for his service, and to enable him to multiply, defend, and protect his adherents, so he also wanted the secular power to force others to forsake the truth, and embrace falsehood. But growing up in his members, that is, in his blind and dissembling ministers, and in worldly subjects, he at length arrived at full maturity, when men, whose hearts were set upon the world, blind in the faith, multiplied in the church, and by the union of church and state, got the power of both into their hands.

“Christ never had an enemy like this; so able to pervert the way of truth into falsehood, insomuch that the true church, with her children, is trodden under foot. The worship that belongs alone to God, he transfers to Antichrist himself—to the creature, male and female, deceased—to images, carcases, and relics. The sacrament of the eucharist is converted into an object of adoration, and the worshipping of God alone is prohibited. He robs the Savior of his merits, and the sufficiency of his grace in justification, regeneration, remission of sins, sanctification, establishment in the faith, and spiritual nourishment; ascribing all these things to his own authority, to a form of words, to his own works, to the intercession of saints, and to the fire of purgatory. He seduces the people from Christ, drawing off their minds from seeking those blessings in him, by a lively faith in God, in Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Spirit, and teaching his followers to expect them by the will and pleasure and works of Antichrist.

“He teaches to baptize children into the faith, and attributes to this the work of regeneration; thus confounding the work of the Holy Spirit in regeneration, with the external rite of baptism, and on this foundation bestows orders, and, indeed, grounds all his Christianity. He places all religion and holiness in going to mass, and has mingled together all descriptions of ceremonies, Jewish, heathen, and Christian—and by means thereof, the people are deprived of spiritual food, seduced from the true religion, and the commandments of God, and established in vain and presumptuous hopes. All his works are done to be seen of men, that he may glut himself with insatiable avarice; and hence every thing is set to sale. He allows of open sins, without ecclesiastical censure, and even the impenitent are not excommunicated. He does not govern, nor does he maintain his unity by the Holy Spirit, but by means of the secular power, making use of the same to effect spiritual matters. He hates, and persecutes, and searches after, and plunders, and destroys, the members of Christ. These are some of the principal of the works of Antichrist against the truth, but the whole are past numbering or recording.

“On the other hand, he makes use of an outward confession of faith; and therein is verified the saying of the apostle—‘They profess in words that they know God, but in works they deny him.’ He covers his iniquity, by pleading the length of his duration, or succession of time, and the multitudes of his followers—concerning whom it is said in the Revelation, that ‘power is given him over every tribe, language, and nation, and all that dwell on the earth shall worship him.’ He covers his iniquity; by pleading the spiritual authority of the apostles, though the apostle expressly says, ‘We can do nothing against the truth’—and ‘there is no power given us for destruction.’ He boasts of numerous miracles, even as the apostle foretold—‘Whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all miracles and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness.’ He has an outward show of holiness, consisting in prayers, fastings, watchings, and alms-deeds, of which the apostle testified, when he said, ‘Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof.’

“Thus it is that Antichrist covers his lying wickedness, as with a cloak, or garment, that he may not be rejected, as a pagan or infidel, and under which disguise he can go on, practising his villainies boldly, and like a harlot. But it is plain, both from the Old and New Testaments, that a Christian stands bound, by express command, to separate himself from Antichrist. Isa. 53: 11, 12. Jer. 1: 8. Num. 16: 21. Lev. 20: 24—27. Ex. 34: 12—15. Lev. 15: 31. Ezek. 2. Deut. 20. Now it is manifest from the New Testament, (John 12.) that the Lord is come, and hath suffered death, that he might gather together in one the children of God; and it is on account of this unity in the truth, and their separation from others, that it is said in Matt. 10. ‘I am come to separate a man from his father, and to set the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law, and those of a man’s own household shall be his enemies.’ Christ hath enjoined this separation upon his disciples, when he said, ‘Whosoever doth not forsake father and mother, &c. cannot be my disciple.’ And again, ‘Beware of false prophets, which come unto you in sheep’s clothing.’ Again, ‘Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees—and take heed lest any man seduce you, for many shall come in my name, and seduce many.’ And in the book of the Revelation, he warns by his own voice, and charges his people to go out of Babylon, saying, ‘Come out of her, my people, and be not partakers of her sins, that ye receive not of her plagues; for her sins are come up unto heaven, and the Lord remembereth her iniquity.’ The apostle says the same: ‘Have no fellowship with unbelievers, for what communion hath righteousness with iniquity, or what agreement hath light with darkness, or what concord hath Christ with the devil, or what part hath a believer with an infidel, or the temple of God with idols? Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch no unclean thing, and I will receive you, and be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.’

“From what has been said, we may learn wherein consist the perverseness and wickedness of Antichrist, and that God commands his people to separate from him, and to join themselves to the holy city Jerusalem. And since it hath pleased God to make known these things to us by his servants, believing it to be his revealed will, according to the Holy Scriptures, and admonished thereto by the command of the Lord, we do, both inwardly and outwardly, depart from Antichrist. We hold communion and maintain unity, one with another, freely and uprightly, having no other object to propose herein, but purely and singly to please the Lord, and seek the salvation of our own souls. Thus, as the Lord is pleased to enable us, and so far as our understandings are instructed into the path of duty, we attach ourselves to the truth of Christ, and to his church, how mean soever she may appear in the eyes of men. We, therefore, have thought it good to make this declaration of our reasons for departing from Antichrist, as well as to make known what kind of fellowship we have, to the end that, if the Lord be pleased to impart the knowledge of the same truth to others, those that receive it may love it together with us. It is our desire, also, that if, peradventure, others are not sufficiently enlightened, they may receive assistance from this service, the Lord succeeding it by his blessing. On the other hand, if any have received more abundantly from him, and in a higher measure, we desire with all humility to be taught, and instructed better, that so we may rectify whatever is amiss."

The treatise then proceeds to sketch, and succinctly to confute, the numerous abominations of popery, and to show how they all tend to subvert the faith of Christ, and to destroy the souls of men; but my limits will only allow of a very abridged view of those masterly statements. "Be it known," say they, "to all in general, and to every one in particular, that these are the reasons of our separation, viz. It is for the truth's sake which we believe—for the knowledge which we have of the only true God, and the unity of the divine essence in three persons, a knowledge which flesh and blood cannot communicate—it is for the worship due to that only true God—for the love we owe him above all things—for the sanctification and honor which are due to him supremely, and above every name—for the lively hopes which we have of God through Christ—for regeneration and renewing of our minds by faith, hope, and charity—for the worthiness of Jesus Christ, with the all-sufficiency of his grace and righteousness—for the communion of saints—the remission of sins—a holy conversation—for the sake of a faithful adherence to all the commands in the faith of Christ—for true repentance—for final perseverance, and everlasting life."

In the book of Daniel, it is foretold that the anti-christian power should exercise dominion until a time and times, and the dividings of time. Dan. 7: 25. This expression is generally admitted to denote twelve hundred and sixty years. If the rise of Antichrist be not reckoned till he was possessed of secular authority, his fall will happen when this power shall be taken away. If his rise began according to Mede in 456, he must have fallen in 1716, if in 606, it must be in 1866; if in 755, in 2015. If however we use prophetic years, consisting of 360 days, and date the rise of Antichrist in the year 755, his fall will happen A. D. 2000. But 755 is too late a period, from which to begin the reckoning. Mr. Keith has made it appear certain, that the supremacy of the pope was complete as early as the year 533, the year that the INSTITUTES of Justinian were published. And it is a remarkable fact, that the dominion of the papacy, in that very kingdom which had been its chief stay for ages, was destroyed and disannulled by an act of the French assembly in the year 1793, just twelve hundred and sixty years from its establishment. Every thing now in the state of the world betokens a speedy overthrow of the Mahometan and Papal powers, both of which have been already greatly weakened.

An important question however, says Mr. Jones, still remains for inquiry, "Is Antichrist confined to the church of Rome?" The answer is readily returned in the affirmative by Protestants in general; and happy had it been for the world were that the case. But although we are fully warranted to consider that church as "the mother of harlots," the truth is, that, by whatever arguments we succeed in fixing that odious charge upon her, we shall, by parity of reasoning, be obliged to allow all other national churches to be her unchaste daughters; and for this plain reason among others, because, in their very constitution and tendency, they are hostile to the nature of the kingdom of Christ.

All national establishments of Christianity must, in their very nature, be antichristian; because they are opposed to the spirit of the doctrines of Christ, and to the nature of his kingdom, which he himself has declared to be not of this world. To illustrate a little this point, we may select for an example "the Church of England," as it is generally called, and compare its constitution with that of the church or kingdom of Christ.

In the latter, Christ himself is king, and he alone is acknowledged as sovereign of the consciences of his subjects. But the sovereign of the nation is the avowed head of the Church of England, not in name only, but in power. It is established by human laws, and is wholly a creature of the state, and regulated by a code of laws confirmed by the state; for, as Dr. Brun has expressly said, "the ecclesiastical law of England is compounded of these four main ingredients, the civil law, the canon law, the common law, and the statute law." Its chief officers are appointed by the crown, and are such as have not even a name in the sacred records; and as the civil magistrate has authority in the church, so have many of those in the state. The church and state are not only allied, but have an essential dependence on each other. Even the doctrines professed, and the worship performed in the national church, are all secularized. Its creeds and forms of prayer, its rubrics and various rites, are adopted and used under the sanction of civil authority. Its liturgy, therefore, may be justly considered as an act of parliament respecting religious affairs. Add to this, that nothing could be more absurd than to attempt to enforce the peculiar laws of the kingdom of Christ, in any national church. For instance, Jesus hath delivered the following as a standing law in his kingdom: "If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses, every word may be established. And if he neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican." Matt. 18: 15. The utter impracticability of following out this rule of Christian duty, in any national church, must instantly strike every reflecting mind, and is alone sufficient to evince, that that cannot be the kingdom of Christ, in which his own laws cannot be executed, and the subjects of which may live in opposition to them without control. Indeed, if we examine attentively the laws of Christ's kingdom, as they are found in the New Testament, we must plainly perceive, that such of them as are enforced by no authority but his, are not only entirely disregarded in national churches, but are so contrary in their very nature to the course of this world, that no national establishment of religion could possibly exist that acted upon them. The following are a specimen. "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; but with you it shall not be so." "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust corrupt; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven." "I say unto you, that ye resist not evil: but if any man smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use and that persecute you." "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword." These precepts of Christ, sufficiently show the genius and spirit of his religion: and while they prove that the latter was never designed by him to be the established religion of any country, and indeed the impossibility of its ever being applied to such a purpose without being essentially corrupted, they afford a clear demonstration that all national establishments of it must be antichristian. Matt. 5: 6.

Yet it must not be inferred from this, that none of Christ's disciples are to be found in societies whose constitution is antichristian; for the reverse of that, is inferable from the tenor of Scripture. The writer of the Book of the Revelation tells us, he heard a voice from heaven, saying, "Come out of her, MY PEOPLE, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Rev. 18: 1-4. an address which obviously could have no meaning, if none of Christ's people were in her. But if such persons are to be found in the "mother of harlots," with much less hesitation may it be inferred that they are connected with her unchaste daughters, those national churches which are founded upon, what are called Protestant principles. These last, equally with the former, are opposed to the spirit of the doctrine, and to the nature of the kingdom of Christ, which was never intended to draw a form of godliness over whole nations that are destitute of its saving power and influence, and to gather out of them his elect, and constitute them a people for his praise. Acts 15: 14. 1 Pet. 2: 9, 10. Such national churches, therefore, though they may be purged, themselves, from many of the grosser evils of the Romish church, yet, being constituted upon similar principles, principles that are diametrically opposite to the nature of the kingdom of Christ, can only be allowed to differ from her, as a grain of arsenic differs from an ounce. ANTI-CALVINISTS; those who reject the system of that great reformer, which is generally called Calvinism, and embrace its opposite, Arminianism, both which see.—Williams.

ANTIDORON; a name given by the Greeks to the consecrated bread; out of which the middle part, marked with the cross, wherein the consecration resides, being taken away by the priest, the remainder is distributed after mass to the poor.—Buck.

ANTI-LIBANUS; the Greeks give this name to that chain of mountains east of Libanus, which, properly speaking, forms, together with Libanus, but one ridge of mountains, extending from north to south, and afterwards from south to north, in the shape almost of a horse-shoe, for the space of about fourscore leagues. The western part of these mountains was called Libanus; the eastern was called Anti-Libanus; the former reached along the Mediterranean, from Sidon, almost to Arada, or Smyra. The Hebrew text never mentions Anti-Libanus; but uses the general name of Libanus; and the coins struck at Laodicea and Hierapolis, have the inscription, "cities of Libanus," though they belong rather to Anti-Libanus. The Septuagint, on the contrary, puts Anti-Libanus often instead of Libanus. The valley which separates Libanus from Anti-Libanus is very fruitful; it was, formerly, on the side of Syria, inclosed with a wall, whereof there are now no traces. Strabo says, that the name of Cælo-Syria, or "the hollow Syria," belongs principally to the valley between Libanus and Anti-Libanus. (See LEBANON).—Calmet.

ANTIMONIANS; persons in the fourth century, who denied the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother, believing that she had afterwards children by Joseph—the brethren of our Lord.—Mosheim, vol. i. p. 432.

ANTINOMIANS; these derive their name from two Greek words, signifying against law; their favorite tenet being, that the law is not a rule of life to believers under the Gospel. The appellation is also generally given to those who carry the doctrine of justification by faith without works to such an extreme, as to separate practical holiness from true believing, and injure, if not wholly destroy, every obligation to moral obedience.

Antinomianism may be traced to the period of the Reformation. Its founder was John Agricola, at first a disciple of Luther, but afterwards an opponent both to him and Melancthon. While Luther was eagerly employed in censuring and refuting the popish doctors, who mixed the law and the Gospel together, and represented eternal life as the fruit of legal obedience, John Agricola went into another extreme, and took occasion to advance sentiments which Luther deemed Antinomian. He is said to have taught, that the law ought not to be proposed as a rule of life, nor used in the church as a means of instruction; and, of course, that repentance is not to be preached from the decalogue, but from the Gospel only; that the Gospel alone is to be inculcated and explained, and that good works do not promote our salvation, nor evil works hinder it.

In the seventeenth century, some of his followers in England are said to have expressly maintained, that as the elect cannot fall from grace, nor forfeit the divine favor; so neither are the evil actions they commit really sinful, or to be considered as violations of the divine law; and that, consequently, they have no occasion to confess their sins, or to seek renewed forgiveness. The Antinomian does things wrong in themselves, but they are not wrong when he does them, because he is a believer; so that were he to steal, the crime commonly called theft, would in him lose all its criminality, and cease to be a breach of the eighth commandment.

It does not appear that any set of professed Christians ever called themselves Antinomians: it is rather a term of reproach, which one party has too freely applied to another, and which therefore requires to be received with caution. The unguarded expressions which some persons have used, the bold positions they have advanced, and the construction to which their language is liable, have led others to charge them with Antinomian principles, when in reality they meant not so. As when they have spoken lightly of good works, or asserted that believers have nothing to do with the law of God, without fully explaining what they mean; when they assert that God is not angry with his people for their sins, nor in any sense punishes them on that account, without at all distinguishing between fatherly correction and vindictive wrath;—these and similar expressions, whatever be the private sentiments of those who advance them, have a direct tendency to injure the minds and morals of mankind, though it be under a pretence of enhancing the riches and freeness of divine grace.

Properly speaking, those only are Antinomians who are avowedly hostile to the law of God; who neither preach nor profess to embrace it, but term those legalists who do. With them, preaching the law is an abomination; and they will have nothing to do with it, except to vilify and condemn. Others of a similar description, but who are not aware of the tendency of their own statements, have embraced a system, which, by perverting the doctrine of divine decrees and efficacious grace, sets aside all moral obligation, and destroys the accountability of man. Justification by such a species of faith as is not necessarily productive of good works, and righteousness imputed to it, are the doctrines by which this class of professors are distinguished.—*Jones's Dict. of Relig. ANTIOCH; a city of Syria, situated on both sides of the river Orontes, about twenty miles from the place where it discharges itself into the Mediterranean. There were formerly many cities which bore that name; but this was the metropolis of Syria, and indeed of all the East. It was built three hundred years before Christ, by Seleucus Nicanor, and named in honor of his father Antiochus. Seleucus built in the same country the city of Seleucia, named from himself; Apamea, from his wife Apama; Laodicea, from his mother Laodice; and these three, together with Antioch, gave to that quarter of Syria the name of Tetrapolis, or the country of the four cities. The same name was afterwards given by Strabo to Antioch itself, because it consisted of four distinct divisions, built at different times, each surrounded with its own wall, but all inclosed by one common line of defence. By nature and art, says Dr. Wells, it was fortified even to admiration. It became the seat of empire of the Seleucide, or Syrian kings of the Macedonian race, and afterwards of the Roman governors of the eastern provinces; being very centrally and commodiously situated, midway between Constantinople and Alexandria, about seven hundred miles from each, in thirty-seven degrees, seventeen minutes north latitude, and thirty-six degrees, forty-five minutes east longitude. Indeed, for situation, magnitude, populousness, and various other advantages, it ranked as the third city of the Roman empire, being inferior only to Rome and Alexandria. The city was almost square; it had many gates; its circumference exceeded twelve miles, and its population was not less than half a million of souls. The fertility of its soil; the richness of its local scenery; the beauty of its fountains; and the magnificence of its temples; the sumptuousness of its palaces; the extent of its commerce; and the learning, genius, and taste of its inhabitants, were celebrated throughout the world, and it was considered an honor to be one of its citizens. Hence Cicero, in his oration for the poet Archias, who was a native of Antioch, introduces this fact in favor of his client, and commends the place of his birth as "a noble city, abounding in eminent men." And there are still extant, medals of this city, which show that it was honored as a Roman colony, a metropolis and an asylum; and that it was also Autonomos, or (as this Greek word signifies) governed by its own laws.

The greater part of the inhabitants were Greeks and Syrians; but Josephus says that many Jews also settled in it. The kings of Syria allowed the Jews the freedom of Antioch equally with the Greeks, so that their numbers increased exceedingly, and they were always bringing over a great many of the Greeks to their religious worship.

About one hundred and forty-five years before Christ, the inhabitants of Antioch were so exasperated by the licentious and tyrannical conduct of their sovereign Demetrius Nicator, that he applied to Jonathan, one of the Maccabees, for three thousand men, to keep his subjects in awe, and to compel them to deliver up their arms. This violent measure caused a general insurrection in the city. The citizens ran to arms, and, to the number of one hundred and twenty thousand, surrounded the place of their prince. All the Jews in Antioch hastened to his relief, dispersed the insurgents with fire and sword, and compelled the rest to submit and sue for pardon. Upon the reduction of Syria by the Romans, Antioch fell under their dominion. It was besieged by the Parthians after the defeat of Crassus, about fifty years before Christ; and it was one of the cities which declared for Cæsar against Pompey.

Antioch was sometimes called Antiochia Epidaphne, and Antiochia apud Daphnem, to distinguish it from other cities of the same name. It derived its appellation from its neighborhood to Daphne, a village mentioned in the history of the Maccabees, (2 Mac. 4. 33.) which stood about five miles from Antioch, and was accounted one of the suburbs of the city. Here Seleucus had planted an immense grove of laurels and cypresses, more than three miles in extent, in the centre of which was a temple dedicated to Apollo and Diana; the whole being consecrated as an asylum or sanctuary. To this place the inhabitants of Antioch were accustomed to resort for amusement, as the Romans did to Baie, and the Alexandrians to Canopus; but in process of time it was so much frequented by the votaries of Venus and Bacchus, rather than of Apollo and Diana, that it was avoided as infamous, by all who had any regard for their reputation. Here the worship, as among other idolatrous people in the awful recesses of caves and groves, was, alas! worthy of its object. Surrounded by every thing that could minister to the senses, the juvenile devotee wanted not the countenance of a libertine god to abandon himself to voluptuousness. Even those of riper years and graver morals could not, with safety, breathe the atmosphere of a place, where pleasure, assuming the character of religion, roused the dormant passions, and subdued the firmness of virtuous resolution. Hence Daphnicis moribus vivere, "to live after the manner of Daphne," became a proverbial expression to denote the most dissolute course of life. It was, indeed, the general characteristic of the inhabitants of Antioch, in almost every period of their history, to live after this manner; and to this their voluptuous disposition, may be ascribed many of the calamities which befel this celebrated city, if not indeed its final catastrophe.

Such was Antioch in the time of the apostles. Yet in this most unpromising soil did Christianity take root. It has been already remarked, that the inhabitants were chiefly Greeks. To these, in particular, it appears from Acts 11: 20. certain Cypriot and Cyrenian converts, who had fled from the persecution which followed the death of Stephen, addressed themselves, "preaching the Lord Jesus." The humble and faithful labors of these persecuted men, were signally blessed in this idolatrous city; "and the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed and turned unto the Lord." Mr. Jones is of opinion, however, that the Gospel had been previously introduced into this city, by the Jewish converts soon after the day of Pentecost. Should this opinion be admitted, (and it is not improbable,) this season must be regarded as a very great and glorious revival at Antioch; and hence arose one of the most illustrious of all the primitive Christian churches. When the apostles at Jerusalem were informed of the success of the Gospel in this populous capital of Syria, they sent Barnabas to aid the infant church. His coming was attended with the happiest results; and so fast did the field expand, and the harvest ripen, that he was soon forced to solicit the assistance of Paul, who was then residing among his friends at Tarsus. By means of their joint labors the church was greatly enlarged, and this place became their future residence, the centre and rallying point of all their subsequent ministerial and missionary exertions. Here they were also joined by Peter; who, on one memorable occasion, for his unreasonable concessions to the Jews, respecting the observance of the ceremonial law, and consequent dissimulation, was firmly and publicly reprobated by Paul, as putting to hazard the very substance of the glorious Gospel. Acts 15: 22—35. Gal. 2: 11—14.

Antioch was the birth-place of St. Luke; and also of Theophilus, to whom his two books of the evangelical history were addressed. In this city, also, the name of Christians was first given, and as the original word indicates, by divine authority, to the followers of Christ; who before this were commonly styled Nazarenes, as being the followers of Jesus of Nazareth, a name by which the Jews in scorn call them to this day, with the same intent that the Gentiles of old were wont to call them Galileans. In the relief sent by this church to their suffering brethren in Judea, during the famine foretold by Agabus, which occurred in the fourth or fifth year of Claudius, (as mentioned by Josephus, Eusebius and others,) we see the generous overflowings of their Christian charity. Acts 11: 27—30. And we have the testimony of Chrysostom, both of the vast increase of this illustrious church in the fourth century, and of the spirit of charity which then continued to actuate it. It consisted, at this time, of not less than a hundred thousand communicants, three thousand of whom were supported out of the donations of their brethren.

It is painful to trace the progress of declension in such a church as this,—a church whose infancy was watched over by such a brilliant galaxy of eminent and inspired teachers, (Acts 13: 1.)—whose maturity was adored by the character and writings of the most distinguished of the early martyrs, Ignatius, for many years its venerable pastor—and which flourished for three centuries with increasing vigor, under the fires of persecution; yet from the age of Chrysostom, that is, from the close of the fourth century, must we date its decline and fall. It continued indeed outwardly prosperous; but superstition, secular ambition, and the pride of life; pomp and formality in the service of God, in the place of humility and sincere devotion; the decay of charity, and the growth of faction; showed that real religion was fast disappearing; and that the foundations were already laid of that great apostasy, which, in two centuries from this time, overspread the whole Christian world; led to the almost entire extinction of the church of the East; and still holds dominion over the fairest portion of the West.

Antioch, under its modern name of Antakia, is now but little known to the western nations. It occupies, or rather did till lately occupy, a remote corner of the ancient inclosure of its walls. Its splendid buildings were reduced to hovels; and its population of half a million, to ten thousand wretched beings, living in the usual debasement and insecurity of Turkish subjects. Such was nearly its condition when visited by Pocock about the year 1738, and again by Kinnico, in 1813. But its ancient subterranean enemy, which, since its destruction in 587, never long together withheld its tremendous assaults, has again triumphed over it. The earthquake of the 13th of August, 1822, laid it once more in ruins. The Jewish missionary, Wolfe, who was present at the awful scene, transmitted to his friends a most vivid description of this closing catastrophe. Every thing relating to Antioch is now past.—Celmet; Wells; Jones; Watson.

ANTIOCH, of Pisidia; besides the Syrian capital, there was another Antioch, visited by St. Paul when in Asia, and called, for the sake of distinction, Antiochia ad Pisidiam, as belonging to that province, of which it was the capital. Here Paul and Barnabas preached; but the Jews, jealous, as usual, of the reception of the Gospel by the Gentiles, raised a sedition against them, and obliged them to leave the city. Acts 13: 14. to the end. There were several other cities of the same name, sixteen in number, in Syria and Asia Minor, built by the Seleucidæ, the successors of Alexander in these countries; but the above two are the only ones in which it is necessary to describe as occurring in Scripture.—Watson.

ANTIOCHUS; there were many kings of this name in Syria, much celebrated in the Greek, Roman, and Jewish histories, after the time of Seleucus Nicanor, the father of Antiochus Soter, and reckoned the first king of Syria, after Alexander the Great.

I. ANTIOCHUS SOTER, was the son of Seleucus Nica-nor, and obtained the surname of Soter, or Savior, from having hindered the invasion of Asia by the Gauls. Some say it was on the following occasion: the Galatians having marched to attack the Jews in Babylon, whose army consisted only of eight thousand men, reinforced with four thousand Macedonians, the Jews defended themselves with so much bravery, that they killed one hundred and twenty thousand men. 2 Mac. 8: 20. It was perhaps, too, on this occasion, that Antiochus Soter made the Jews of Asia free of the cities belonging to the Gentiles, and permitted them to live according to their own laws.

II. ANTIUCHUS THEOS, or, the God; was the son and successor of Antiochus Soter. He married Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. Laodice, his first wife, seeing herself despised, poisoned Antiochus, Berenice, and their son, who was intended to succeed in the kingdom. After this, Laodice procured Seleucus Callinicus, her son by Antiochus, to be acknowledged king of Syria. These events were foretold by Daniel: "And in the end of years," the king of Egypt, or of the south, and the king of Syria, or of the north, "shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm: but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times." Dan. 9: 6.

III. ANTIUCHUS THE GREAT; was the son of Seleucus Callinicus, and brother to Seleucus Ceraunus, whom he succeeded in the year of the world 3781, and before Jesus Christ 223. He made war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, but was defeated near Raphia. 3 Mac. 1. Thirteen years after, Ptolemy Philopator, being dead, Antiochus resolved to become master of Egypt. He immediately seized Cælo-Syria, Phenicia, and Judea; but Scopas, general of the Egyptian army, entered Judea while Antiochus was occupied by the war against Attalus, and retook those places. However, he soon lost them again to Antiochus. On this occasion happened what Josephus relates of this prince's journey to Jerusalem. After a victory which he had obtained over Scopas, near the springs of Jordan, he became master of the strong palaces in Cælo-Syria and Samaria; and the Jews submitted freely to him, received him into their city, and furnished his army plentifully with provisions. In reward for their affection, Antiochus granted them, according to Josephus, twenty thousand pieces of silver, to purchase beasts for sacrifice, one thousand four hundred and sixty measures of meal, and three hundred and seventy-five measures of salt, to be offered with the sacrifices, and timber to rebuild the porches of the Lord's house. He exempted the senators, scribes, and singing men of the temple, from the capitation tax; and he permitted the Jews to live according to their own laws in every part of his dominions. He also remitted the third part of their tribute, to indemnify them for their losses in the war; he forbade the heathens to enter the temple without being purified, and to bring into the city the flesh of mules, asses, and horses to sell, under a severe penalty.

In the year of the world 3815, Antiochus was overcome by the Romans, and obliged to cede all his possessions beyond Mount Taurus, to give twenty hostages, among whom was his own son Antiochus, afterwards surnamed Epiphanes, and to pay a tribute of twelve thousand Euboic talents, each fourteen Roman pounds in weight. To defray these charges, he resolved to seize the treasures of the temple of Belus, at Elymais; but the people of that country, informed of his design, surprised and destroyed him, with all his army, in the year of the world 3817, and before Jesus Christ 187. He left two sons, Seleucus Philopator, and Antiochus Epiphanes, who succeeded him.

IV. ANTIUCHUS EPIPHANES; the son of Antiochus the Great, having continued an hostage at Rome fourteen years, his brother Seleucus resolved to procure his return to Syria, and sent his own son Demetrius to Rome in the place of Antiochus. Whilst Antiochus was on his journey to Syria, Seleucus died, in the year of the world 3829. When therefore Antiochus landed, the people received him as some propitious deity come to assume the government, and to oppose the enterprises of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who threatened to invade Syria. For this reason, Antiochus obtained the surname of Epiphanes, the illustrious, or of one appearing like a god.

Antiochus quickly turned his attention to the possession of Egypt, which was then enjoyed by Ptolemy Philometor, his nephew, son to his sister Cleopatra, whom Antiochus the Great had married to Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt. He sent Apollonius, one of his officers into Egypt, apparently to honor Ptolemy's coronation, but in reality to obtain information whether the great men of the kingdom were inclined to place the government of Egypt in his hands during the minority of the king's nephew. 2 Mac. 4: 21, &c. Apollonius, however found them not disposed to favor his master; and this obliged Antiochus to make war against Philometor. He came to Jerusalem in 3831, and was received there by Jason, to whom he had sold the high priesthood. He designed to attack Egypt, but returned without effecting any thing. The ambition of those Jews who sought the high priesthood, and bought it of Antiochus, was the beginning of those calamities which overwhelmed their nation under this prince. Jason procured himself to be constituted in this dignity, in the stead of Onias III.; but, Menelaus offering a greater price, Jason was deprived, and Menelaus appointed in his place. The usurpers of the high priesthood, to gratify the Syrians, assumed the manners of the Greeks, their games and exercises, and neglected the worship of the Lord, and the temple service.

War broke out between Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolemy Philometor. Antiochus entered Egypt in the year of the world 3833, and reduced almost the whole of it to his obedience. 2 Mac. 5: 3—5. The next year he returned; and whilst he was engaged in the siege of Alexandria, a false report was spread of his death. The inhabitants of Jerusalem testifying their joy at this news, Antiochus, when returning from Egypt, entered this city by force, treated the Jews as rebels, and commanded his troops to slay all they met. Eighty thousand were killed, made captives, or sold on this occasion. Antiochus, conducted by the corrupt high priest Menelaus, entered into the holy of holies, whence he took and carried off the most precious vessels of that holy place, to the value of one thousand eight hundred talents. In the year 3835, Antiochus made a third expedition against Egypt, which he entirely subdued. The year following, he sent Apollonius into Judea, with an army of twenty-two thousand men, and commanded him to kill all the Jews who were of full age, to sell the women and young men. 2 Mac. 5: 24, 25. These orders were too punctually executed. It was on this occasion that Judas Maccabæus retired into the wilderness with his father and his brethren. 2 Mac. 5: 29. These misfortunes were only preludes of what they were to suffer; for Antiochus, apprehending that the Jews would never be constant in their obedience to him, unless he obliged them to change their religion, and to embrace that of the Greeks, issued an edict, enjoining them to conform to the laws of other nations, and forbidding their usual sacrifices in the temple, their festivals, and their Sabbath. The statue of Jupiter Olympus was placed upon the altar of the temple, and thus the abomination of desolation was seen in the temple of God. Many corrupt Jews complied with these orders; but others resisted them. Mattathias and his sons retired to the mountains. Old Eleazar, and the seven brethren, suffered death with great courage at Antioch. 2 Mac. 7. Mattathias being dead, Judas Maccabæus headed those Jews who continued faithful, and opposed with success the generals whom king Antiochus sent into Judea. The king, informed of the valor and resistance of Judas, sent new forces; and, finding his treasures exhausted, he resolved to go into Persia to levy tributes, and to collect large sums which he had agreed to pay to the Romans. 1 Mac. 3: 5—31. 2 Mac. 9: 1, &c. 1 Mac. 6: 1, &c. Knowing that very great riches were lodged in the temple of Elymais, he determined to carry it off; but the inhabitants of the country made so vigorous a resistance, that he was forced to retreat towards Babylon. When he was come to Ecbatana, he was informed of the defeat of Nicanor and Timotheus, and that Judas Maccabæus had retaken the temple of Jerusalem, and restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sa crifices. On receiving this intelligence, the king was transported with indignation; and threatening to make Jerusalem a grave for the Jews, commanded the driver of his chariot to urge the horses forward, and to hasten his journey. However, divine vengeance soon overtook him: he fell from his chariot and bruised all his limbs. He was also tormented with such pains in his bowels, as allowed him no rest; and his disease was aggravated by grief and vexation. In this condition he wrote to the Jews very humbly, promised them many things, and engaged even to turn Jew, if God would restore him to health. He earnestly recommended to them his son Antiochus, who was to succeed him, and entreated them to favor the young prince, and to continue faithful to him. He died, overwhelmed with pain and grief, in the mountains of Paratcene, in the little town of Tabes, in the year of the world 3810, and before Jesus Christ 164.

V. ANTIQCHUS EUPATOR; son of Antiochus Epiphanes, was only nine years old when his father died and left him the kingdom of Syria. Lysias, who governed the kingdom in the name of the young prince, led against Judea an army of one hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and thirty elephants. 1 Mac. 6. 2 Mac. 13. He besieged and took the fortress of Bethsura, and thence marched against Jerusalem. The city was ready to fall into his hands, when Lysias received the news that Philip, whom Antiochus Epiphanes had intrusted with the reGENCY of the kingdom, had come to Antioch to take the government, according to the disposition of the late king. He therefore proposed an accommodation with the Jews, that he might return speedily to Antioch and oppose Philip. After concluding a peace, he immediately returned into Syria, with the young king and his army.

In the mean time, Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator, and nephew to Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom by right the kingdom belonged, having escaped from Rome, came into Syria. Finding the people disposed for revolt, Demetrius headed an army, and marched directly to Antioch, against Antiochus and Lysias. However, the inhabitants did not wait till he besieged the city; but opened the gates, and delivered to him Lysias and the young king Antiochus Eupator, whom Demetrius caused to be put to death, without suffering them to appear in his presence. Antiochus Eupator reigned only two years, and died in the year of the world 3842, and before Jesus Christ 162.

VI. ANTIQCHUS THEOS, or the Divine; the son of Alexander Balas, king of Syria, was brought up by the Arabian prince Elmachuel, or, as he is called in the Greek, Simaleuc. 1 Mac. 9: 39, 40, &c. Demetrius Nicanor, king of Syria, having rendered himself odious to his troops, one Diodotus, otherwise called Tryphon, came to Zabdiel, a king in Arabia, and desired him to intrust him with young Antiochus, whom he promised to place on the throne of Syria, which was then possessed by Demetrius Nicanor. After some hesitation, Zabdiel complied with the request; and Tryphon carried Antiochus into Syria, and put the crown on his head. The troops dismissed by Demetrius, came and joined Tryphon, who, having formed a powerful army, defeated Demetrius, and forced him to retreat to Seleucia. Tryphon seized his elephants, and rendered himself master of Antioch, in the year of the world 3859, and before Jesus Christ 145. Antiochus Theos, to strengthen himself in his new acquisition, sent letters to Jonathan Maccabæus, high priest and prince of the Jews, confirming him in the high priesthood, and granting him four toparchies, or four considerable places, in Judea. He also received Jonathan into the number of his friends, sent him vessels of gold, permitted him to use a gold cup, to wear purple, a golden buckle; and he gave his brother, Simon Maccabæus, the command of all his troops on the coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt. Jonathan, engaged by so many favors, declared resolutely for Antiochus, or rather for Tryphon, who reigned under the name of this young prince; and, on several occasions, he attacked the generals of Demetrius, who still possessed many places beyond Jordan and in Galilee. 1 Mac. 11: 63, &c. 12: 24—34. Tryphon, seeing young Antiochus in peaceable possession of the kingdom of Syria, resolved to usurp his crown. He thought it necessary, in the first place, to secure Jonathan Maccabæus, who was one of the most powerful supporters of Antiochus's throne. He came, therefore, with troops into Judea, invited Jonathan to Ptolemais, and there, on frivolous pretences, made him prisoner. However, Simon, Jonathan's brother, headed the troops of Judea, and opposed Tryphon, who intended to take Jerusalem. Tryphon, being disappointed, put Jonathan to death at Bassa or Bascama, and returned into Syria, where, without delay, he executed his design of killing Antiochus. He corrupted the royal physicians, who, having published that Antiochus was tormented with the stone, murdered him, by cutting him without any necessity. Thus Tryphon was left master of Syria, in the year of the world 3861, and before Jesus Christ 143.

VII. ANTIQCHUS SIDETES, or Soter the Saviour, or Eusebes the pious; was the son of Demetrius Soter, and brother to Demetrius Nicanor. Tryphon, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria, having rendered himself odious to his troops, they deserted him, and offered their services to Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius Nicanor. She lived in the city of Seleucia, shut up with her children, while her husband Demetrius was a prisoner in Persia, where he had married Rodegana, the daughter of Arsaces king of Persia. Cleopatra, therefore, sent to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, and offered him the crown of Syria, if he would marry her; to which Antiochus consented. This prince was then at Cnidus, where his father, Demetrius Soter, had placed him with one of his friends. He came into Syria, and wrote to Simon Maccabæus, to engage him against Tryphon. 1 Mac. 15: 1, 2, 3, &c. He confirmed the privileges which the kings of Syria had granted to Simon, permitted him to coin money with his own stamp, declared Jerusalem and the temple exempt from royal jurisdiction, and promised other favors as soon as he should obtain peaceable possession of the kingdom which had belonged to his ancestors. Antiochus Sidetes having married his sister-in-law, Cleopatra, in the year of the world 3865, the troops of Tryphon resorted to him in crowds. Tryphon, thus abandoned, retired to Dora, in Phœnicia, whither Antiochus pursued with an army of one hundred and twenty thousand foot, eight hundred horse, and a powerful fleet. Simon Maccabæus sent Antiochus two thousand chosen men; but the latter refused them and revoked all his promises. He also sent Athenobius to Jerusalem, to oblige Simon to restore to him Gazara and Joppa, with the citadel of Jerusalem; and to demand of him five hundred talents more, as reparation for the injuries the king had suffered, and as tribute for his own cities. At the same time he threatened to make war upon him, if he did not comply. Simon showed Athenobius all the lustre of his wealth and power, told him he had in his possession no place which belonged to Antiochus, and said that the cities of Gazara and Joppa had greatly injured his people, and he would give the king for the property of them one hundred talents. Athenobius returned with great indignation to Antiochus, who was extremely offended at Simon's answer. In the mean time, Tryphon having escaped privately from Dora, embarked in a vessel and fled. Antiochus pursued him, and sent Cendebeus with troops into the maritime parts of Palestine, and commanded him to rebuild Cedron, and fight the Jews. John Hircanus, son of Simon Maccabæus, was then at Gaza, and gave notice to his father of the coming of Cendebeus. Simon furnished his sons, John Hircanus and Judas with troops, and sent them against Cendebeus, whom they routed in the plain, and pursued to Azotus.

Antiochus followed Tryphon, till he forced him to kill himself in the year of the world 3869. After this, Antiochus thought only of reducing to his obedience those cities which, in the beginning of his father's reign, had shaken off their subjection. Simon Maccabæus, prince and high priest of the Jews, being treacherously murdered by Ptolemy, his son-in-law, in the castle of Docus, near Jericho, the murderer immediately sent to Antiochus Sidetes to demand troops, that he might recover for him the country and cities of the Jews. Antiochus came in person with an army, and besieged Jerusalem, which was bravely defended by John Hircanus. The siege was long protracted; and the king divided his army into seven parts, and guarded all the avenues of the city. It being the time for celebrating the feast of the tabernacles, the Jews desired of Antiochus a truce for seven days. The king not only granted this request, but sent them bulls with gilded horns, and vessels of gold and silver filled with incense to be offered in the temple. He also ordered such provisions as they wanted, to be given to the Jewish soldiers. This courtesy of the king so won the hearts of the Jews, that they sent ambassadors to treat of peace, and to desire that they might live according to their own laws. Antiochus required that they should surrender their arms, demolish the city walls, pay tribute for Joppa and the other cities they possessed out of Judea, and receive a garrison into Jerusalem. To these conditions, except the last, the Jews consented; for they could not be induced to see an army of strangers in their capital, and chose rather to give hostages and five hundred talents of silver. The king entered the city, beat down the breastwork above the walls, and returned to Syria, in the year of the world 3870, and before Jesus Christ 134. Three years after, Antiochus marched against the Persians, or Parthians, and demanded the liberty of his brother Demetrius Nicanor, who had been made prisoner long before by Arsaces, and was detained for the purpose of being employed in exciting a war against Antiochus. This war, therefore, Antiochus thought proper to prevent. With an army of eighty thousand, or, as Orosius says, of one hundred thousand men, he marched towards Persia, and no sooner appeared on the frontiers of that country, than several eastern princes, detesting the pride and avarice of the Persians, came and surrendered. Antiochus defeated his enemies in three engagements, and took Babylon. He was accompanied in these expeditions by John Hircanus, high priest of the Jews, who, it is supposed, obtained the surname of Hircanus from some gallant action which he performed.

As the army of Antiochus was too numerous to continue assembled in any one place, he was obliged to divide it, to put it into winter quarters. These troops behaved with so much insolence, that they alienated the minds of all men. The cities in which they were, privately surrendered to the Persians; and all resolved to attack, in one day, the garrison they contained, that the troops being separated might not assist each other. Antiochus at Babylon obtained intelligence of this design, and, with the few soldiers about him, endeavored to succor his people. He was attacked in the way by Phrates, king of Persia, whom he fought with great bravery; but being at length deserted by his own forces, according to the generality of historians, he was overpowered and killed by the Persians or Parthians. Appian, however, says that he killed himself, and Ælian, that he threw himself headlong from a precipice. This event took place in the year of the world 3871, and before Jesus Christ 130. After the death of Sidetes, Demetrius Nicanor, or Nicetor, reascended the throne of Syria.—Watson.

ANTIPAS, Antipas Herod, or Herod Antipas; was the son of Herod the Great, and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. Herod the Great, in his first will, declared him his successor in the kingdom; but he afterwards named his son Archelaus king of Judea, and gave to Antipas only the title of tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. Archelaus going to Rome, to persuade the emperor to confirm his father's will, Antipas also went thither. The emperor bestowed on Archelaus one moiety of what had been assigned him by Herod, with the quality of ethnarch, and promised to grant him the title of king when he had shown himself deserving of it by his virtues. To Antipas Augustus gave Galilee and Perea; and to Philip, Herod's other son, the Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, with some other places.

Antipas, returning to Judea, took great pains in adorning and fortifying the principal places in his dominions. He married the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, whom he divorced about A. D. 33, that he might marry his sister-in-law, Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, who was still living. John the Baptist, exclaiming against this incest, was seized by order of Antipas, and imprisoned in the castle of Machærus. Josephus says, that Antipas caused John to be taken, because he drew too great a concourse after him; and Antipas was afraid he should use his influence over the people to induce them to revolt. But Josephus has reported the pretence for the true cause. The evangelists, who were better informed than Josephus, as being eye-witnesses of what passed, and particularly acquainted with John and his disciples, assure us, that the true reason of imprisoning John was the aversion of Herod and Herodias against him, on account of his liberty in censuring their scandalous marriage. Matt. 14: 3, 4. Mark 6: 14, 17, 18. Luke 3: 19, 20. When the king was celebrating his birthday, with the principal persons of his court, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased him so well, that he swore to give her whatever she would ask. She consulted her mother, who advised her to ask the head of John the Baptist. Returning, therefore, to the hall, she addressed herself to the king, and said, "Give me here John the Baptist's head in a charger." The king was afflicted at this request; but in consideration of his oath, and of the persons at table with him, he sent one of his guards, who beheaded John in prison. The head was brought in, and given to the young woman, who delivered it to her mother. Matt. 14: 5, 6, &c. Aretas, king of Arabia, to revenge the affront which Herod had offered to his daughter, declared war against him, and vanquished him in a very obstinate contest. Josephus tells us, that the Jews attributed the defeat of Herod to the death of John the Baptist. In the year of the Christian era 39, Herodias, being jealous of the prosperity of her brother Agrippa, who, from a private person, had become king of Judea, persuaded her husband, Herod Antipas, to visit Rome, and desire the same dignity of the emperor Caius. She resolved to accompany him, and hoped that her presence and appearance would contribute to procure the emperor's favor. However, Agrippa obtaining intelligence of this design, wrote to the emperor, and accused Antipas. The messenger, of Agrippa arrived at Baie, where the emperor was, at the very time when Herod received his first audience. Caius, on the delivery of Agrippa's letters, read them with great earnestness. In these letters, Agrippa accused Antipas of having been a party in Sejanus's conspiracy against Tiberius, and said that he still carried on a correspondence with Artabanus, king of Parthia, against the Romans. As a proof of this, he affirmed that Antipas had in his arsenals arms for seventy thousand men. Caius being angry, demanded hastily of Antipas, if it were true that he had such a quantity of arms. The king not daring to deny it, was instantly banished to Lyons in Gaul. The emperor offered to forgive Herodias, in consideration of her brother Agrippa; but she chose rather to follow her husband, and to share his fortune in banishment. This is that Antipas, who, being at Jerusalem at the time of our Savior's passion, ridiculed Jesus whom Pilate had sent to him, dressed him in worn-out royalty, and sent him back to Pilate as a mocking king, whose ambition gave him no umbrage. Luke 23: 7—11. The year of the death of Antipas is unknown; but it is certain that he, as well as Herodias, died in exile. Josephus says, that he died in Spain, whither Caius, on his coming into Gaul the first year of his banishment, might order him to be sent.

II. ANTIPAS; the faithful martyr or witness mentioned in the book of Revelation, 2: 13. He is said to have been one of our Savior's first disciples, and to have suffered martyrdom at Pergamus, of which he was bishop. His acts relate that he was burnt in a brazen bull. Though ancient ecclesiastical history furnishes no account of this Antipas, yet it is certain, that according to all the rules of language, what is said concerning him by St. John must be understood literally, and not mystically, as some interpreters have done.—Watson.

ANTIPATRIS; a town in Palestine, anciently called Cuphar-Saba, according to Josephus; but named Antipatris by Herod the Great, in honor of his father Antipater. It was situated in a pleasant valley, near the mountains, in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea. Josephus places it at about the distance of seventeen miles from Joppa. To this place St. Paul was brought in his way to the governor of Judea at Cæsarea. Acts 23: 31.

ANTIPATHY; hatred, aversion, repugnancy. Hatred is entertained against persons, aversion and antipathy against persons or things, and repugnancy against actions alone. Hatred is more voluntary than aversion, antipathy, or repugnancy; these last have greater affinity with the animal constitution. The causes of antipathy are less known than those of aversion. Repugnancy is less permanent than either the one or the other. We hate a vicious character; we feel an aversion to its exertions. We are affected with antipathy for certain persons at first sight; there are some affairs which we transact with repugnancy. Hottred calumnates, aversion keeps us at a distance from certain persons. Antipathy makes us detest them; repugnancy hinders us from imitating them.—Buck.

ANTI-PEDOBAPTISTS; a denomination given to those who object to the baptism of infants. The word is derived from anti, against, pais, paidos, a child, and baptizo, I baptize. (See BAPTISM.)

ANTIQUITIES; a term implying all testimonies or authentic accounts that have come down to us of ancient nations. As the study of antiquity may be useful both to the inquiring Christian, as well as to those who are employed in, or are candidates for, the Gospel ministry, we shall here subjoin a list of those which are esteemed the most valuable.—Fabricii Bibliographia Antiquaria; Spencer de Legibus Heb. Ritualibus; Godwyn's Moses and Aaron; Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church; Jenning's Jewish Antiquities; Potter's and Harwood's Greek, and Kennet's and Adams's Roman Antiquities; Preface to the Prussian Testament, published by L'Enfant and Beauvoisre; Prideaux and Shuckford's Connections; Jones's Asiatic Researches; Maurice's Indian Antiquities; and Jahn's Archaeology.

ANTI-SABBATARIANS; those who reject both the Jewish and the Christian Sabbaths. They argue—1. That the Jewish Sabbath was only of ceremonial, and not of moral obligation; being a type of that "rest which remaineth for the people of God."—2. That neither Christ nor his apostles enjoined the observation of another Sabbath;—but, 3. On the contrary, the apostles cautioned Christians against the "observance of days and times," as of a dangerous and superstitious tendency.

Directly opposed to these are Sabbatarians, who adhere rigidly to the original institution: when we have stated their reasonings under the latter denomination, we may endeavor to ascertain the Scripture doctrine on this important subject.—Williams.

ANTI-SUPERNATURALISTS; a term applied by Dr. J. P. Smith, to those who endeavor to subtract from the character of Christ, and of Christianity, every thing miraculous and supernatural. (See INDEX to his "Scripture Testimonies to Messiah.")

ANTIFACTE; a party of Gnostics, in the second century, who are said to have observed the divine precepts by "the rule of reverse;" a charge which might, perhaps, with equal reason, be alleged against some modern Christians, so called, who seem to read all the divine prohibitions as the seventh command was once printed—"Thou shalt commit adultery;" "Thou shalt kill;" "Thou shalt steal;" &c. Other ecclesiastical writers, however, explain the terms somewhat differently, as believing two first principles, a good and evil God, and placing them, antiactae, in opposition—as it were, in battle array.—Turner's Hist. p. 61.—Williams.

ANTHETIC-PARALLEL; an important rule of Biblical interpretation. (See POETRY OF THE HEBREWS.)

ANTI-TALMUDISTS; the word applies generally to all, whether Jews or Christians, who reject and oppose the Talmud, as the Caraites, &c., which see; but it applies particularly to a small society of Jews, founded 1756, in Podolia, (Polish Russia,) whose profession of faith was almost Christian; who admitted that the Messiah was no longer to be expected; and that "it is possible that God became incarnate to expiate human sins," and at length acknowledged Jesus for the Messiah, and desired baptism. Whether they received it, our authority does not say; but they were protected by the king of Poland.—Gregoire's Hist. 2: 310—12.; Han. Adams's Hist. of the Jews, pp. 527—8.

ANTI-TRINITARIANS; all who deny the doctrine of the Trinity, and who call themselves Unitarians, as admitting of only one person in the Deity. These may be conveniently considered under four classes:—1. Sabellians, who maintain the Father, Son, and Spirit to be one in person as well as in essence.—2. Arians, who believe the person of Jesus to be in a sense divine, but not of the same essence with the Almighty Father.—3. Socinians, who consider our Lord to be only man; but still, considering the high honors to which he is advanced, as entitled to a degree of divine worship. And 4. Humanitarians, who contend, that the Lord Jesus is a man only "like ourselves, fallible and peccable," and entitled to no higher honor than that of a good man, a moral philosopher, and a prophet. Such were the sentiments of Dr. Priestley, and such are those of most Anti-trinitarians of the present day. (See the four principal denominations here named.)—Williams.

ANTI-TYPE; that which answers to a type or figure. A type is a model, mould, or pattern; that which is formed according to it is an antitype. (See TYPE.)

The word antitype occurs twice in the New Testament, viz. in the Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. 9 v. 24. and in the first Epistle of St. Peter, chap. 3: v. 21. where its genuine import has been much controverted. (See ANSWER of a good conscience.) The former says, that "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are antitupa, the figures or antitypes of the true—how to appear in the presence of God." Now tupos signifies the pattern by which another thing is made; and as Moses was obliged to make the tabernacle, and all things in it, according to the pattern shown him in the mount, the tabernacle so formed was the antitype of what was shown to Moses: any thing, therefore, formed according to a model or pattern, is an antitype.—Buck.

ANTI-UNIVERSALISTS. (See UNIVERSALISTS.)

ANTONIA; one of the towers of Jerusalem, called by Herod after M. Antony. The Romans generally kept a garrison in this tower; and from thence it was that the tribune ran with his soldiers to rescue St. Paul out of the hands of the Jews, who had seized him in the temple, and designed to have murdered him. Acts 21: 31, 32.

ANTOSIANDRIANS; a sect of rigid Lutherans who opposed the doctrine of Osiander relating to justification. These are otherwise denominated Osiandromastiges. The Antosiidrians deny that man is made just, with that justice wherewith God himself is just; that is, they assert that he is not made essentially but only impunitively just; or that he is not really made just, but only pronounced so.—Buck.

ANXIETY; intense solicitude, the extreme of care. (See CARE.) Solicitude and anxiety as habits of the mind in relation to worldly things, and especially to providential events, yet future, are irreconcilable with the faith of a Christian, which requires him to cast all his burdens on the Lord. The charge of our Savior, Matt. 6: 25—34. literally rendered is, Be not anxious about your life; indulge no anxiety respecting the morrow, for sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

I. APAMEA; a city of Syria, on the Orontes, built, as is believed, by Seleucus I. king of Syria; or by his son, Antiochus Soter, in honor of queen Apamea, wife of Seleucus, and mother of Antiochus. It was probably the same with Shepham, a city of Syria. Numb. 31: 10, 11.—Calmet.

II. APAMEA; a city of Phrygia, on the river Marsyas, near which, as some have been of opinion, Noah's ark rested; whence the city took the surname of (Kibotos) Ark. On a medal, struck in honor of Adrian, is the figure of a man, representing the river Marsyas, with this inscription—A medal of the Apameans;—the Ark and the river Marsyas. That this was one of the commemorative notices of the ark, and of the deluge, there is little doubt; but only in the sense, that traditionary shrines, or memorials of the ark, were here very ancient; and that, journeying direct from Shinar, Babylon, or adjacent places, here one of the arks, commemorative of the original ark, rested and settled. That is, here the Arkite worship was commenced, before it spread over the neighboring country. In reference to the medal, we may add, that Strabo affirms the ancient name of Apamea, to have been Kibotos; by which name the ark (probably of Noah) was understood. Kibotos is, apparently, not a Greek term: it might be the name of the temple, in which commemoration was made of the ark, and of the preservation of man by it. There are several medals of Apamea extant, on which are represented the ark, with a man in it, receiving the dove, which is flying to him; and part of their inscription is the word noe. As they are from different dies, yet all referring to Apamea, it seems that their authors had a knowledge of the tradition of commemoration respecting the ark, preserved in this city. (See ARK.) Many more such commemorations of an event, so greatly affecting mankind, were no doubt maintained for many ages, though we are now under great difficulties in tracing them. In fact, many cities boasted of these memorials, and referred to them, as proofs of their antiquity. (See ARARAT.)—Calmet.

APATHY, among the ancient philosophers, implied an utter privation of passion, and an insensibility of pain. The word is compounded of a, priv, and pathos, affection. The stoics affected an entire apathy; they considered it as the highest wisdom, to enjoy perfect calmness, or tranquillity of mind, incapable of being ruffled by either pleasure or pain. In the first ages of the church, the Christians adopted the term apaty, to express a contempt of all earthly concerns; a state of mortification, such as the Gospel prescribes. Clemens Alexandrinus, in particular, brought it exceedingly in vogue, thinking thereby to draw such philosophers to Christianity, who aspired after such a sublime pitch of virtue.—Buck.

APE; cephus, 1 Kings 10: 22. 2 Chron. 9: 21. This animal seems to be the same with the ceph of the Ethiopians, of which Pliny speaks, l. viii. c. 19: "At the games given by Pompey the Great," says he, "were shown cephs, brought from Ethiopia, which had their fore feet like a human hand, their hind legs and feet, also, resembled those of a man." The Scripture says, that the fleet of Solomon brought apes, or rather monkeys, &c. from Ophir. The learned are not agreed respecting the situation of that country; but Major Wilford says, that the ancient name of the river Landi sindhi, in India, was Cophus. May it not have been so called, from the cephim inhabiting its banks?

We now distinguish this tribe of creatures into, 1. Monkeys, those with long tails; 2. Apes, those with short tails; 3. Baboons, those without tails. The ancient Egyptians are said to have worshipped apes; it is certain that they are still adored in many places in India. Maffens describes a magnificent temple dedicated to the ape, with a portico for receiving the victims sacrificed, supported by seven hundred columns.

"With glittering gold and sparkling gems they shine,
But apes and monkeys are the gods within."

Figures of apes are also made and revered as idols, of which we have several in Moore's "Hindoo Pantheon;" also, in the avatars, given in Maurice's "History of India," &c. In some parts of the country, the apes are held sacred, though not resident in temples; and incautious English gentlemen, by attempting to shoot these apes, (rather, perhaps, monkeys,) have been exposed, not only to all manner of insults and vexations from the inhabitants of the villages, &c. adjacent, but have even been in danger of their lives.—Watson.

APPELLEANS. (See MARCIONITES.)

APHEK; the name of several cities mentioned in Scripture, but none of them of sufficient note to require particular mention. See 1 Sam. 4: 1, 2, &c. 1 Sam. 29: 1. Josh. 19: 30. and 13: 4. 1 Kings 20: 26, &c.—Jones.

APHTHARTODOCITES; a small sect in the sixth century, who held, (as their name implies,) that the body of Jesus Christ was incorruptible, and not subject to death.

They were a branch of the Eutychians.—Broughton, vol. i. p. 58.—Williams.

APIS; a symbolical deity, worshipped by the Egyptians. It was an ox, having certain exterior marks, in which animal the soul of the great Osiris was supposed to subsist. The ox was probably made the symbol of Osiris, because he presided over agriculture.—Watson.

APOCALYPSE, signifies revelation. It is, however, particularly applied to the Revelation which St. John had in the isle of Patmos, whither he had been banished. The testimonies in favor of the book of the Revelation being a genuine work of St. John the evangelist, are very full and satisfactory. Andrew, bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, in the fifth century, assures us that Papias acknowledged the Revelation to be inspired. But the earliest author now extant, who mentions this book, is Justin Martyr, who lived about sixty years after it was written, and he ascribes it to St. John. So does Irenæus, whose evidence is alone sufficient upon this point; for he was the disciple of Polycarp, who was the disciple of John himself; and he expressly tells us, that he had the explanation of a certain passage in this book from those who had conversed with St. John, the author. These two fathers are followed by Clement of Alexandria, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Lactantius, Jerome, Athanasius, and many other ecclesiastical writers, all of whom concur in considering the apostle John as the author of the Revelation. Some few persons, however, doubted the genuineness of this book, in the third and fourth centuries; but since that time, it has been very generally acknowledged to be canonical; and, indeed, as Mr. Lowman observes "hardly any one book has received more early, more authentic, and more satisfactory attestations." The omission of this book, in some of the early catalogues of the Scriptures, was probably not owing to any suspicion concerning its authenticity or genuineness, but because its obscurity and mysteriousness were thought to render it less fit to be read publicly and generally. It is called the Revelation of John the Divine; and this appellation was first given to St. John by Eusebius, not to distinguish him from any other person of the same name, but as an honorable title, intimating that to him was more fully revealed the system of divine counsels than to any other prophet of the Christian dispensation.

St. John was banished to Patmos, in the latter part of the reign of Domitian, and he returned to Ephesus immediately after the death of that emperor, which happened in the year 96; and, as the apostle states that these visions appeared to him while he was in that island, we may consider this book as written in the year 95 or 96.

In the first chapter, St. John asserts the divine authority of the predictions which he is about to deliver; addresses himself to the churches of the Proconsular Asia; and describes the first vision, in which he is commanded to write the things then revealed to him. The second and third chapters contain seven epistles, to the seven churches in Asia; namely, of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, which relate chiefly to their then respective circumstances and situation. At the fourth chapter, the prophetic visions begin, and reach to the end of the book. They contain a prediction of all the most remarkable revolutions and events in the Christian church, from the time of the apostle to the final consummation of all things. An attempt to explain these prophecies does not fall within the design of this work; and, therefore, those who are disposed to study this sublime and mysterious book, are referred to Mede, Daubnitz, Sir Isaac Newton, Lowman, bishop Newton, bishop Hurd, and many other excellent commentators. These learned men agree, in their general principles, concerning the interpretation of this book, although they differ in some particular points; and it is not to be expected, that there should be a perfect coincidence of opinion, in the explanation of those predictions, which relate to still future times; for, as the incomparable Sir Isaac Newton observes, "God gave these, and the prophecies of the Old Testament, not to gratify men's curiosity, by enabling them to foreknow things, but that after they were fulfilled, they might be interpreted by the event, and his own presence, not that of the interpreters, be then manifested thereby to the world." "To explain this book perfectly," says bishop Newton, "is not the work of one man, or of one age; but probably it never will be clearly understood, till it is all fulfilled." It is graciously designed, that the gradual accomplishment of these predictions should afford, in every succeeding period of time, additional testimony to the divine origin of our holy religion.

The views of Eichhorn, Hug, and other German writers, as presented in Prof. Robinson's American edition of Calmet, and apparently approved by him, are at utter variance, not only with those of the distinguished writers mentioned above, but with all internal evidence and probability. All the prophecies relative to the great apostasy in the church itself; the rise of Antichrist, and his reign of twelve hundred and sixty years, during which the true church is driven for refuge into the wilderness; the overthrow of Babylon being immediately followed by the millennium, and the millennium by the final judgment, and the final judgment by the new heavens and earth, and the state of retribution, which endure forever; afford a series of proofs, fatal to the German hypothesis of interpretation. It is deeply to be regretted, that Prof. Robinson has so rashly committed himself, and put the sanction of his valuable name to so wild a theory.

Perhaps Mr. Keith, in his "Signs of the Times," published in 1831, has thrown more true light on the series of prophetic symbols in this book, than any writer who has preceded him. See, also, Fuller's Expository Lectures on the Apocalypse.

APOCARITES; a small sect in the third century, sprung from the Manichæans, who held that the soul of man was of the essence of God. (See MANICHÆANS.)—Williams.

APOCRYPHA; books not admitted into the sacred canon, being either spurious, or at least not acknowledged to be divine. The word apocrypha is of Greek origin, and is either derived from the words apo tes kryptes, because the books in question were removed from the crypt, chest, ark, or other receptacle in which the sacred books were deposited, whose authority was never doubted, or, more probably, from the verb apokrupto, to hide or conceal, because they were concealed from the generality of readers, their authority not being recognised by the church, and because they are books which are destitute of proper testimonials, their original being obscure, their authors unknown, and their character either heretical or suspected. The advocates of the church of Rome, indeed, affirm that some of these books are divinely inspired; but it is easy to account for this: the apocryphal writings serve to countenance some of the corrupt practices of that church. The Protestant churches not only account those books to be apocryphal, and merely human compositions, which are esteemed such by the church of Rome, as the Prayer of Manasseh, the third and fourth books of Esdras, the addition at the end of Job, and the hundred and fifty-first Psalm; but also the books of Tobit, Judith, the additions to the book of Esther, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch the Prophet, with the Epistle of Jeremiah, the Song of the Three Children, the Story of Susanna, the Story of Bel and the Dragon, and the first and second books of Maccabees. The books here enumerated are unanimously rejected by Protestants, for the following reasons:—

1. They possess no authority whatever, either external or internal, to procure their admission into the sacred canon. None of them are extant in Hebrew; all of them are in the Greek language, except the fourth book of Esdras, which is only extant in Latin. They were written, for the most part, by Alexandrian Jews, subsequently to the cessation of the prophetic Spirit, though before the promulgation of the Gospel. Not one of the writers, in direct terms, advances a claim to inspiration; nor were they ever received into the sacred canon by the Jewish church, and therefore they were not sanctioned by our Savior. No part of the apocrypha is quoted, or even alluded to, by him, or by any of his apostles; and both Philo and Josephus, who flourished in the first century of the Christian era, are totally silent concerning them.

2. The apocryphal books were not admitted into the canon of Scripture, during the first four centuries of the Christian church. They are not mentioned in the catalogue of inspired writings, made by Melito, bishop of Sardis, who flourished in the second century, nor in those of Origen, in the third century, of Athanasius, Hilary, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Amphilochius, Jerome, Rufinus, and others, of the fourth century; nor in the catalogue of canonical books recognised by the council of Laodicea, held in the same century, whose canons were received by the Catholic church; so that, as bishop Burnet well observes, we have the concurring sense of the whole church of God in this matter. To this decisive evidence against the canonical authority of the apocryphal books, we may add, that they were never read in the Christian church, until the fourth century; when, as Jerome informs us, they were read "for example of life and instruction of manners; but were not applied to establish any doctrine." And contemporary writers state, that, although they were not approved as canonical or inspired writings, yet some of them, particularly Judith, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus, were allowed to be perused by catechumens. As a proof that they were not regarded as canonical in the fifth century, Augustine relates, that when the book of Wisdom, and other writings of the same class, were publicly read in the church, they were given to the readers, or inferior ecclesiastical officers, who read them in a lower place than those which were universally acknowledged to be canonical, which were read by the bishops and presbyters, in a more eminent and conspicuous manner. To conclude: notwithstanding the veneration in which these books were held by the Romish church, it is evident that the same authority was never ascribed to them, as to the Old and New Testament, until the last council of Trent, at its fourth session, presumed to place them all, (except the Prayer of Manasseh, and the third and fourth books of Esdras,) in the same rank with the inspired writings of Moses and the prophets.—Watson.

APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT. A book has been lately published, called "The Apocryphal New Testament," the greater part of which consists of Wake's Epistles of the Fathers, some of which are curious; and the first Epistle of Clement, which is truly valuable, but has no claim to inspiration. The greater part of the work not in Wake is, however, only collected together under this name, with an obvious, though abortive, design to bring the genuine Scriptures into contempt.—Horne's (T. H.) Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures, third ed. vol. iii. p. 687, ad finem; Williams.

APOLLINARIANS, or Apollinarists, or, as they are called by Epiphanius, Dimarites; a sect who derived their principal name from Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, in the fourth century. Apollinaris strenuously defended the divinity of Christ against the Arians; but, by indulging too freely in philosophical distinctions and subtleties, he denied, in some measure, his humanity. He maintained that the body which Christ assumed, was endowed with a sensitive, and not a rational, soul; and that the divine nature performed the functions of reason, and supplied the place of the intellectual principle in man. Hence it seemed to follow, that the divine nature in Christ was blended with the human, and suffered with it the pains of crucifixion and death. Apollinaris and his followers have been charged with other errors, by certain ancient writers; but it is not easy to determine how far their charge is worthy of credit. The doctrine of Apollinaris was first condemned by a council at Alexandria, in 362, and afterwards, in a more formal manner, by a council at Rome, in 375, and by another council in 378, which deposed Apollinaris from his bishopric. In short, it was attacked at the same time by the laws of the emperors, the decrees of councils, and the writings of the learned, and sunk, by degrees, under their united force.—Watson.

APOLLONIUS; a martyr of the second century. He was a Roman senator, and was at once skilled in all the polite literature of those times, and in all the purest precepts taught by our blessed Redeemer. He was indeed an accomplished gentleman and a sincere Christian. This man, being accused as a Christian, and refusing to recant his opinions, was condemned to be beheaded; which sentence was executed on the 18th of April, 186.—Foz.

APOLLOS, was a Jew of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus in the year of our Lord 54, during the absence of St. Paul, who had gone to Jerusalem. Acts 18: 24. He was an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures; but he knew only of the baptism of John, and was not fully informed of the higher branches of Gospel doctrine. However, he acknowledged that Jesus Christ was the Messiah, and declared himself openly as his disciple. At Ephesus, therefore, he began to speak boldly in the synagogue, and demonstrated by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ. Aquila and Priscilla, having heard him there, took him with them, and instructed him more fully in the ways of God. Some time after, he was inclined to go into Achaia, and the brethren wrote to the disciples there, desiring them to receive him. He was very useful at Corinth, where he watered what St. Paul had planted. 1 Cor. 3: 6. It has been supposed, that the great admiration of his disciples for him, tended to produce a schism. Some said, "I am of Paul;" some, "I am of Apollos;" and others, "I am of Cephas." But this division, which St. Paul mentions and reproves, in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, did not prevent Paul and Apollos, personally, from being closely united in the bonds of Christian charity and affection. Apollos, hearing that the apostle was at Ephesus, went to meet him, and was there when St. Paul wrote the first Epistle to the Corinthians; in which he observes, that he had earnestly entreated Apollos to return to Corinth: but, though he had not prevailed with him, Apollos gave him room to hope that he would visit that city, at a favorable opportunity. Some have supposed, that the apostle names Apollos and Cephas, not as the real persons in whose name parties had been formed in Corinth, but that, in order to avoid provoking a temper which he wished to subside, he transfers, "by a figure," to Apollos and himself, what was really meant of other parties, whom, from prudence, he declines to mention. However this might be, the reluctance of Apollos to return to Corinth seems to countenance the general opinion. St. Jerome says that Apollos was so dissatisfied with the division which had happened on his account at Corinth, that he retired into Crete with Zeno, a doctor of the law; but that the evil having been corrected by the letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, Apollos returned to that city, of which he afterwards became bishop. The Greeks say that he was bishop of Duras; some, that he was bishop of Iconium, in Phrygia; and others, of Caesarea.—Watson.

APOLLYON. (See ABBADDON.)

APOLOGIES, in ecclesiastical history, were defences (so the Greek word means) of Christianity, presented to heathen emperors, by the Christian fathers, who were therefore called Apologists. The first was presented to the emperor Adrian, by Quadratus, A. D. 126, a fragment of which is preserved by Eusebius; but another, presented soon after to the same, by Aristides, a converted Athenian philosopher, is totally lost. Justin Martyr wrote two apologies; the latter (to the Roman senate) is imperfect at the beginning; but the former, addressed to Antoninus Pius, is preserved entire, and was published in English, in 1709, by the Rev. W. Reeves, together with one by Tertullian, the Octavins (a dialogue) of Minucius Felix, and the Commentary of Vincentius Lirinensis, with notes and preliminary dissertations to each, in two volumes, octavo. The Apologies are curious and valuable remains of antiquity, as showing what were the objections of the heathens, and the manner in which they were rebutted by the early Christians.—Watson.

APOSTASY, is a forsaking or renouncing our religion, either by an open declaration in words, or a virtual declaration of it by our actions. The primitive Christian church distinguished several kinds of apostasy; the first, of those who went entirely from Christianity to Judaism; the second, of those who complied so far with the Jews, as to communicate with them in many of their unlawful practices, without making a formal profession of their religion; thirdly, of those who mingled Judaism and Christianity together; and, fourthly, of those who voluntarily relapsed into paganism. Apostasy may be farther considered as, 1. Original, in which we have all participated. Rom. 3: 23. 2. National, when a kingdom relinquishes the profession of Christianity. 3. Personal, when an individual backslides from God. Heb. 10: 38. 4. Final, when men are given up to judicial hardness of heart, as Judas. The warnings of our Lord against apostasy are frequent, and, beyond conception, fearful. Matt. 10: 28—39. It is hard to tell whether they were most needed in times of sanguinary persecution, or now, in times of seductive peace. (See BACKSLIDING.)—Buck.

APOSTLE; a word derived from the Greek apostello, to delegate, to send forth one as an agent, clothed with authority to act for another. Heb. 3: 1. The term apostle implies, 1. Selection. Acts 1: 24. 9: 15. 2. Commission. 2 Cor. 4: 7. 1 Thess. 2: 4. 3. Qualification. 2 Cor. 12: 12. 4. Mission. Acts 26: 17, 18. 5. Responsibility. 1 Cor. 4: 1—5. 9: 26, 27. 6. Recompense of fidelity. 2 Tim. 4: 7, 8. Hence we may understand why the Epistles of Paul open with the announcement of his apostolical authority. Though sometimes in the New Testament applied to others, and then rendered "messenger," yet the first select ministers of Christ were, by way of eminence, termed apostles, in distinction from evangelists, pastors, and teachers. There were several things essential to their office, such as,

1. That they should have seen the Lord, and been eye and ear witnesses of what they testified to the world. John 15: 27. This is laid down as an essential requisite, in the choice of one that was to succeed Judas. Acts 1: 21, 22. All of them could say, "that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you." 1 John 1: 3. The case of Paul is no exception to this; for, referring to those that saw Christ after his resurrection, he says, "And, last of all, he was seen of me." 1 Cor. 15: 8. And he mentions this upon another occasion, as one of his apostolic qualifications. "Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen the Lord?" 1 Cor. 9: 1. So that his seeing that Just One, and hearing the voice of his mouth, was necessary to his being a witness of what he thus saw and heard Acts 22: 14, 15.

2. They must have been immediately called and chosen to that office by Christ himself. This was the case with every one of them, Matthias not excepted; Luke 6: 13. Gal. 1: 1. for, as he had been previously chosen a disciple of Christ, so the Lord, by determining the lot, declared his choice, and immediately called him to the office of an apostle. Acts 1: 24—26.

3. Infallible inspiration was also necessary to qualify persons for that office. John 16: 13. They had not only to explain the true sense and spirit of the Old Testament, but also to give forth the New Testament revelation to the world, which was to be the unalterable standard of faith and practice in all succeeding generations. Luke 24: 27. Acts 26: 22, 23, and ch. 28: 23. 1 Pet. 1: 25. It was therefore necessary that they should be secured against all mistakes, by the unerring dictates of the Spirit of truth. Accordingly Christ both promised, and actually bestowed upon them, the Holy Spirit, to teach them all things; to bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever he had said unto them; to guide them into all truth, and to show them things to come. John 16: 13, 26. Their doctrine must also be received, not as the word of man, but, as it truly is, the Word of God, 1 Thess. 2: 13 and as that by which we are to distinguish the spirit of truth from the spirit of error. 1 John 4: 6.

4. The power of working miracles was an important apostolical qualification; such as speaking different languages, curing the lame, healing the sick, raising the dead, discerning of spirits, and conferring these gifts on others. Mark 16: 20. Acts 2: 43. 1 Cor. 12: 8—11. These were credentials of their apostolic mission, 2 Cor. 12: 11. by means of which they confirmed their doctrine, at its first publication, gaining credit to it as a revelation from God, who thereby bare witness to them. Heb. 2: 4.

5. To the apostles only belonged the high prerogative of conferring upon others spiritual gifts and miraculous powers. Acts 8. And to all these qualifications must be added,

6. The universality of their mission. Their charge was not, like that of ordinary pastors, restricted to any particular church; but, being the oracles of God to men, they had the care of all the churches. 2 Cor. 11: 28. They had authority to settle their faith and order, as examples to all succeeding churches, to determine all controversies, Acts 16: 4. and to exercise the rod of discipline on all offenders, whether pastors or flock. 1 Cor. 5: 3-6. 2 Cor. 10: 8. and ch. 13: 10. See M'Lean's Illustration of Christ's Commission to his Apostles, p. 8-11.

St. Paul is frequently called the apostle, by way of eminence; and the apostle of the gentiles, because his ministry was chiefly employed for the conversion of the gentiles, as that of St. Peter was for Jews, who is therefore styled the apostle of the circumcision.

The apostles having continued at Jerusalem twelve years after the ascension of Christ, as tradition reports, according to his command determined to disperse themselves in different parts of the world. But what were the particular provinces assigned to each, does not certainly appear from any authentic history. Socrates says, that Thomas took Parthia for his lot; Matthew, Ethiopia; and Bartholomew, India. Eusebius gives the following account: "Thomas, as we learn by tradition, had Parthia for his lot; Andrew, Scythia; John, Asia, who having lived there a long time, died at Ephesus. Peter, as it seems, preached to the dispersed Jews in Pontus and Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia; at length, coming to Rome, he was crucified with his head downward, as he had desired. What need I to speak of St. Paul, who fully preached the Gospel of Christ, from Jerusalem to Illyricum, and at last died a martyr at Rome, in the time of Nero?" From this passage we may conclude, that at the beginning of the fourth century, there were not any certain and well attested accounts of the places, out of Judea, in which several of the apostles of Christ preached; for if there had, Eusebius must have been acquainted with them.

The stories that are told concerning their arrival and exploits among the Gauls, the English, the Spaniards, the Germans, the Americans, the Chinese, the Indians, and the Russians, are too romantic in their nature, and of too recent a date, to be received by an impartial inquirer after truth. These fables were, for the most part, forged after the time of Charlemagne, when most of the Christian churches contended about the antiquity of their origin, with as much vehemence as the Arcadians, Egyptians, and Greeks, disputed formerly about their seniority and precedence.

It appears, however, that all of the apostles did not die by martyrdom. Heraclion, cited by Clemens Alexandrinus, reckons among the apostles who did not suffer martyrdom, Matthew, Thomas, Philip, and Levi, probably meaning Lebbeus.

To the apostles belonged the peculiar and exclusive prerogative of writing doctrinal and preceptive books of authority in the Christian church; and it sufficiently appears that no epistles, or other doctrinal writings, of any person who was of a rank below that of an apostle, were received by Christians, as a part of their rule of faith. With respect to the writings of Mark and Luke, they are reckoned historical, not doctrinal or dogmatical; and Augustine says, that Mark and Luke wrote at a time when their writings might be approved not only by the church, but by apostles still living.—Williams; Watson; Jones.

APOSTLES' CREED. (See CREED.)

APOSTOLIC; apostolical; something that relates to the apostles, or descends from them. Thus we say, the apostolic age, apostolic doctrine, apostolic character, constitutions, traditions, &c.—Buck.

APOSTOLIC CHURCH, in the primitive church, was an appellation given to all such churches as were founded by the apostles; and even to the bishops of those churches, as being the reputed successors of the apostles. These were confined to four, viz. Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In after times, the other churches assumed the same quality, on account, principally, of the conformity of their doctrine with that of the churches which were apostolical by foundation, and because all bishops held themselves successors of the apostles, or acted in their dioceses with the authority of apostles.

The first time the term apostolical is attributed to bishops, as such, is in a letter of Clovis to the council of Orleans, held in 511, though that king does not there expressly denominate them apostolical, but (apostolica sede dignissimi) highly worthy of the apostolical see. In 581, Guntram calls the bishops met at the council of Macon, apostolical pontiffs, apostolici pontifices.

In progress of time, the bishop of Rome, growing in power above the rest, and the three patriarchates, of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, falling into the hands of the Saracens, the title apostolical was restrained to the pope and his church alone; though some of the popes and St. Gregory the Great, not contented to hold the title by this tenure, began, at length, to insist that it belonged to them by another and peculiar right, as being the successors of St. Peter. The country of Rheims, in 1049, declared that the pope was the sole apostolical primate of the universal church. And hence a great number of apostolicals; apostolical see, apostolical nuncio, apostolical notary, apostolical brief, apostolical chamber, apostolical vicar, &c. The only really apostolical church is that, (be it found where it may,) which accords throughout with the divine model prescribed in the New Testament.—Buck.

APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS; a collection of regulations, attributed to the apostles, and supposed to have been collected by St. Clement, whose name they likewise bear. It is the general opinion, however, that they are spurious, and that St. Clement had no hand in them. They appeared first in the fourth century, but have been much changed and corrupted since. There are so many things in them different from, and even contrary to, the genius and design of the New Testament writers, that no wise man would believe, without the most convincing and irresistible proof, that both could come from the same hand.—Grabe's Answer to Whiston; Saurin's Ser. vol. ii. p. 185; Lardner's Cred. vol. iii. p. 11. ch. ult.; Doddridge's Lect. lect. 119.—Buck.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS; an appellation usually given to the Christian writers of the first century, Barnabas, Hermas, Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Of these writers, Coletorius, and after him Le Clerc, have published a collection, in two volumes, accompanied both with their own annotations, and the remarks of other learned men. See also the genuine epistles of the apostolic fathers, by archbishop Wake, and in the Apocryphal New Testament.—Buck.

APOSTOLICS; this name has been given to different persons and sects, who have attempted, or, at least, professed, to imitate the zeal of the apostles.—Williams.

APOSTOOLIANS; a small party of Mennonites, the followers of one of their ministers, Samuel Apostool, of Amsterdam, in the seventeenth century. They appear to have been Calvinists and Millenarians in sentiment, and strict in their terms of communion. (See GALILEISTS and MENNONITES.)—Mosheim's Ecl. Hist. vol. v. pp. 496-7.—Williams.

APOTACTICS, or ΑΠΟΤΑΚΤΙΒΕ; the first and purest sect of the Apostolics, who stand charged with no heresy, but with imitating the manners of the first age in austerity, and particularly, in renouncing all worldly possessions, and having all things in common. They were of the second century, and chiefly in Cilicia and Pauphyllia.—Ency. Britannica.

APPAREL. (See HABIT, RAIMENT, ADORNING.)

APPEAL; a legal term, denoting a request for the transfer of a cause from one judge to another, or from an inferior to a superior tribunal. The Senpronian law secured this privilege to the Roman citizens, that they could not be capitally convicted, but by the suffrage of the people; and in whatever provinces they happened to reside, if the governor showed a disposition to condemn them to death, to scourge, or deprive them of their property, they had liberty to appeal from his jurisdiction, to the judgment of the people. This law, which was enacted under the republican form of government, continued in force under the emperors; so that if any freeman of Rome thought himself ill used and aggrieved by the presidents, in any of the provinces, he could, by appeal, remove his cause to Rome, to the determination of the emperor. A number of persons, we are told, were delegated by Augustus, all of consular rank, to receive the appeals of the people in the provinces. Thus Paul, (Acts 25: 11, 12.) when he found that Festus was too much inclined to favor the pre-judged populace of Judea, to do full justice to his cause, or deliver him from the lawless fury of his enemies, stood upon his rights as a Roman citizen, and said, I appeal unto Caesar. So, if at any time unjustly condemned on earth, it is consoling to reflect that we can appeal with confidence of redress, to the judgment seat of Christ. Rom. 14: 10. 1 Cor. 4: 3—5. 2 Thess. 1: 6—10. But if condemned there, by Eternal Justice, where can we appeal? 1 Pet. 4: 18.

APPETITES; properly, those keen sensations of bodily want, which, without reference to any specific object, arise from the constitution of our nature, and prompt mankind, by some means, to seek supply or relief. There is a material difference between the appetites and the passions. The passions have no existence, till a proper object is presented; whereas, the appetites exist first, and then are directed to an object. A passion comes after its object; an appetite goes before it, as is obvious in the appetites of hunger, thirst, and the like. A man has an appetite for food in general; he has a passion for some particular kind of food.

Though the appetites, properly speaking, belong to the body, yet the word is sometimes, by a beautiful analogy, transferred from the animal inclinations and impulses, to the affections of the mind. But, in such cases, it always denotes some strong general affection. Thus we speak of an appetite for knowledge, for fame, for conquest, for riches; these being general objects, comprehending many particulars. But when we speak of an attachment to a particular book, friend, and so on, we call it a passion. But we rarely apply either of these terms, except to very urgent and impatient desires. It is to desires of this strong, irrepresible, and even painful character, that our Savior refers in that beautiful passage, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled." Matt. 5: 6. See also many other places, as John 4: 14. 7: 37. Rev. 22: 17.

Our appetites and passions were given us for our preservation, protection, and improvement; and also for the continuance of the human race. Giving scope to them for these purposes only, is free from guilt. But all excess, as well as all perversion of them from these objects, is evidently sinful, and that according to the degree in which it is indulged. Therefore, says the apostle, "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection," &c. 1 Cor. 9: 27.—Lord Kaines; Oliver.

APPII FORUM; a place about fifty miles from Rome, near the modern town of Piperno, on the road to Naples. It probably had its name from the statue of Appius Claudius, a Roman consul, who paved the famous way from Rome to Capua, and whose statue was set up here. To this place some Christians from Rome came to meet St. Paul. Acts 28: 15.—Watson.

APPLETON, (NATHANIEL, D. D. ; ) minister of Cambridge, Massachusetts, was born at Ipswich, December 9, 1693. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1712. After completing his education, an opportunity presented of entering into commercial business, on very advantageous terms, with an uncle in Boston, who was an opulent merchant; but he resolved to forego every worldly advantage, that he might promote the interest of the Redeemer's kingdom. Soon after he began to preach, he was invited to succeed Mr. Brattle in the ministry at Cambridge, and was ordained October 9, 1717. After a ministry of more than sixty-six years, he died February 9, 1784, in the ninety-first year of his age. This country can furnish few instances of more useful talents, and more exemplary piety, exhibited for so long a time, and with such great success. During his ministry, seven hundred and eighty-four persons were admitted members of the church.

In controversial and difficult cases, he was often applied to for advice at ecclesiastical councils. Impartial yet pacific, firm yet conciliatory, he was peculiarly qualified for a counsellor, and in that character he materially contributed to the unity, the peace, and order of the churches. With the wisdom of the serpent, he happily united the innocence of the dove. In his religious principles, he was a Calvinist, as were all his predecessors in the ministry, Hooker, Stone, Shepard, Mitchel, Oakes, Gookin, and Brattle. But towards those of different principles, he was candid and catholic.

His own example enforced the duties which he enjoined upon others. He was humble, meek, and benevolent. He was ready, at all times, to relieve the distressed, and through life he devoted a tenth part of his whole income to pious and charitable uses. He was ever a firm friend to the civil and religious liberties of mankind, and was happy in living to see the establishment of peace and independence in his native land. He deserves honorable remembrance, for his exertions to send the Gospel to the Indians. Under his many heavy trials, he was submissive and patient. When his infirmities had, in a great measure, terminated his usefulness, he expressed his desire to depart and be with Christ. He at length calmly resigned his spirit into the hands of its Redeemer. His publications consist only of sermons.—Allen's Biog. Dct.

APPLETON, (JESSE, D. D. ; ) the second president of Bowdoin college, was born at New Ipswich, in the state of New Hampshire, November 17, 1772. President Appleton was graduated at Dartmouth college, in 1792. It was during his residence at that seminary, that he experienced deep religious impressions; yet of any precise period, when his heart was regenerated by the Spirit of God, he was not accustomed to speak. The only safe evidence of piety, he believed, was "the perception in himself of those qualities, which the Gospel requires." Having spent two years in the instruction of youth, at Dover and Amherst, he studied theology under Dr. Lathrop, of West Springfield. In February, 1797, he was ordained as the pastor of a church at Hampton, New Hampshire. His religious sentiments, at this period, were Arminian. Much of his time, during his ten years' residence in that town, was devoted to systematic, earnest study, in consequence of which, his sentiments assumed a new form. By his faithful, affectionate services, he was very much endeared to his people. At his suggestion, the Piscataqua Evangelical Magazine was published, to which he contributed valuable essays, with the signature of Leighton. Such was his public estimation, that, in 1803, he was one of the two principal candidates for the professorship of theology at Harvard college; but Dr. Ware was elected. In 1807, he was chosen president of Bowdoin college, into which office he was inducted December 23. After the toils of ten years in this station, his health became much impaired, in consequence of a severe cold, in October, 1817. In May, 1819, his illness became more alarming, his complaints being a cough, hoarseness, and debility. A journey proved of no essential benefit. A profuse hemorrhage, in October, extinguished all hope of recovery. As the day of his dissolution approached, he remarked, "Of this I am sure, that salvation is all of grace. I would make no mention of any thing, which I have ever thought, or said, or done; but only of this, that God so loved the world, as to give his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him, should not perish, but have everlasting life. The atonement is the only ground of hope." In health, he was sometimes anxious, in a high degree, in regard to the college; but in his sickness he said, in cheerful confidence, "God has taken care of the college, and God will take care of it." Among his last expressions, were heard the words, "Glory to God in the highest: the whole earth shall be filled with his glory." He died November 12, 1819, at the age of forty-seven, having been president nearly twelve years.

In 1820, a volume of his addresses was published, containing his inaugural address and eleven annual addresses, with a sketch of his character, by Rev. Dr. Nichols, of Portland. In 1822, his lectures and occasional sermons were published, in one volume, with a memoir of his life, by Rev. Benjamin Tappan, of Augusta. The subjects of these lectures, twenty-seven in number, are the necessity of revelation, human depravity, the atonement, regeneration, the eternity of future punishment, the resurrection of the body, and the demoniacs of the New Testament.

The sermons are on the immortality of the soul, the influence of religion on the condition of man, the evils of war and the probability of universal peace, the truth of Christianity from its moral effects, conscience, and consequences of neglecting the great salvation.—Allen.

APPLE-TREE; Prov. 25: 11. Cant. 2: 3, 5. 7: 8. 8: 5. Joel 1: 12. As the best apples of Egypt, though ordinary, are brought thither by sea from Rhodes, and by land from Damascus, we may believe that Judea, an intermediate country between Egypt and Damascus, has none that are of any value. Can it be imagined, then, that the apples of which the prophet Joel speaks, 1: 12., and which he mentions among the things that gave joy to the inhabitants of Judea, were those that we call by that name? Our translators must surely have been mistaken here, since the apples which the inhabitants of Judea eat at this day are of foreign growth, and at the same time but very indifferent.

There are five places, besides this in Joel, in which the word occurs; and from them we learn that it was thought the noblest of the trees of the wood, and that its fruit was very sweet or pleasant, Cant. 2: 3.; of the color of gold, Prov. 25: 11.; extremely fragrant, Cant. 7: 8.; and proper for those to smell that were ready to faint, Cant. 2: 5. We may be sure that the taphnach was very early known in the holy land, as it is mentioned in the book of Joshua as giving name to a city of Manasseh and one of Judah. Several interpreters and critics render Levit. 23: 40. branches of fruit, of the beautiful tree; and understand it of the citron; and it is known that the Jews still make use of the fruit of this tree at their yearly feast of tabernacles.

Citron-trees are very noble, being large, their leaves beautiful, ever continuing on the trees, of an exquisite smell, and affording a most delightful shade. It might well, therefore, be said, "As the citron-tree is among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons." This is a delicate compliment, comparing the fine appearance of the prince, amid his escort, to the superior beauty with which the citron-tree appears among the ordinary trees of the forest; and the compliment is heightened by an allusion to the refreshing shade and the exhilarating fruit.

The exhilarating effects of the fruit are mentioned Cant. 2: 5, "Comfort me with citrons." Egmont and Heyman tell us of an Arabian who was in a great measure brought to himself, when overcome with wine, by the help of citrons and coffee.

To the manner of serving up these citrons in his court, Solomon seems to refer, when he says, "A word fitly spoken is like golden citrons in silver baskets:" whether, as Maimonides supposes, in baskets wrought with open work, or in salvers curiously chased, it nothing concerns us to determine; the meaning is, that an excellent saying, suitably expressed, is as the most acceptable gift in the fairest conveyance. So the rabbins say, that the tribute of the first ripe fruits was carried to the temple in silver baskets. — Watson.

APPLICATION, is used for the act whereby our Savior transfers or makes over to us what he had earned or purchased by his holy life and death. Accordingly it is by this application of the merits of Christ that we are to be justified and entitled to grace and glory.

Application is also used for that part of a sermon in which the preacher brings home or applies the truth of religion to the consciences of his hearers. (See SERMON.) — Buck.

APPREHEND; in the language of Scripture, this word is peculiarly significant. Paul the apostle best explains it, when he saith, "I follow after, if that I may apprehend that, for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus." Phil. 3: 12. That is, that by faith, I may be enabled to lay hold of heavenly glory, as the Lord by grace hath laid hold of me, to prepare me for it.

APPROBATION; a state or disposition of the mind, wherein we put a value upon, or become pleased with some person or thing. Moralists are divided on the principle of approbation, or the motive which determines us to approve or disapprove. The Epicureans will have it to be only self-interest; according to them, that which determines any agent to approve his own action, is its apparent tendency to his private happiness; and even the approbation of another's action flows from no other cause but an opinion of its tendency to the happiness of the approver, either immediately or remotely. Others resolve approbation into a moral sense, or a principle of benevolence, by which we are determined to approve every kind affection, either in ourselves or others, and all publicly useful actions which we imagine to flow from such affections, without any view therein to our own private happiness.

But may we not add, that a true Christian's approbation arises from his perception of the will of God? (See OBLIGATION.) — Buck.

APPROPRIATION; the annexing a benefice to the proper and perpetual use of some religious house. It is a term also often used in the religious world as referring to that act of the mind by which we apply the blessings of the Gospel to ourselves. This appropriation is real when we are enabled to believe in, feel, and obey the truth; but merely nominal and dehesive when there are no fruits of righteousness and true holiness. (See ASSURANCE.) — Buck.

APRIES; a king of Egypt, called in the sacred writings Pharaoh Hophrah, Jer. 44: 30. Apries was the son of Psammis, and grandson of Necho, or Necho, who waged war against Josiah, king of the Jews. He reigned twenty-five years, and was long considered as one of the happiest princes in the world; but having equipped a fleet for the reduction of the Cyrenians, he lost in this expedition almost the whole of his army. The Egyptians resolved to make him responsible for this ill success, rebelled, and pretended that he undertook the war only to get rid of his subjects, and that he might govern the remainder more absolutely. Apries deputed Amasis, one of his officers, to suppress the rebellion, and induce the people to return to their allegiance. But, while Amasis was haranguing them, one of the multitude placed a diadem about his helmet, and proclaimed him king. The rest applauded him; and Amasis, having accepted their offer, continued with them, and confirmed them in their rebellion. Amasis put himself at the head of the rebels, and marched against Apries, whom he defeated and took prisoner. Amasis treated him with kindness; but the people were not satisfied till they had taken him from Amasis and strangled him. Such was the end of Apries, according to Herodotus. Jeremiah threatened this prince with being delivered into the hands of his enemies, as he had delivered Zedekiah, king of Judah, into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon.

Apries had made a league with Zedekiah, and promised him assistance. Ezek. 17: 15. Zedekiah, therefore, relying on his forces, revolted from Nebuchadnezzar, in the year of the world 3414, and before Jesus Christ 590. Early in the year following, Nebuchadnezzar marched against Zedekiah; but as other nations of Syria had shaken off their obedience, he first reduced them to their duty, and towards the end of the year besieged Jerusalem. 2 Kings 25: 5. 2 Chron. 36: 17. Jer. 39: 1.; 52: 4. Zedekiah defended himself in Jerusalem, long and obstinately, that he might give time to Pharaoh Hophrah, or Apries, to come to his assistance. Apries advanced with a powerful army, and the king of Babylon raised the siege, and marched to meet him. But Apries, not daring to hazard a battle against the Chaldeans, retreated into Egypt, and abandoned Zedekiah. Ezekiel reproaches Egypt severely with this baseness, and says that it had been a staff of reed to the house of Israel, and an occasion of falling; for when they took hold of it by the hand, it broke and rent all their shoulder. He therefore prophesies that Egypt should be reduced to a solitude, and that God would send against it the sword, which would destroy in it man and beast. Ezek. 29: This was afterwards accomplished; first, in the time of Apries; and secondly, in the conquest of Egypt by the Persians. — Watson.

AQUARIANS; water-drinkers, a branch of the Encratites, who carried their aversion to wine so far, that they substituted water in the holy communion, though some refused it only in their morning communions. It is well known that the ancient Christians mingled water with their wine for sacred use, partly, perhaps, from economy, and partly from sobriety; but Cyrian gives a mystical reason—because the wine and water represents Christ and his people united. (See ENCRATITES.) — Heckford's Account of all Religions, p. 375; Williams.

AQUATICS; an ancient sect, who, according to Augustine, maintained water to be uncreated and eternal; probably adopting the philosophical system of Thales—that water was the first principle of all things. — Augustine, cent. ii. cap. 75; Stockman's Lexicon; Williams.

AQUILA; this person was a native of Pontus in Asia Minor, and was converted by St. Paul, together with his wife Priscilla, to the Christian religion. As Aquila was by trade a tent-maker, Acts 18: 2, 3. as St. Paul was, the apostle lodged and wrought with him at Corinth. Aquila came thither, not long before, from Italy, being obliged to leave Rome upon the edict which the emperor Claudius had published, banishing the Jews from that city. St. Paul afterwards quitted Aquila's house, and abode with Justus, near the Jewish synagogue at Corinth; probably, as Calmet thinks, because Aquila was a converted Jew, and Justus was convert from paganism, that in this case the Gentiles might come and hear him with more liberty. When the apostle left Corinth, Aquila and Priscilla accompanied him as far as Ephesus, where he left them with that church while he pursued his journey to Jerusalem. They rendered him great service in that city, so far as to expose their own lives to preserve his. They had returned to Rome when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, i6: 4, wherein he salutes them with great kindness. Lastly, they were come back to Ephesus again, when St. Paul wrote his second Epistle to Timothy, 4: 19, wherein he desires him to salute them in his name. What became of them after this time is not known.

AQUINAS, (THOMAS;) a celebrated theologian, to whom the hyperbolic admiration of the dark ages gave the sounding titles of the angelical doctor, the fifth doctor of the church, the eagle of divines, and the angel of the schools. He was descended from the counts of Aquino, in Calabria, born in 1224, and educated at the university of Naples. At the age of seventeen he entered into the Dominican order, contrary to the wishes of his mother; and when only twenty-four, he taught dialectics, philosophy, and theology in the university of Paris, with great applause. After having lectured on divinity in several universities, he settled at Naples, the archbishopric of which city he refused. He died in 1274, and was canonized in 1323. The Roman Catholic Church considers his writings as of high authority; and they gave rise to a sect which bore the name of Thomists. His great seventeen volumes; the most celebrated of them is the Summa Theologicæ.—Davenport.

AR; the capital city of the Moabites, situated in the hills on the south of the river Arnon. This city was likewise called Rabbah, or Rabbath Moab, to distinguish it from the Ammonite Rabbah. It was afterwards called by the Greeks Areopolis; and is at present termed El-Rabba. (See MOAB.)—Watson.

ARABIA; a vast country of Asia, extending one thousand five hundred miles from north to south, and one thousand two hundred from east to west; containing a surface equal to four times that of France. The near approach of the Euphrates to the Mediterranean constitutes it a peninsula, the largest in the world. It is called Jezirat-el-Arab by the Arabs; and by the Persians and Turks, Arabistan. This is one of the most interesting countries on the face of the earth. It has, in agreement with prophecy, never been subdued; and its inhabitants, at once pastoral, commercial, and warlike, are the same wild, wandering people as the immediate descendants of their great ancestor Ishmael are represented to have been.

Arabia, or at least the eastern and northern parts of it, were first peopled by some of the numerous families of Cush, who appear to have extended themselves, or to have given their name, as the land of Cush, or Asiatic Ethiopia, to all the country from the Indus on the east, to the borders of Egypt on the west, and from Armenia on the north to Arabia Deserta on the south. By these Cushites, whose first plantations were on both sides of the Euphrates and gulf of Persia, and who were the first that traversed the desert of Arabia, the earliest commercial communications were established between the east and the west. But of their Arabian territory, and of the occupation dependent on it, they were deprived by the sons of Abraham, Ishmael and Midian; by whom they were obliterated in this country as a distinct race, either by superiority of numbers after mingling with them, or by obliging them to recede altogether to their more eastern possessions, or over the gulf of Arabia into Africa. From this time, that is, about five hundred and fifty years after the flood, we read only of Ishmaelites and Midianites as the shepherds and carriers of the deserts; who also appear to have been intermingled, and to have shared both the territory and the traffic, as the traders who bought Joseph are called by both names, and the same are probably referred to by Jeremiah, 25: as "the mingled people that dwell in the desert." But Ishmael maintained the superiority, and succeeded in giving his name to the whole people.

Arabia, it is well known, is divided by geographers into three separate regions, called Arabia Petræa, Arabia Deserta, and Arabia Felix.

The first, or Arabia Petræa, is the north-western division, and is bounded on the north by Palestine and the Dead sea, on the east by Arabia Deserta, on the south by Arabia Felix, and on the west by the Heropolitan branch of the Red sea and the isthmus of Suez. The greater part of this division was more exclusively the possession of the Midianites, or land of Midian; where Moses, having fled from Egypt, married the daughter of Jethro, and spent forty years keeping the flocks of his father-in-law: no humiliating occupation in those days, and particularly in Midian, which was a land of shepherds; the whole people having no other way of life than that of rearing and tending their flocks, or in carrying the goods they received from the east and south into Phœnicia and Egypt. The word flock, used here, must not convey the idea naturally entertained in our own country of sheep only, but, together with these, of goats, horned cattle and camels, the most indispensable of animals to the Midianite. It was a mixed flock of this kind which was the sole care of Moses, during a third part of his long life; in which he must have had abundance of leisure, by night and by day, to reflect on the unhappy condition of his own people, still enduring all the rigors of slavery in Egypt. It was a similar flock also which the daughters of Jethro were watering when first encountered by Moses; a trifling event in itself, but important in the history of the future leader of the Jews; and showing, at the same time, the simple life of the people amongst whom he was newly come, as well as the scanty supply of water in their country, and the strifes frequently occasioned in obtaining a share of it. Through a considerable part of this region, the Israelites wandered after they had escaped from Egypt; and in it were situated the mountains Horeb and Sinai. Besides the tribes of Midian, which gradually became blended with those of Ishmael, this was the country of the Edomites, the Amalekites, and the Nabathæi, the only tribe of pure Ishmaelites within its precincts. But all those families have long since been confounded under the general name of Arabs. The greater part of this district consists of naked rocks and sandy and flinty plains; but it contained also some fertile spots, particularly in the peninsula of mount Sinai, and through the long range of mount Seir.

The second region, or Arabia Deserta, is bounded on the north and north-east by the Euphrates, on the east by a ridge of mountains which separates it from Chaldaea, on the south by Arabia Felix, and on the west by Syria, Judea, and Arabia Petræa. This was more particularly the country first of the Cushites, and afterwards of the Ishmaelites; as it is still of their descendants, the modern Bedouins, who maintain the same predatory and wandering habits. It consists almost entirely of one vast and lonesome wilderness, a boundless level of sand, whose dry and burning surface denies existence to all but the Arab and his camel. Yet, widely scattered over this dreary waste, some spots of comparative fertility are to be found, where, spread around a feeble spring of brackish water, a stunted verdure, or a few palm trees, fix the principal settlement of a tribe, and afford stages of refreshment in these otherwise impassable deserts. Here, with a few dates, the milk of his faithful camel, and perhaps a little corn, brought by painful journeys from distant regions, or plundered from a passing caravan, the Arab supports a hard existence, until the failure of his resources impels him to seek another oasis, or the scanty herbage furnished on a patch of soil by transient rains; or else, which is frequently the case, to resort, by more distant migration, to the banks of the Euphrates; or, by hostile inroads on the neighboring countries, to supply those wants which the recesses of the desert have denied. The numbers leading this wandering and precarious mode of life are incredible. From these deserts, Zerah drew his army of a million of men; and the same deserts, fifteen hundred years after, poured forth the countless swarms which, under Mahomet and his successors, devastated half of the then known world.

The third region, or Arabia Felix, so denominated from the happier condition of its soil and climate, occupies the southern part of the Arabian peninsula. It is bounded on the north by the two other divisions of the country; on the south and south-east by the Indian ocean; on the east by a part of the same ocean and the Persian gulf; and on the west by the Red sea. This division is subdivided into the kingdoms or provinces of Yemen, at the southern extremity of the peninsula; Hejaz, on the north of the former, and towards the Red sea; Nejed, in the central region; and Hadramant and Omfan, on the shores of the Indian ocean. The four latter subdivisions partake of much of the character of the other greater divisions of the country, though of a more varied surface, and with a larger portion capable of cultivation. But Yemen seems to belong to another country and climate. It is very mountainous, is well watered with rains and springs, and is blessed with an abundant produce in corn and fruits, and especially in coffee, of which vast quantities are exported. In this division were the ancient cities of Nysa, Musa or Moosa, and Aden. This is also supposed to have been the country of the queen of Sheba. In Hejaz are the celebrated cities of Mecca and Medina.

Arabia Felix is inhabited by a people who claim Joktan for their father, and so trace their descent direct from Shem, instead of Abraham and Ham. They are indeed a totally different people from those inhabiting the other quarters, and pride themselves on being the only pure and unmixed Arabs. Instead of being shepherds and robbers, they are fixed in towns and cities, and live by agriculture and commerce, chiefly maritime. Here were the people who were found by the Greeks of Egypt enjoying an entire monopoly of the trade with the east, and possessing a high degree of wealth and consequent refinement. It was here, in the ports of Sabæa, that the spices, muslins, and precious stones of India, were for many ages obtained by the Greek traders of Egypt, before they had acquired skill or courage sufficient to pass the straits of the Red sea; which were long considered by the nations of Europe to be the produce of Arabia itself. These articles, before the invention of shipping, or the establishment of a maritime intercourse, were conveyed across the deserts by the Cushite, Ishmaelite, and Midianite carriers. It was the produce partly of India, and partly of Arabia, which the travelling merchants, to whom Joseph was sold, were carrying into Egypt. The balm and myrrh were probably Arabian, as they are still the produce of the same country; but the spicery was undoubtedly brought farther from the east. These circumstances are adverted to, to show how extensive was the communication, in which the Arabians formed the principal link; and that in the earliest ages of which we have any account, in those of Joseph, of Moses, of Isaiah, and of Ezekiel, "the mingled people" inhabiting the vast Arabian deserts, the Cushites, Ishmaelites, and Midianites, were the chief agents in that commercial intercourse which has, from the most remote period of antiquity, subsisted between the extreme east and west. And although the current of trade is now turned, caravans of merchants, the descendants of these people, may still be found traversing the same deserts, conveying the same articles, and in the same manner as described by Moses!

The singular and important fact that Arabia has never been conquered, has already been cursorily adverted to. But Mr. Gibbon, unwilling to pass by an opportunity of cavilling at Revelation, says, "The perpetual independence of the Arabs has been a theme of praise among strangers and natives; and the arts of controversy transform this singular event into a prophecy and a miracle in favor of the posterity of Ishmael. Some exceptions, that can neither be dissembled nor eluded, render this mode of reasoning as indiscreet as it is superfluous. The kingdom of Yemen has been successively subdued by the Abyssinians, the Persians, the sultans of Egypt, and the Turks; the holy cities of Mecca and Medina have repeatedly bowed under a Scythian tyrant; and the Roman province of Arabia embraced the peculiar wilderness in which Ishmael and his sons must have pitched their tents in the face of their brethren." But this learned writer has, with a peculiar infelicity, annulled his own argument; and we have only to follow on the above passage, to obtain a complete refutation of the unworthy position with which it begins: "Yet these exceptions," says Mr. Gibbon, "are temporary or local; the body of the nation has escaped the yoke of the most powerful monarchies: the arms of Sesostris and Cyrus, of Pompey and Trajan, could never achieve the conquest of Arabia; the present sovereign of the Turks may exercise a shadow of jurisdiction, but his pride is reduced to solicit the friendship of a people whom it is dangerous to provoke, and fruitless to attack. The obvious causes of their freedom are inscribed on the character and country of the Arabs. Many ages before Mahomet, their intrepid valor had been severely felt by their neighbors, in offensive and defensive war. The patient and active virtues of a soldier are insensibly nursed in the habits and discipline of a pastoral life. The care of the sheep and camels is abandoned to the women of the tribe; but the martial youth, under the banner of the emir, is ever on horseback and in the field, to practise the exercise of the bow, the javelin, and the scimitar. The long memory of their independence is the firmest pledge of its perpetuity; and succeeding generations are animated to prove their descent, and to maintain their inheritance. Their domestic feuds are suspended on the approach of a common enemy; and in their last hostilities against the Turks, the caravan of Mecca was attacked and pillaged by fourscore thousand of the confederates. When they advance to battle, the hope of victory is in the front, in the rear the assurance of a retreat. Their horses and camels, who in eight or ten days can perform a march of four or five hundred miles, disappear before the conqueror; the secret waters of the desert elude his search; and his victorious troops are consumed with thirst, hunger, and fatigue, in the pursuit of an invisible foe, who scorns his efforts, and safely reposes in the heart of the burning solitude. The arms and deserts of the Bedouins are not only the safeguards of their own freedom, but the barriers also of the happy Arabia, whose inhabitants, remote from war, are enervated by the luxury of the soil and climate. The legions of Augustus melted away in disease and lassitude; and it is only by a naval power that the reduction of Yemen has been successfully attempted. When Mahomet erected his holy standard, that kingdom was a province of the Persian empire; yet seven princes of the Homerites still reigned in the mountains; and the viceroy of Chosroes was tempted to forget his distant country and his unfortunate master."

Yemen was the only Arabian province which had the appearance of submitting to a foreign yoke; but even here, as Mr. Gibbon himself acknowledges, seven of the native princes remained unsubdued: and even admitting its subjugation to have been complete, the perpetual independence of the Ishmaelites remains unimpeached. For this is not their country. Petrea, the capital of the Stony Arabia, and the principal settlement of the Nabathæi, it is true, was long in the hands of the Persians and Romans; but this never made them masters of the country. Hovering troops of Arabs confined the intruders within their walls, and cut off their supplies; and the possession of this fortress gave as little reason to the Romans to exult as the conquerors of Arabia Petræa, as that of Gibraltar does to us to boast of the conquest of Spain.

The Arabian tribes were confounded by the Greeks and Romans under the indiscriminate appellation of Saracens; a name whose etymology has been variously, but never satisfactorily, explained. This was their general name when Mahomet appeared in the beginning of the seventh century. Their religion at this time was Sabianism, or the worship of the sun, moon, &c.; variously transformed by the different tribes, and intermingled with some Jewish and Christian maxims and traditions. The tribes themselves were generally at variance, from some hereditary and implacable animosities; and their only warfare consisted in desultory skirmishes arising out of these feuds, and in their predatory excursions, where superiority of numbers rendered courage of less value than activity and vigilance. Yet of such materials Mahomet constructed a mighty empire; converted the relaxed Ishmaelites into good Mussulmen; united the jarring tribes under one banner; supplied what was wanting in personal courage by the ardor of religious zeal; and out of a banditti little known and little feared beyond their own deserts, raised an armed multitude which proved the scourge of the world.

Mahomet was born in the year 569, of the noble tribe of the Koreish, and descended, according to eastern historians, in a direct line from Ishmael. His person is represented as beautiful, his manners engaging, and his eloquence powerful; but he was illiterate, like the rest of his countrymen, and indebted to a Jewish or Christian scribe for penning his Koran. Whatever the views of Mahomet might have been in the earlier part of his life, it was not till the fortieth year of his age that he avowed his mission as the apostle of God: when so little credit did he gain for his pretensions, that in the first three years he could only number fourteen converts; and even at the end of ten years, his labors and his friends were alike confined within the walls of Mecca, when the designs of his enemies compelled him to fly to Medina, where he was favorably received by a party of the most considerable inhabitants, who had recently imbibed his doctrines at Mecca. This flight, or Hegira, was made the Mahometan era, from which time is computed, and corresponds with the 16th of July, 622, of the Christian era. Mahomet now found himself sufficiently powerful to throw aside all reserve; declared that he was commanded to compel unbelievers by the sword to receive the faith of one God and his prophet Mahomet; and confirming his credulous followers by the threats of eternal pain on the one hand, and the allurements of a sensual paradise on the other, he had, before his death, which happened in the year 632, gained over the whole of Arabia to his imposture. His death threw a temporary gloom over his cause, and the disunion of his followers threatened its extinction. Any other empire, placed in the same circumstances, would have crumbled to pieces; but the Arabs felt their power; they revered their founder as the chosen prophet of God; and their ardent temperament, animated by a religious enthusiasm, gave an earnest of future success, and encouraged the zeal or the ambition of their leaders. The succession, after some bloodshed, was settled, and unnumbered hordes of barbarians were ready to carry into execution the sanguinary dictates of their prophet, and, with "the Koran, tribute, or death," as their motto, to invade the countries of the infidels. During the whole of the succeeding century, their rapid career was unchecked; the disciplined armies of the Greeks and Romans were unable to stand against them; the Christian churches of Asia and Africa were annihilated; and from India to the Atlantic, through Persia, Arabia, Syria, Palestine, Asia Minor, Egypt, with the whole of northern Africa, Spain, and part of France, the impostor was acknowledged. Constantinople was besieged; Rome itself was plundered; and nothing less than the subjection of the whole Christian world was meditated on the one hand, and tremblingly expected on the other.

All this was wonderful; but the avenging justice of an incensed Deity, and the sure word of prophecy, relieve our astonishment. It was to punish an apostate race, that the Saracen locusts were let loose upon the earth; and the countries which they were permitted to ravage were those in which the pure light of revelation had been most abused. The eastern church was sunk in gross idolatry; vice and wickedness prevailed in their worst forms; and those who still called themselves Christians, trusted more to images, relics, altars, austerities, and pilgrimages, than to a crucified Savior.

About a hundred and eighty years from the foundation of Bagdad, during which period the power of the Saracens had gradually declined, a dreadful re-action took place in the conquered countries. The Persians on the east, and the Greeks on the west, were simultaneously roused from their long thralldom, and, assisted by the Turks, who, issuing from the plains of Tartary, now for the first time made their appearance in the east, extinguished the power of the caliphate, and virtually put an end to the Arabian monarchy in the year 936. A succession of nominal caliphs continued to the year 1258: but the provinces were lost; their power was confined to the walls of their capital; and they were in real subjection to the Turks and the Persians until the above year, when Mostacem, the last of the Abbassides, was dethroned and murdered by Holagou, or Hulaku, the Tartar, the grandson of Zingis. This event, although it terminated the foreign dominion of the Arabians, left their native independence untouched. They were no longer, indeed, the masters of the finest parts of the three great divisions of the ancient world: their work was finished; and returning to the state in which Mahomet found them three centuries before, with the exception of the change in their religion, they remained, and still remain, the unconquered rovers of the desert.

It is not the least singular circumstance in the history of this extraordinary people, that those who, in the enthusiasm of their first successes, were the sworn foes of literature, should become for several ages its exclusive patrons. Almanson, the founder of Bagdad, has the merit of first exciting this spirit, which was encouraged in a still greater degree by his grandson Almamon. This caliph employed his agents in Armenia, Syria, Egypt, and at Constantinople, in collecting the most celebrated works on Grecian science, and had them translated into the Arabic language. Philosophy, astronomy, geometry, and medicine were thus introduced and taught; public schools were established; and learning, which had altogether fled from Europe, found an asylum on the banks of the Tigris. Nor was this spirit confined to the capital: native works began to appear; and by the hands of copyists were multiplied out of number, for the information of the studios, or the pride of the wealthy. The rage for literature extended to Egypt and to Spain. In the former country, the Fatimites collected a library of a hundred thousand manuscripts, beautifully transcribed, and very elegantly bound; and in the latter, the Omniades formed another of six hundred thousand volumes; forty-four of which were employed in the catalogue. Their capital, Cordova, with the towns of Malaga, Almeria, and Murcia, produced three hundred writers; and seventy public libraries were established in the cities of Andalusia. What a change since the days of Omar, when the splendid library of the Ptolemies was wantonly destroyed by the same people! A retribution, though a slight one, was thus made for their former devastations; and many Grecian works, lost in the original, have been recovered in their Arabic dress. Neither was this learning confined to mere parade, though much of it must undoubtedly have been so. Their proficiency in astronomy and geometry is attested by their astronomical tables, and by the accuracy with which, in the plain of Chaldea, a degree of the great circle of the earth was measured. But it was in medicine that, in this dark age, the Arabians shone most: the works of Hippocrates and Galen had been translated and commented on; their physicians were sought after by the princes of Asia and Europe; and the names of Rhazis, Albucaasis, and Avicenna are still revered by the members of the healing art. So little, indeed, did the physicians of Europe in that age know of the history of their own science, that they were astonished, on the revival of learning, to find in the ancient Greek authors those systems for which they thought themselves indebted to the Arabians!

The last remnant of Arabian science was found in Spain; from whence it was expelled in the beginning of the seventeenth century, by the intemperate bigots of that country, who have never had any thing of their own with which to supply its place. The Arabians are the only people who have preserved their descent, their independence, their language, and their manners and customs, from the earliest ages to the present times; and it is amongst them that we are to look for examples of patriarchal life and manners. A very lively sketch of this mode of life is given by Sir R. K. Porter, in the person and tribe of an Arab sheik, whom he encountered in the neighborhood of the Euphrates. "I had met this warrior," says Sir R. K. P., "at the house of the British resident at Bagdad, and came, according to his repeated wish, to see him in a place more consonant with his habits, the tented field; and, as he expressed it, 'at the head of his children.' As soon as we arrived in sight of his camp, we were met by crowds of its inhabitants, who, with a wild and hurrying delight, led us towards the tent of their chief. The venerable old man came forth to the door, attended by his subjects of all sizes and descriptions, and greeted us with a countenance beaming kindness; while his words, which our interpreter explained, were demonstrative of patriarchal welcome. One of my Hindoo troopers spoke Arabic; hence the substance of our succeeding discourse was not lost on each other. Having entered, I sat down by my host; and the whole of the persons present, to far beyond the boundaries of the tent, (the sides of which were open,) seated themselves also, without any regard to those more civilized ceremonies of subjection, the crouching of slaves; or the standing of vassalage. These persons, in rows beyond rows, appeared just as he had described, the offspring of his house, the descendants of his fathers, from age to age; and like brethren, whether holding the highest or the lowest rank, they seemed to gather round their common parent. But perhaps their sense of perfect equality in the mind of their chief could not be more forcibly shown, than in the share they took in the objects which appeared to interest his feelings; and as I looked from the elders or leaders of the people, seated immediately around him, to the circles beyond circles of brilliant faces, bending eagerly towards him and his guest, (all, from the most respectably clad, to those with hardly a garment covering their active limbs, earnest to evince some attention to the stranger he bade welcome,) I thought I had never before seen so complete an assemblage of fine and animated countenances, both old and young; nor could I suppose a better specimen of the still existing state of the true Arab; nor a more lively picture of the scene which must have presented itself, ages ago, in the fields of Haran, when Terah sat in his tent door, surrounded by his sons, and his son's sons, and the people born in his house. The venerable Arabian sheik was also seated on the ground, with a piece of carpet spread under him; and, like his ancient Chaldean ancestor, turned to the one side and the other, graciously answering or questioning the groups around him, with an interest in them all which clearly showed the abiding simplicity of his government, and their obedience. On the smallest computation, such must have been the manners of these people for more than three thousand years; thus, in all things, verifying the prediction given of Ishmael at his birth, that he, in his posterity, should 'be a wild man,' and always continue to be so, though 'he shall dwell forever in the presence of his brethren.' And that an acute and active people, surrounded for ages by polished and luxurious nations, should, from their earliest to their latest times, be still found a wild people, dwelling in the presence of all their brethren, (as we may call these nations,) unsubdued and unchangeable, is, indeed, a standing miracle: one of those mysterious facts which establish the truth of prophecy." But although the manners of the Arabians have remained unaltered through so many ages, and will probably so continue, their religion, as we have seen, has sustained an important change; and must again, in the fulness of time, give place to a faith more worthy of the people.

St. Paul first preached the Gospel in Arabia. Gal. 1: 17. Christian churches were subsequently founded, and many of their tribes embraced Christianity prior to the fifth century; most of which appear to have been tinged with the Nestorian heresy. At this time, however, it does not appear that the Arabians had any version of the Scriptures in their own language, to which some writers attribute the ease with which they were drawn into the Mahometan delusion; while the "Greeks, Syrians, Armenians, Abyssinians, Copts, and others," who enjoyed that privilege, were able to resist it.—Watson.

ARABICI; early in the third century, a sort of minute philosophers, from Arabia, (whence their name,) who conceived that the soul died with the body, and would be raised with it. Origen being called from Egypt to convert them, publicly argued with such remarkable success, (having probably no leader able to contend with him,) that they immediately gave up their peculiar notions, and returned to the bosom of the church.—Mosheim, vol. i. p. 308; Williams.

ARAD; a city in Arabia Petrea, situated to the south of Judah and the land of Canaan. The king of Arad, opposed the progress of the Israelites on their way to the promised land, defeated them, and took from them a considerable booty. But his country in consequence became anathematized; and as soon as they were masters of the land of Canaan, they destroyed all his cities. Numb. 21: 1—3. Arad was afterwards rebuilt, and Eusebius places it in the neighborhood of Kades, at the distance of twenty miles from Hebron. The Israelites, in their journey through the wilderness, having quitted Shapher, came to Arad, which in our translation is called Haradah, and from thence to Makheloth. Numb. 33: 23—25.—Jones.

ARAM; the fifth son of Shem, Gen. 10: 22, was the father of the Syrians, who from him were called Aramæans, or Aramites. There are several countries distinguished by this name in Scripture; as Aram Naharain, or Syria of the two rivers, that is, Mesopotamia; Aram of Damascus; Aram of Soba; Aram of Bethrohob; Aram of Maachah; the meaning of which is, that the cities of Damascus, Soba, Bethrohob, and Maachah, were situated in Syria. Homer and Hesiod call those Aramæans who are called Syrians by the Greeks of more recent times. The prophet Amos intimates that the first Aramæans, or Assyrians, dwelt in the country of Kir in Iberia; and that the Lord brought them from thence as he did the Hebrews out of Egypt, ch. 9: 7; but when that event happened is not known. It must be very ancient, since Moses calls the Syrians and people of Mesopotamia by the name of Aramites. The Syrians often waged war against the Hebrews; but David subdued them and compelled them to pay him tribute. Solomon preserved over them the same authority; but after the secession of the ten tribes, it does not appear that the Syrians were generally subject to the kings of Israel, unless perhaps under Jeroboam the second, who restored the kingdom of Israel to its ancient boundaries. 2 Kings 14: 25.—Jones.

ARAMÆAN LANGUAGE; the vernacular tongue of the Jews of Palestine in the days of our Savior, which maintained itself along with the Greek, much as the German in Pennsylvania, and the Dutch in New York, amidst the prevailing English. (See GREEK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.)

The Shemitish languages, says Professor Robinson, may be properly reduced to three great branches, viz. 1. The Aramæan, which originally prevailed in Syria, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia; and may therefore be subdivided into the Syrian or West-Aramæan, and the Chaldee or East-Aramæan, called also the Babylonish Aramæan. To this general branch belong also the dialects of the Samaritans, Zabrians, and Palmyrenes. 2. The Hebrew, with which the fragments of the Phœnician coincide. 3. The Arabic, under which also belongs the Ethiopic as a dialect.

The Aramæan introduced and spoken in Palestine has also been, and is still, often called the Syro-Chaldaic, because it was probably in some degree a mixture of both the eastern and western dialects; or perhaps the distinction between the two had not yet arisen in the age of Christ and his apostles.

So long as the Jewish nation maintained its political independence in Palestine, the Hebrew continued to be the common language of the country; and so far as we can judge from the remains of it which are still extant, although not entirely pure, it was yet free from any important changes in those elements and forms by which it was distinguished from other languages. But at the period when the Assyrian and Chaldean rulers of Babylon subdued Palestine, every thing assumed another shape. The Jews of Palestine lost, with their political independence, also the independence of their language, which they had till then asserted. The Babylonish-Aramæan dialect supplanted the Hebrew, and became by degrees in Palestine the prevailing language of the people, until this in its turn was in some measure (though not entirely) supplanted by the Greek. The New Testament and Josephus call it the Hebrew. Old as this appellation is, however, it has one important defect, namely, that it is too indefinite, and may mislead those who are unacquainted with the subject to confound the ancient Hebrew and the Aramæan, which took the place of Hebrew after the Babylonish exile. It will probably be most appropriate to bestow on the language of Palestine, in order to distinguish it from other dialects, the simple name of the Palestine-Aramæan, or the Palestine-Syriac: for the terms Aramæan and Syriac are fully identical.

The character and condition of the language called Hebrew, in the age of Christ and his apostles, can thus be determined with certainty; and it is a point of great importance to an interpreter of the New Testament.

1. The proper names of persons which are given in the New Testament and in Josephus, are mostly Aramæan. We need only refer to the frequent names compounded with the Aramæan Bar, (son), as Bar-Talmi, Bar-Jesu, Bar-Timel, Bar-Abba, &c. all of which sufficiently betray their Aramæan origin.

2. The significant surnames, also, which certain persons bore on account of their moral or corporeal character; as, Boanerges, Barabas, Cephas, &c. are Aramæan.

3. The same is also true of most of the significant geographical names; among which the most frequent are those compounded with Beth, Capphon, and En; on which one only needs to consult the index of Rilandi Palestina.—Bib. Repos. 1830.

ARARAT; a mountain of Asia, in Armenia, on which the ark of Noah rested after the cessation of the deluge. Concerning the etymology of the name, Dr. Bryant observes that it is a compound of Ar-Arat, and signifies "the mountain of descent."

Ararat seems to be a part of that vast chain of mountains called Caucasus and Taurus; and upon these mountains, and in the adjacent country, were preserved more authentic accounts of the ark than in almost any other part of the world. The region about Ararat, called Araratia, was esteemed among the ancients as nearly a central part of the earth; and it is certainly as well calculated as any other for the accommodation of its first inhabitants, and for the migration of colonies, upon the increase of mankind. The soil of the country was very fruitful, and especially of that part where the patriarch made his first descent. The country also was very high, though it had fine plains and valleys between the mountains. Such a country, therefore, must, after the flood, have been the soonest exsiccated, and, consequently, the soonest habitable.

The mountain which has still the name of Ararat, has retained it through all ages. Tournefort has particularly described it, and from his account it seems to consist chiefly of free-stone, or calcareous sand-stone. It is a detached mountain in form of a sugar loaf, in the midst of a very extensive plain, consisting of two summits; the lesser, more sharp and pointed; the higher, which is that of the ark, lies north-west of it, and raises its head far above the neighboring mountains, and is covered with perpetual snow. When the air is clear, it does not appear to be above two leagues from Erivan, and may be seen at the distance of four or five days' journey. Its being visible at such a distance, however, is ascribed not so much to its height, as to its lonely situation, in a large plain, and upon the most elevated part of the country. The ascent is difficult and fatiguing. Tournefort attempted it; and, after a whole day's toil, he was obliged by the snow and intense cold, to return without accomplishing his design, though in the middle of summer. On the side of the mountain that looks towards Erivan, is a prodigious precipice, very deep, with perpendicular sides, and of a rough, black appearance, as if tinged with smoke.

The summit of Ararat has never been reached, though several attempts have been made; and if the ark rested on the summit, it is certain that those who have spoken of its fragments being seen there in different ages, must have been imposed upon. It is, however, not necessary to suppose that the ark rested upon either of its tops; and that spot would certainly be chosen which would afford the greatest facility of descent. Sir Robert Ker Porter is among the modern travellers who have given us an account of this celebrated mountain: "As the vale opened beneath us in our descent, my whole attention became absorbed in the view before me. A vast plain peopled with countless villages; the towers and spires of the churches of Eitch-mai-adzen, arising from amidst them; the glittering waters of the Araxes, flowing through the fresh green of the vale; and the subordinate range of mountains, skirting the base of the awful monument of the antediluvian world. It seemed to stand a stupendous link in the history of man, uniting the two races of men before and after the flood. But it was not until we had arrived upon the flat plain, that I beheld Ararat in all its amplitude of grandeur. From the spot on which I stood, it appeared as if the highest mountains of the world had been piled upon each other, to form this one sublime immensity of earth, and rock, and snow. The icy peaks of its double heads rose majestically into the clear and cloudless heavens; the sun blazed bright upon them; and the reflection sent forth a dazzling radiance, equal to other suns. This point of the view united the utmost grandeur of plain and height. But the feelings I experienced while looking on the mountain, are hardly to be described. My eye, not able to rest for any length of time upon the blinding glory of its summits, wandered down the apparently interminable sides, till I could no longer trace their vast lines in the mists of the horizon; when an inexpressible impulse, immediately carrying my eye upwards again, fixed my gaze upon the awful glare of Ararat; and this bewildered sensibility of sight being answered by a similar feeling in the mind, for some moments I was lost in a strange suspension of the powers of thought."

The separate peaks are called Great and Little Ararat, and the space between them is about seven miles. "These inaccessible summits," continues Sir R. K. Porter, "have never been trodden by the foot of man since the days of Noah, if even then; for my idea is, that the ark rested in the space between these heads, and not on the top of either. Various attempts have been made in different ages to ascend these tremendous mountain-pyramids, but in vain: their form, snows, and glaciers, are insurmountable obstacles: the distance being so great from the commencement of the icy region to the highest points, cold alone would be the destruction of any person who should have the hardihood to persevere. On viewing mount Ararat from the northern side of the plain, its two heads are separated by a wide cleft, or rather glea, in the body of the mountain. The rocky side of the greater head runs almost perpendicularly down to the north-east, while the lesser head rises from the sloping bottom of the cleft, in a perfectly conical shape. Both heads are covered with snow. The form of the greater is similar to the less, only broader and rounder at the top, and shows to the north west a broken and abrupt front, opening, about half way down, into a stupendous chasm, deep, rocky, and peculiarly black. At that part of the mountain, the hollow of the chasm receives an interruption from the projection of minor mountains, which start from the sides of Ararat like branches from the root of a tree, and run along, in undulating progression, till lost in the distant vapors of the plain." Dr. Shuckford argues that the true Ararat lies among the mountains of the north of India; but Mr. Faber has answered his reasoning, and proved, by a comparison of geographical notices incidentally mentioned in the Old Testament, that the Ararat of Armenia is the true Ararat.—Watson.

ARAUHAH, 2 Sam. 21: 16—18, or ORNAN, as the same person is called, 1 Chron. 21: 18, was an inhabitant of Jerusalem, at or soon after the time that city went by the name of Jebus, whose threshing floor was situated on mount Zion, the same spot on which the temple of Jerusalem was afterwards built.

ARBELA, or ARBAH-EL, signifies fine countries, countries of God; for which reason, we find many places so named in Palestine. The city Masal, or Misheal, was in the tribe of Asher, near to which were very fine fields, and a place called Arbela. Josh. 19: 26. Eusebius and Jerome mention a city of this name, in the great plain, nine miles from Legio, probably east; and the former writer mentions another belonging to the region of Pella. (See BETH-ARBEL.)

ARBUTHNOT, (JOHN, Dr. ;) was the son of a Scotch Episcopal clergyman, and was born at Arbuthnot, near Montrose, soon after the restoration. Acquainted with Pope, Swift, and the other wits of the age, he took a share in their literary enterprises, and contributed largely to the works of Martinus Scriberius. He died, February, 1735. Swift gave his character in few words—"He has," said he, "more wit than all our race, and his humanity is equal to his wit." Nor is there any thing of the exaggeration of friendship in this praise. Among his various works, part of which are medical, may be named his Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures, which is found in most large English Bibles, at the present time.—Davenport.

ABNEY, (SIR THOMAS;) an eminent magistrate of the city of London, born 1639, died 1722, aged eighty three. He was a man of distinguished piety. In his last sickness, the same serenity and peace, the same humility and religion, which, like a golden thread, ran through his whole course, was beautifully manifest. On inquiries concerning his soul, he always expressed a good hope through grace of a happy eternity. He often mentioned Christ, calling him, "Blessed Redeemer! glorious Redeemer!" with other like expressions. Sir Thomas was the intimate friend of Dr. Isaac Watts, who resided many years in his family, and was the companion of his last moments.

ARCH, (JOHN;) a Cherokee Indian and an interpreter, died at Brainerd, June 8, 1825, aged twenty-seven. When taken sick, he was engaged in translating John's Gospel into Cherokee, using the ingenious alphabet invented by Mr. Guesse. He had been a Christian convert several years; and he died in peace, saying, "God is good, and will do right;" and was buried by the side of Dr. Worcester.—Allen.

ARCH; prefixed to any ecclesiastical office, as archbishop, archdeacon, &c., implies a superior, having others under him; thus, archbishop is a metropolitan bishop, having suffragan bishops under him.—Broughton's Diet; Williams.

ARCHANGEL, according to some, means an angel occupying the eighth rank in the celestial order or hierarchy, which consists, according to the apostles, of thrones, dominions, principalities, and so on. Col. 1: 16. 1 Pet. 3: 22. Eph. 1: 21. The fathers who have interpreted the words of the apostles, are not agreed on the number and order of the celestial hierarchy. Origen was of opinion, that Paul mentioned part only of the choirs of angels, and that there were many others of which he said nothing; and this notion may be observed in many of the subsequent fathers. Others have reckoned up nine choirs of angels. The author who is commonly cited under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, admits but three hierarchies, and three orders of angels in each hierarchy. In the first are seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; in the second, dominions, mights, and powers; in the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. Some of the rabbins reckon four, others ten, orders, and give the different names according to their degrees of power and knowledge; but this rests only on the imagination of those who amuse themselves with speaking very particularly of things of which they know nothing. These titles of rank are probably allusions to the customary order in the courts of the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Persian kings; hence Michael the archangel tells Daniel that he is one of the chief princes in the court of the Almighty.

It has been remarked by a late eloquent writer, in treating of enthusiasm in devotion, that "the utmost distances of the material universe are finite; but the disparity of nature which separates man from his Maker is infinite; nor can the interval be filled up or brought under any process of measurement. Nevertheless, in the view of our feeble conceptions, an apparent measurement, or filling up of the infinite void would take place, and so the idea of immense separation would be painfully enhanced, if distinct vision were obtained of the towering hierarchies of intelligences, at the basement of which the human system is founded. Were it indeed permitted to man to gaze upward from step to step, and from range to range, of the vast edifice of rational existences, and could his eye attain the summit, and there perceive, at an infinite height beyond that highest platform of created beings, the lowest steps of the Eternal throne—what liberty of heart would afterwards be left to him in drawing near to the Father of spirits? How, after such a revelation of the upper world, could the affectionate cheerfulness of earthly worship again take place? Or, how, while contemplating the measured vastness of the interval between heaven and earth, could the dwellers thereon come familiarly, as before, to the throne of prayer, bringing with them the small requests of their petty interests of the present life? If introduction were had to the society of those beings whose wisdom has accumulated during ages which time forgets to number, and who have lived to see, once and again, the mystery of the providence of God complete its cycle, would not the impression of created superiority oppress the spirit, and obstruct its access to the Being whose excellencies are absolute and infinite? Or what would be the feelings of the infirm child of earth, if, when about to present his supplications, he found himself standing in the theatre of heaven, and saw, ranged in a circle under the skies, the congregation of immortals? These spectacles of greatness, if laid open to perception, would present such an interminable perspective of glory, and so set out the immeasurable distance between ourselves and the Supreme Being with a long gradation of splendors, that we should henceforward feel as if thrust down to an extreme remoteness from the divine notice; and it would be hard or impossible to retain, with any comfortable conviction, the belief in the nearness of Him who is revealed as 'a very present help in every time of trouble.' But that our feeble spirits may not thus be overborne, or our faith and confidence baffled and perplexed, the Most High hides from our sight the ministries of his court, and dismissing his train, visits with infinite condescension the lowly abodes of those who fear Him, and dwells as a father in the homes of earth."

Bishop Horsley and others of late have contended that the term archangel is a title belonging to our Lord himself. But the arguments which they employ in support of this opinion, though ingenious, are far from being conclusive.—Calmet; Watson; Nat. Hist. of Enthusiasm.

ARCHBISHOP; the chief or metropolitan bishop, who has several suffragans under him. Archbishops were not known in the east till about the year 320; and though there were some soon after this who had the title, yet that was only a personal honor, by which the bishops of considerable cities were distinguished. It was not till of late that archbishops became metropolitans, and had suffragans under them. The ecclesiastical government of England is divided into two provinces, viz. Canterbury and York. The first archbishop of Canterbury was Austin, appointed by king Ethelbert, on his conversion to Christianity, about the year 598. His grace of Canterbury is the first peer of England, and the next to the royal family, having precedence of all dukes and all great officers of the crown.

It is his privilege, by custom, to crown the kings and queens of the kingdom. The archbishop of York has precedence of all dukes not of the royal blood, and of all officers of the state, except the lord high chancellor. The first archbishop of York was Paulinus, appointed by pope Gregory about the year 622.—Buck.

ARCHDEACON; a priest invested with authority of jurisdiction over the clergy and laity, next to the bishop, either through the whole diocese, or only a part of it. There are sixty in England, who visit every two years in three, when they inquire into the reparations and moveables belonging to churches; reform abuses; suspend; excommunicate; in some places prove wills; and induct all clerks into benefices within their respective jurisdictions.—Buck.

ARCH-PRESBYTER, or ARCH-PRIEST; a priest established in some dioceses with a superiority over the rest. He was anciently chosen out of the college of presbyters, at the pleasure of the bishop. The arch-presbyters were much of the same nature with the deans in cathedral churches.—Buck.

ARCHELAUS; the son of Herod the Great, by Malthea, his fifth wife. Having put to death his sons Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater, and disinherited Antipas, whom at first he had declared king, Herod substituted Archelaus in his room, and gave Antipas the title of tetrarch only, as has been already related under the article ANTIPAS. On the decease of his father, Archelaus succeeded to the kingdom of Judea, and reigned there at the time that Joseph was returning from Egypt with the young child Jesus and his mother. Apprehending that the new king would be as desirous of taking away the life of his child as his father Herod had been, Joseph was afraid to proceed; but being warned of God in a dream, he turned aside into the parts of Galilee, and dwelt in the city of Nazareth. Matt. 2: 22. Archelaus seems to have inherited no inconsiderable portion of the cruel temper of his father. He governed Judea with so much violence that the chief of the Samaritans and Jews impeached him to Augustus, who immediately summoned him to Rome, to answer for his conduct. Upon his arrival there, the emperor ordered his accusers to appear against him, and allowed him to defend himself; but his defence was so little satisfactory to Augustus, that he banished him to Vienne, a city of Gaul, where he continued in exile to the end of his days.—Jones.

ARCHONTES; a branch of the Valentinians, towards the close of the second century, who supposed the world to be created (apo ton archonton) by the higher orders of angels, archontes, or archangels; but the creation of woman they ascribed to evil demons, which seems to indicate they were woman-haters. They supported their principles chiefly by pretended revelations of their own.—Turner's Hist. p. 95; Williams.

ARCHERS; such as shoot with bows, in hunting and battle.—This method of shooting was almost universal in ancient times, before the invention of fire arms. Gen. 21: 20. Jer. 51: 3. The archers that sorely grieved Joseph, and shot at him, were his enemies, particularly his brethren and mistress, who with arrows of false accusation, bitter words, and murderous attempts, sought to destroy him. Gen. 49: 23. The archers of God, that encompassed Job, were afflictions, pains, and terrors, sent by God; and which, like sharp, poisoned arrows, wounded and vexed his soul. Job 16: 13.—Brown.

ARCHINIMUS; a citizen of Carthage, a devout Christian of the fifth century, upon whom all manner of artifices were employed in vain, to make him renounce his faith. At length, Genserich himself, the Arian king of the Vandals, undertook to persuade him. Finding his endeavors ineffectual, he sentenced him to be beheaded; but gave private orders to the executioner, really to perform his office only in case the prisoner seemed intimidated and afraid; "for then," said he, "the crown of martyrdom will be lost to him; but if he seems courageous and willing to die," continued the king, "forbear the stroke, for I do not intend that he shall have the honor of being a martyr." The executioner, on coming to the place appointed, finding Archinimus resolved, and happy in the thought of dying for the sake of Christ, brought him back again unhurt. Soon after this, Archinimus was banished, and never heard of more, though it is conjectured that he was murdered privately, by order of the king, as he thought the glory of dying for the faith publicly, too great a favor.—Fox.

ARCHIPPUS; one of the pastors of the church at Colosse, to whom the apostle Paul, at the close of his Epistle, gave an important exhortation, to "take heed to the ministry which he had received of the Lord, that he fulfilled it." Col. 4: 17.—Jones.

ARCTURUS; the name given to a star of the first magnitude in the northern hemisphere, towards the pole. Astronomers place it at some distance from the great Bear, and between the thighs of Boötes. It rises here about the twelfth of September, and sets about the twenty-fourth of May, and has been thought seldom to appear without bringing a storm. Job adverting to the power of God, saith, "He maketh Arcturus, Orion, and the Pleiades, with the chambers of the south;" ch. 9: 9.; and again, "Canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?" ch. 38: 32. (See the article CONSTELLATION.)

That the course of the stars influenced the seasons, in the opinion of the ancients, is well known; whence Pliny says, (lib. ii. cap. 39.) "Arcturus seldom rises without bringing hail and tempests;" and (lib. xviii. cap. 28.) "the evils which the heavens send us are of two kinds; that is to say, tempests which produce hail, storms, and other like things, which is called Vis Major, and which are caused, as I have often said, by dreadful stars, such as Arcturus, Orion, and the Kids." The ancients, however, were mistaken in this notion, for the stars only marked that time of the year when such things might naturally be expected.—Jones; Calmet.

ARDELY, (JOHN); an English protestant martyr of the reign of queen Mary, who, in company with John Simson, was cited before bishop Bonner to answer to seven articles, under the charge of heresy. Their answers to these articles are recorded at length by Fox, and display admirable discrimination of judgment, and dignity of purpose. Bishop Bonner endeavored to persuade them to recant; but his endeavors were vain. To show that they were not actuated by blind and obstinate fanaticism, they mildly offered to surrender all their property to the queen, if they might be permitted to live under her government in the unmolested enjoyment of a good conscience. But finding this proposition useless, and that a cruel death must be experienced if they would not return to the Romish church, Ardely nobly replied, "If every hair of my head were a man, I would suffer death in the opinion and faith I now profess." On being further urged to conform, he answered, "No, God forbid that I should do so, for then I should lose my soul."

They were accordingly burned to death on one day; Simson at Rochford, and Ardely at Railey, on the 30th of May, 1555.—Fox.

AREOPAGUS; the place, or court, in which the Areopagites, the celebrated and supreme judges of Athens, assembled. It was on an eminence, formerly almost in the middle of the city; but nothing remains by which we can determine its form or construction. This hill is almost entirely a mass of stone; its upper surface is without any considerable irregularities, but neither so level, nor so spacious, as that of the Acropolis, and though of no great height, not easily accessible, its sides being steep and abrupt. On this hill the Amazons pitched their tents, when they invaded Attica, in the time of Theseus; and in after-times, the Persians under Xerxes began from hence their attack on the Acropolis.

The learned are not agreed respecting the number of judges that composed this august court; for some limit them to thirty-one, others to fifty-one, and by some they are extended to five hundred. The truth is, that their number seems not to have been fixed, but to have been more or less, in different years. This tribunal originally consisted of only nine persons, who had all discharged the office of archons, had acquitted themselves with honor in that trust, and after a rigorous examination before the logistæ, had given a satisfactory account of their administration. The Areopagites were judges for life; they never sat in judgment but in the open air, and that only in the night time, that their minds might be less liable to distraction from surrounding objects, and less susceptible of either pity or aversion from extraneous motives. At first, they took cognizance of criminal causes only, but in process of time, their jurisdiction became of great extent.

The Areopagites took cognizance of murders, impieties, and immoralities: they punished vices of all kinds—idleness included; they rewarded or assisted the virtuous: they were peculiarly attentive to blasphemies against the gods, and to the performance of the sacred mysteries. It was, therefore, with the greatest propriety, that Paul was examined before this tribunal. Having preached at Athens against the plurality of gods, and declared, that he came to reveal to the Athenians that God whom they adored without knowing him, the apostle was carried before the Areopagites, as the introducer of new deities, (Acts 17: 19, 22.) where he spoke with so much wisdom, that he converted Dionysius, one of the judges, and was dismissed, without any interference on their part. Our translation, by giving the import of the word Areopagus—"Mars' hill," has lost the correct representation of the passage; since Mars' bill might not be a court of justice; and beside this, the station of Dionysius, as one of the Areopagites, is lost on the reader. (See ATHENS.)—Calmet; Jones.

ARETAS. There were many princes of Arabia of this name, but the only one mentioned in Scripture is he who had only a year before gained possession of Damascus when Paul, who had preached the Gospel there with much zeal, was persecuted by the Jews residing in the city, A. D. 38. Acts 9: 23, 24. 2 Cor. 11: 32, 33. Under Nero, fifteen years after, it appears by the coins that the Romans were again masters of the city. The coincidence of time here is worthy of remark.—Calmet.

ARGOB; the name of a district which lay beyond Jordan, belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh, and in the country of Bashan. It is extremely fertile, and included sixty cities, all of which had very high walls and strong gates, independent of numerous villages and hamlets which were not enclosed. Deut. 3: 4, 14, and 1 Kings 4: 13. But the name was more particularly given to the metropolis of the country, a city which, according to Eusebius, lay fifteen miles west of Gerasa.—Jones.

ARIAL of Moab. There are two Arians of Moab mentioned in Scripture, but they are the same city; the capital of Moab being divided by the river Arnon into two towns. (See AR.)—Calmet.

ARIANS; this ancient, extensive, and important sect was a questionably so called from Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, in the early part of the fourth century. It is said that he aspired to episcopal honors; and after the death of Achilles, in A. D. 313, felt not a little chagrined that Alexander should be preferred before him. Whether this circumstance had any influence on his opinions, it is impossible to say; but one day, when his rival (Alexander) had been addressing the clergy in favor of the orthodox doctrine, and maintaining, in strong and pointed language, "that the Son of God was co-eternal, co-essential, and co-equal with the Father," Arius considered this as a species of Sabellianism, and ventured to say, that it was inconsistent and impossible, since the Father, who beget, must be before the Son, who was begotten: the latter, therefore, could not be absolutely eternal.

Alexander at first admonished Arius, and endeavored to convince him of his error, but without effect, except that he became more bold in contradiction. Some of the clergy thought their bishop too forbearing, and it is possible he felt his inferiority of talent; for Arius was a man of accomplished learning and commanding eloquence, venerable in person, and fascinating in address. At length, Alexander was roused, and attempted to silence Arius by his authority; but this not succeeding, as the latter was bold and pertinacious, about the year 320, Alexander called a council of his clergy, by whom the refuted heretic was deposed and excommunicated.

Arius now retired into Palestine, where his talents and address soon made a number of converts; and among the rest, the celebrated Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, and other bishops and clergy of those parts, who assembled in council, and received the excommunicated presbyter into their communion. Eusebius also, having great interest with Constantia, the sister of Constantine, and wife of Licinius, recommended Arius to her protection and patronage, through which, and by his own eloquent letters to the clergy in various parts, his system spread with great rapidity, and to a vast extent.

The emperor Constantine, who had no great skill in these matters, was grieved to see the Christian church (but just escaped from the red dragon of persecution) thus torn by intestine animosity and dissensions; he therefore determined to summon a general council of the clergy, which met at Nice, in A. D. 325, and contained more than three hundred bishops. Constantine attended in person, and strongly recommended peace and unanimity; and as an example of moderation and forbearance, when both parties presented to him their mutual criminations, he threw them into the fire without reading.

Athanasius was the chief opponent of the Arians. Both parties were willing to subscribe to the language of the Scriptures, but each insisted on interpreting for themselves. The Athanasians attempted to fix their sense on the sacred writers by scholastic terms, to which the Arians agreed, with various evasive exceptions. "Did the Trinitarians (says Mr. Milner) assert that Christ was God?—The Arians allowed it, but in the same sense as holy men and angels are styled gods in Scripture. Did they affirm that he was truly God?—The others allowed that he was made so by God. Did they affirm that the Son was naturally of God?—It was granted; even we, said they, are of God, 'of whom are all things.'" At length the Athanasians collected a number of texts, which they conceived amounted to full proof of the Son being of one and the same substance with the Father; the Arians admitted he was of like substance—the difference in Greek being only in a single letter—the former being homousios, the latter homoiouos.

At length, the former was decreed to be the orthodox faith, and the Nicene creed was formed as it remains at this day, so far as concerns the person of the Son of God, who is said to be "begotten of his Father before all worlds; God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made," &c. Subsequent additions to this creed were made in the fifth and sixth centuries, with which we are not now concerned.—(Burnett, Art. VIII. Ep. Tomline's Elements, vol. ii. p. 218.) To this creed was subjoined an anathema against all that say, "There was a time when the Son of God was not;" which anathema has been long since dropped, perhaps as unnecessary, since the damatory clauses of the Athanasian creed have been introduced.

Arius was now excommunicated as a heretic, and banished to Illyricum, where also he was soon after proscribed, and obliged to flee farther. After three or four years, however, Arius and his followers were recalled, (for what reason, or under what circumstances, historians are not well agreed,) and the emperor insisted on his being received into the communion of the church of Alexandria. That church, however, with Athanasius now at their head, refused to receive him. Upon this, the emperor sent for Arius to Constantinople, and insisted upon his being received into communion, by Alexander, bishop of that city. However, on the day before this was to have taken place, Arius died suddenly from a complaint in his bowels. Some attributed this to poison; others to the prayers of his enemies; but it is at least possible, that it might proceed from a natural cause, with which neither prayer nor poison was connected.

The emperor did not long survive, and Constantius, his successor, was warmly attached to the Arian cause, as were all the court party. Successive emperors took different sides, and thus was the peace of the church agitated for many years, and practical religion sacrificed alternately to the dogmas or the interests of one party or the other; and each was in turn excommunicated, fined, imprisoned, or banished. Constantius supported Arianism most triumphantly. Julian laughed at both parties, but persecuted neither. Jovian supported the Nicene doctrine.

Valentinian, and his brother Valens, took contrary sides; the former supporting Athanasianism in the west, and the latter Arianism in the east; so that what was orthodox at Rome, was heresy at Constantinople, and vice versa. At length, the bishop of Rome assumed the power of infallibility, and fixed the Athanasian doctrine at Rome, while the African and eastern churches, which rejected his authority, supported Arianism, or some of its subdivisions.

The Arians themselves were indeed by no means unanimous, but divided into various shades of sentiment, under their respective leaders; as, Eusebians, Endoxians, Acaicians, Aetians, &c., most of which will be found in this work; but the more general distinction was into Arians and Semi-Arians; the former sinking the character of the Son of God into that of a mere creature, while the latter admitted every thing but the homoian doctrine, or his absolute equality with the Father.

After this period, we hear little of Arianism, till it was revived in the beginning of the last century, by the honest but eccentric Mr. Whiston, Mr. Emyln, and Dr. Samuel Clarke. The latter being what may be called a high, or Semi-Arian, who came within a shade of orthodoxy; the two former, low Arians, reducing the rank of our Savior to the scale of angelic beings—a creature “made out of nothing.” Since this time, however, both Arians and Socinians are supposed to be extinct, or nearly so; being sunk into the common appellation of Unitarians, or rather Humanitarians, who believe the Savior (as Dr. Priestly expresses it) to be “a man like themselves.” The last advocates of the pure Arian doctrine, of any celebrity, were Mr. Henry Taylor (under the signature of Ben Mordecai) and Dr. Richard Price, in his “Sermons on the Christian Doctrine.”

Before we close this article, it may be proper to observe, that the Arians, though they denied the absolute eternity of the Son, strongly contended for his pre-existence, as the Logos, or the Word of God, “by whom the worlds were made,” and admitted, more or less explicitly, the sacrifice which he offered for sin upon the cross. The chief ground on which they opposed the Nicene doctrine is, that Christ himself speaks of the Father in terms of superiority,—“My Father is greater than I.” John 14: 28. “I come in my Father’s name.” “I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God,” &c. John 20: 17. To these were added many other passages in the New Testament, which appeared to ascribe superiority of rank, of wisdom, and of glory, to the Father. How these were accounted for by the Athanasians, will be stated under that article.—Williams; Mosheim’s Ecl. Hist. vol. i. p. 412, and see Milner’s Ch. Hist. vol. ii. chaps. 3 and 4; Evans’s Sketch, p. 100, ed. 1821; R. Adam’s R. W. vol. ii. p. 123, &c.; Jones’s Dict. of Religious Opinions; Dr. Jortin’s Hist. of Arianism.

ARIAS MONTANUS, (BENEDICT;) a Spanish orientalist, born in Estremadura, in 1527, died in 1598. In addition to his thorough knowledge of the oriental and classical languages, he spoke fluently the German, Flemish, French, and Portuguese. Philip II. of Spain, confided to him the editing of the Polyglot Bible, which is known as the Antwerp or royal Bible. Arias was as remarkable for his modesty and disinterestedness, as for his learning; a bishopric was offered him, but he preferred the retirement of his hermitage, and his only bed was a cloak spread upon the bare boards. Among his most esteemed works, is his treatise on Jewish antiquities.

ARIEL, the lion of God, is understood of the city of Jerusalem, in Isaiah 29: 1, 2, 7. and is thought to mean “city of heroes.”

ARIMATHEA, or RAMAH, now called Ramlé, or Ramla; a pleasant town, beautifully situated on the borders of a fertile and extensive plain, abounding in gardens, vineyards, olive and date trees. It stands about thirty miles north-west of Jerusalem, on the high road to Jaffa. At this Rama, which was likewise called Ramathaim Zophim, as lying in the district of Zuph or Zoph, Samuel was born. 1 Samuel 1: This was likewise the native place of Joseph, called Joseph of Arimathea, who begged and obtained the body of Jesus from Pilate. Matt. 26: 57. There was another Ramah, about six miles north of Jerusalem, in a pass which separated the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, which Baasha, king of Israel, took, and began to fortify; but he was obliged to relinquish it, in consequence of the alliance formed between Asa, king of Judah, and Benhadad, king of Syria. 1 Kings 15: This is the Ramah supposed to be alluded to in the lamentation of Rachel for her children.—Watson.

ARISTARCHUS; spoken of by St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Colossians, 4: 10., and often mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. He was a Macedonian, and a native of Thessalonica. He accompanied St. Paul to Ephesus, and there continued with him during the two years of his abode in that place, sharing with him in all the dangers and labors of the ministry. Acts-19: 29. 20: 4. 27: 2. He was near losing his life in a tumult raised by the Ephesian silversmiths. He left Ephesus with the apostle, and went with him into Greece. From thence he attended him into Asia; from Asia into Judea, and from Judea to Rome.—Watson.

ARISTOBULUS, of whom Paul speaks, (Rom. 16: 10.) was, according to the modern Greeks, brother of Barnabas, and one of the seventy disciples; was ordained a bishop by Barnabas, or by Paul, whom he followed in his travels; was sent into Britain, where he labored much, made many converts, and at last died. Mr. Taylor thinks there is good reason for believing that Aristobulus was a Christian minister, who was absent in Britain, with part of the family of Brennus, the British king, at the time when Paul saluted his family. The evidence of the Welsh traders he holds to be clear to this effect; and there seems to be no cause of suspicion, either of the falsity of the assertion, or of any interpolation in these documents: and, certainly, the Greeks and the Britons are witnesses perfectly independent of each other; so that collusion is out of the question. If Aristobulus were ordained by Paul, we see how the Britons might be “disciples of the tent maker,” as they are called by Theodoret, even if Paul never visited Britain in person. (See CHRISTIANITY, History of.)—Calmet.

ARISTOTELIANS; the disciples of Aristotle, a famous Grecian philosopher, who flourished nearly five hundred years before the Christian era. He was the disciple of Plato, and the preceptor of Alexander the Great, by whom he was so highly respected, that he hesitated not to say, that he was under greater obligations to him for his instructions, than to his own father for his being. There is no doubt, but that with his philosophical dogmas, he communicated to his royal pupil many noble sentiments; but, at the same time, he set before him models of heroism, from his favorite author, Homer, that inspired his mind with those maxims of ambition, which made him a scourge and a reproach to humanity.

After he had parted from Alexander, who set out, with the approbation of his tutor, on the mad exploit of conquering the world, Aristotle, inspired also with the like ambition, opened the Lyceum as a school of philosophy, in opposition to the Academy, then occupied by Xenocrates. The Lyceum was a grove which had been used for military exercises; and here he held daily conversations on philosophy, walking as he discoursed; from whence his followers received the name of Peripatetics.

According to the practice of the Greeks and Egyptians, whose object was not to enlighten the world, but to advance their own fame, Aristotle had his public and his secret doctrines—the exoteric and esoteric (or acroatic) philosophy. The latter, comprehending his metaphysics and mystical doctrines, was taught to a few select pupils of a morning; in the evening, the Lyceum was open to all his pupils, who were taught logic, rhetoric, moral and political philosophy. The one he used to call his morning, and the other his evening walk. These lectures he continued for twelve years, during the life of Alexander; after which his enemies prevailed, and he was obliged to leave Athens.

The principles of Aristotle have afforded matter for much inquiry and considerable dispute, being in all cases remarkably obscure. In physics, his principal discovery was a “first matter” destitute of all the properties of matter. The honor of this notable discovery is, however, claimed by the Pythagoreans for their master; but the point is now of little moment. He believed in the “eter nity of the world," i. e. the universe, but denied the eternity of its elements. His notion of a God is that of the first mover in this system, (the primum mobile), the "soul of the world," to which he allows "intelligence, desire, and affection," yet this mysterious Being, according to him, acts not voluntarily, but from necessity; and hence the origin of the doctrine of fate. So true is it, that "the world by wisdom knew not God."

In ethics, he taught that happiness consists in the virtuous exercise of the mind; and virtue in preserving the golden mean between extremes. The soul of man he considered as an emanation from the Deity, but says nothing of its immortality.—Enfield's Hist. of Philos. book ii. chap. 9. § 1; Williams.

ARIUS. (See ARIANS.)

ARK OF NOAH; in Hebrew, thebeth. The term thebeth used by Moses is different from the common name by which he describes a coffer; and is the same that he employs when speaking of the little wicker basket in which he was exposed on the Nile; whence some have thought that the ark was of wicker-work. It was a sort of bark, in shape and appearance much like a chest or trunk. The ancients inform us, that the Egyptians used on the Nile, barks made of bulrushes, which were so light, as to be carried on their shoulders, when they met with falls of water, that prevented their passage. Noah's ark was, in all probability, says Calmet, in form like these Egyptian boats, but much larger.

1. Its capacity and dimensions. The greatest difficulty refers, principally, to its size and capacity; and how Noah was able to build a vessel sufficient to contain the men and beasts, with provisions requisite for their support, during a whole year. To resolve these difficulties, it has been requisite to inquire very particularly into the measure of the cubit mentioned by Moses, into the number of the creatures admitted into the ark, and into the dimensions of this vast building. After the nicest examination and computation, and taking the dimensions with the greatest geometrical exactness, the most learned and accurate calculators, and those most conversant in building of ships, conclude, that if the ablest mathematicians had been consulted about proportioning the several apartments in the ark, they could not have done it with greater correctness than Moses has done; and this narration in the sacred history is so far from furnishing deists with arguments wherewith to weaken the authority of the Holy Scriptures, that, on the contrary, it supplies good arguments to confirm that authority; since it seems, in a manner, impossible for a man, in Noah's time, when navigation was not perfected, by his own wit and invention, to discover such accuracy and regularity of proportion, as is remarkable in the dimensions of the ark; it follows, that the correctness must be attributed to Divine inspiration, and a supernatural direction.—Wilkins's Essay towards a Real Character, part ii. cap. 5; Saurin, Discours Historique, &c. tom. i. p. 87, 88.

Dr. Hales proves the ark to have been of the burden of forty-two thousand four hundred and thirteen tons; and asks, "Can we doubt of its being sufficient to contain eight persons, and about two hundred or two hundred and fifty pair of four-footed animals, (a number to which, according to M. Buffon, all the various distinct species may be reduced,) together with all the subsistence necessary for a twelve-month, with the fowls of the air, and such reptiles and insects as cannot live under water?" All these various animals were controlled by the power of God, whose special agency is supposed in the whole transaction, and "the lion was made to lie down with the kid." Besides places for the beasts and birds, and their provisions, Noah might find room on the third story for thirty-six cabins, occupied by household utensils, instruments of husbandry, books, grains, and seeds; for a kitchen, a hall, four chambers, and a space of about forty-eight cubits, in length, to walk in.

Whether Noah was commanded to bring with him, into the ark, a pair of all living creatures, zoologically and numerically considered, has been doubted. During the long period between the creation and the flood, animals must have spread themselves over a great part of the antediluvian earth, and certain animals would, as the probably become indigenous to certain climates. The pairs saved must, therefore, if all the kinds were included, have travelled from immense distances. But of such marches, no intimation is given in the history; and this seems to render it probable that the animals which Noah was "to bring with him" into the ark, were the animals, clean and unclean, of the country in which he dwelt, and which, from the capacity of the ark, must have been in great variety and number. The terms used, it is true, are universal; and it is satisfactory to know, that if taken in the largest sense, there was ample accommodation in the ark. Nevertheless, universal terms in Scripture are not always to be taken mathematically; and in the vision of Peter, the phrase, panta ta tetrapoda tes ges,—all the four-footed beasts of the earth, must be understood of varii generis quadrupedes, as Schleusner paraphrases it. Thus we may easily account for the exuviae of animals, whose species no longer exist, which have been discovered in various places. The number of such extinct species probably has been greatly overrated by Cuvier; but of the fact, to a considerable extent, there can be no doubt. It is also to be observed, that the presumptive evidence of the truth of the fact of the preparation of such a vessel, and of the supernatural circumstances which attended it, is exceedingly strong. It is, in truth, the only solution of a difficulty which has no other explanation; for as a universal deluge is confirmed by the general history of the world, and by a variety of existing facts and monuments, such a structure as the ark, for the preservation and sustenance of various animals, seems to have been absolutely necessary; for as we can trace up the first imperfect rudiments of the art of ship-building amongst the Greeks, there could be no ships before the flood; and, consequently, no animals could have been saved. Nay, it is highly improbable that even men and domestic animals could be saved, not to mention wild beasts, serpents, &c., though we should admit that the antediluvians had shipping, unless we should suppose, also, that they had a divine intimation respecting the flood, such as Moses relates; but this would be to give up the cause of infidelity.

2. The time of its construction. It is generally understood to have been completed in the 1656th year of the world, at the time when the deluge commenced; but how long Noah was employed in preparing it, is not so apparent. According to the Mahometan writers, it was begun in the year 1654, which allows only two years for its construction; according to rabbi Tanchuma, it was begun in 1604, which allows fifty-two years; according to Berossus, in 1578, which allows seventy-eight; according to others, in 1556, which allows one hundred; and, according to most authors, in 1536, which allows one hundred and twenty. The two last are the most probable suppositions, and receive some support from the testimony of sacred Scripture. In favor of the first of these, it is alleged, that Noah is stated to have been five hundred years old immediately before the ark is mentioned; and six hundred, when the deluge took place.—Gen. 5: 32. 7: 6. While it is urged on the other hand, from 1 Pet. 3: 20. compared with Gen. 6: 3., that the ark appears to have been preparing during the whole period of the Divine forbearance, viz. one hundred and twenty years.

3. The place where built. On this point, also, there are very different opinions. One writer fixes upon the plains of Sodom, in Palestine; another upon mount Caucasus, on the confines of India; a third, upon some part of China; and the greater part, upon the territory of Babylon, in Chaldea. In order to determine this matter, several considerations have been proposed; such as, that Noah cannot be supposed to have removed far from the neighborhood of Eden; that, as the ark was not fitted for moving to a great distance, it must have been constructed near the place where it rested, viz. mount Ararat; that, as much timber would be required for so large a vessel, it must have been built where the particular wood of which it was made abounded. But all these points are themselves subjects of dispute; and it is not fully determined where Eden and Ararat are situated, or what was the tree from which the vessel in question was formed.

4. Its materials. Here the Scripture says expressly, that the ark was built of gopher wood; and covered over

w. a bitumen, or pitch. But there is an amazing diversity of opinion as to the kind of wood denoted by the term gopher. By the LXX. it is rendered square timber, i. e. timber squared by the workman, or, according to Vossius, the timber of those trees which shoot out quadrangular branches in the same horizontal line, such as fir, pine, cedar, &c.; by Jerome, in the Vulgate, it is rendered smoothed or plane timber; by Aben Ezra and Kimchi, light floating wood; by others, wood that does not easily corrupt, such as box and cedar; by others, pitched wood; by others, again, it is even rendered wicker-work, basket-work; and it is interpreted by Parkhurst, as probably nothing more than a general name for such trees as abound with resinous inflammable juices, as the cedar, cypress, fir, pine, &c. Cedar is the wood which best corresponds with the greater number of these different significations, as it is light and quadrangular in its branches, durable and incorruptible, resinous and inflammable; as it is abundant also in Asia, known to have been employed by the Assyrians and Egyptians in the construction of ships, and supported by the interpretations of Onkelos and Jonathan, and most of the old rabbins. Fuller and Borchart, however, maintain it to have been the cypress; because its Greek name bears a near resemblance to the Hebrew of gopher; because it was considered by the ancients as the most durable wood against rot and worms; because it abounded in Assyria, where the ark was probably built; and because it was well calculated, and was frequently used, for ship-building, especially by Alexander the Great, who built a whole fleet from the cypress groves in the neighborhood of Babylon.

5. Its form. From the description given in the sacred writings, it appears to have had the figure of an oblong square, with a flat bottom and sloping roof; without any kind of helm, or mast, or oars; formed to lie upon the water without rolling, and intended to float rather than to sail.

Some persons have started difficulties with regard to the square and oblong figure of the ark; but they did not consider that this vessel was not designed for sailing or rowing, but chiefly for floating on the water a considerable time. Besides, it may be proved, by instances, that its form was not less commodious for rowing, than capacious for carrying. George Hornius, in his "History of the several Empires," tells us, that in the beginning of the seventeenth century, one Peter Hans, of Horne, had two ships built after the model and proportions of the ark; one was one hundred and twenty feet long, twenty wide, and twelve deep. These vessels had the same fate with Noah's, being at first objects of ridicule and raillery; but experience demonstrated, that they carried a third part more than others, though they did not require a larger crew: they were better sailers, and made their way with much more swiftness. The only inconvenience found in them was, that they were fit only for times of peace, because they were not proper to carry guns.—(Le Pelletier, Dissert. sur l'Arche de Noe, cap. ii. p. 29, 30.) The proportions of the ark, Mr. Taylor remarks, nearly agree with those of the human figure, so that it resembled a dead body laid out for burial: three hundred cubits in length is six times its breadth, fifty cubits. Now the body of a man lying on the water, flat on his back, will float without any exertion, so far as to keep the mouth above water, and the nose free for the purpose of breathing. It should seem, therefore, that similar proportions might suit a vessel whose purpose was floating only—and we do not know whether we have not been betrayed into erroneous conceptions of the structure of the ark, by supposing it to pass violently from one place to another, or to be driven by storms; whereas, it is not impossible that it might be as if at anchor all the time; and the surges might not greatly, if at all, exceed those we are now acquainted with.

6. Corroborative testimony. Mr. Bryant has collected a variety of ancient historical relations, which show that some records concerning the ark had been preserved among most nations of the world, and in the general system of gentile mythology. Abydenus, with whom all the eastern writers concur, informs us that the place of descent from the ark was Armenia, and that its remains had been preserved for a long time. Plutarch mentions the Noachic dove, and its being sent out of the ark. Lucian speaks of Deucalion's going forth from the ark, and raising an altar to God. The priests of Ammonia had a custom, at particular seasons, of carrying in procession a boat, in which was an oracular shrine, held in great veneration: and this custom of carrying the deity in an ark or boat, was in use also among the Egyptians. Bishop Pocke has preserved three specimens of ancient sculpture, in which this ceremony is displayed. They were very ancient, and found by him in Upper Egypt. The ship of Isis referred to the ark, and its name, "Baris," was that of the mountain corresponding to Ararat in Armenia. Bryant finds reference to the ark in the temples of the serpent-worship, called Dracontia; and also in that of Sesostris, fashioned after the model of the ark, in commemoration of which it was built, and consecrated to Osiris at Theba; and he conjectures that the city, said to be one of the most ancient in Egypt, as well as the province, was denominated from it; Theba being the appellation of the ark.

In other countries, as well as in Egypt, an ark, or ship, was introduced in their mysteries, and often carried about in the seasons of their festivals. He finds, also, in the story of the Argonauts, several particulars that are thought to refer to the ark of Noah. As many cities, not in Egypt only and Bœotia, but in Cilicia, Ionia, Attica, Phthiotis, Cataonia, Syria, and Italy, were called Theba; so likewise the city Apamea was denominated Cibotos, from kibotos, in memory of the ark, and of the history connected with it. The ark, according to the traditions of the gentile world, was prophetic; and was regarded as a kind of temple, or residence of the deity. It comprehended all mankind, within the circle of eight persons, who were thought to be so highly favored of heaven, that they at last were reputed to be deities. Hence in the ancient mythology of Egypt, there were precisely eight gods; and the ark was esteemed an emblem of the system of the heavens. The principal terms by which the ancients distinguished the ark were, Theba, Baris, Arguz, Aren, Arene, Arni, Laris, Bontas, Bœotus, and Cibotus; and out of these they formed different personages. (See De-LUGE.)

In his investigations, Mr. Taylor takes Dionysius, or the Indian Bacchus, for a personification of the great patriarch Noah; and assumes, that the cista mystica, or sacred allegorical chest, anciently carried in the Dionysiac processions, commemorated the instrument of preservation, by means of which a family of mankind had escaped destruction when involved in the calamities which accompanied the deluge. It will be recollected, that this thebeth has been already supposed only to float, hovering about the place where it was stationed; to be gradually (and comparatively, slowly) surrounded by the flood, and to be lifted up, for a short time only, on the face of water twenty-two feet in depth; and moreover, to be re-settled on its broad basis, and its projecting supports, by the earliest diminution of the retiring waves.

In a series of pictures, representing ceremonies in honor of Bacchus, in the Antiquities of Herulanæum, (vol. ii. p. 135.) appears what may be thought, with some probability, the nearest approach in form to the Noachical ark. A woman is carrying on her shoulder a square box, having a projecting roof, and at the end a door. This door is a distinguishing circumstance; for it plainly marks this receptacle as a house: it cannot be a mere box for ordinary uses, as the difficulty of putting things in, and taking them out, through so narrow an aperture, sufficiently demonstrates: neither is the angular roof, with its considerable projection, analogous to the purposes of a mere box; moreover, being carried in a commemorative procession, it is clearly a sacred thebeth, or trunk, that is, that in which Dionysius was preserved. It has no pillars to characterize it as a votive temple; neither is the door-way proportioned to the entrance of a temple; as it rises nearly to the roof. Moreover, the ark was esteemed a symbol appropriate to Bacchus; and, in his processions, idols, or other mysteries referring to that deity, were inclosed in it. It was the same among the Egyptians. Observe further, that the LXX in Genesis translate thebah, "kibotos;" in Exodus they retain the original, thebin; whereas Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Theophilus of Antioch, and others, use the word larnax, the same as among the gentiles described the ark of Bacchus. The cista mystica of the Bacchic rites, contained the most direct allusion to the great progenitor of mankind: when it was not the god himself, it was the virile part of him; but, sometimes, a basket of early fruit, or seed corn, was substituted; implying that Bacchus was the person who first taught mankind husbandry; and that fertility was his character and essence. Theocritus says, that Pentheus was pulled to pieces by the female Bacchantes, for prying into the sacred things which they took out of the cista to place on the altars; and Catullus says, the rites of the cista were celebrated in the utmost secrecy. The heathen always carried the cista on the shoulder; and the person who carried it was called Kistaphorus, says Suidas. (See Exod. 25: 14. and UZZAN.)

The annexed medal, which is preserved in the cabinet of the king of France, is too remarkable to be overlooked; and having been particularly scrutinized by the late abbé Barthelemy, at the desire of the late Dr. Combe, was, by that able antiquary, pronounced authentic. It bears on one side the head of Severus; on the other, a history in two parts; representing, first, two figures inclosed in an ark, or chest, sustained by stout posts at the corners, and well timbered throughout. On the side are letters; on the top is a dove; in front, the same two figures which we see in the ark are represented as come out, and departing from their late residence. Hovering over them is the dove, with a sprig in its bill. (Double histories are common on medals.) The situation of these figures implies the situation of the door; and clearly commemorates an escape from the dangers of water, by means of a floating vessel. Whether these particulars can be, without difficulty, referred to the history of Deucalion and Pyrrha, as usually understood, will be strongly doubted by all who duly contemplate the subject. Moreover, Mr. Bryant informs us, that the letters on the ark are N O E, as will be evident from close inspection of the medal. It is unwise to depend too strongly on a single evidence; but it is not improper to submit, (1.) that the patriarch was known in Grecian antiquity by the name of Noe; (2.) that it is not impossible to explain the cause why all the medals, including the genuine, purport to be struck at Apamea.

7. Importance of the subject. It is possible, says Mr. Taylor, whom we are quoting, that the reader may not at first perceive the propriety of attaching so great importance to the history of Noah's deliverance and his commemoration; and thence he proceeds to justify his not unlaborious investigations. The outcry of a certain class of reasoners against Revelation has long been, he observes, "Bring us FACTS WHICH ALL THE WORLD AGREE IN: FACTS ADMITTED, ESTABLISHED, BY UNBIASED EVIDENCE," &c. If, in answer to this, we adduce proof that the Christian dispensation is from above, we are reminded—"How few of mankind receive it: Christ's own nation deny the subject of it; heathen lands refuse him." If we advert to Moses—"What! a leader of a pitiful horde of leprous slaves! at most, a legislator acknowledged by a single nation! and that a stupid nation too." To establish the assertion, therefore, that Deity has condescended to make known his intentions to man, he invites such persons to investigate the instance of Noah:—Was the deluge, he asks, a real occurrence?—All mankind acknowledge it. Wherever tradition has been maintained, wherever written records are preserved, wherever commemorative rites have been instituted, what has been their subject? The deluge: deliverance from destruction by a flood. The deluge: and the sage agree in this: North and South, East and West, relate the danger of their great ancestor from overwhelming waters.—But he was saved: and how?—By personal exertion? By long-supported swimming? By concealment in the highest mountains! No: but by enclosure in a large floating edifice of his own construction—his own construction, for this particular purpose. But this labor was long; this was not the work of a day; he must have FOREKNOWN so astonishing an event, a considerable time previous to its actual occurrence.—Whence did he receive this FOREKNOWLEDGE? Did the earth inform him, that at twenty, thirty, forty years' distance, it would disgorge a flood?—Surely not. Did the stars announce that they would dissolve the terrestrial atmosphere in terrific rains?—Surely not. Whence, then, had Noah his FOREKNOWLEDGE? Did he begin to build when the first showers descended? This was too late. Had he been accustomed to rains formerly—why think them now of importance? Had he never seen rain—what could induce him to provide against it? Why this year more than last year;—why last year more than the year before? These inquiries are direct: we cannot finish from the fact. Erase it from the Mosaic records; still it is recorded in Greece, in Egypt, in India, and in Britain: it is registered in the very sacra of the pagan world, and is annually renewed by commemorative imitation, where the liberty of opinion is not fettered by prejudices derived from Hebrew institutions, or by the "sophisticated" inventions of Christianity.—"Go, infidel," he adds, "turn to the right hand, or to the left hand: take your choice of difficulties: disparage all mankind as fools, as willing dupes to superstitious commemoration, as leagued throughout the world to delude themselves in order to impugn your wisdom, your just-thinking, your love of truth, your unbiassed integrity; or allow that THIS FACT, at least this ONE fact, is established by testimony abundantly sufficient; but remember, that if it be established, it implies a COMMUNICATION FROM GOD TO MAN.—WHO COULD INFORM NOAH? Why did not that great patriarch provide against Fire?—against Earthquakes?—against Explosions?—Why against a Deluge?—why against Water?—Away with subterfuge. Say frankly, 'This was the dictation of Deity,' say, 'Only HE who made the world could predict the time, the means, the causes of this devastation; only HE could excite the hope of restoration, or suggest a method of deliverance.' Use your own language; but permit a humble believer to adopt language already recorded: 'By faith, Noah—being warned of God—of things never seen as yet—in pious fear—prepared the ark (kibotos) to the saving of his family—by which he condemned the world.'—May a similar condemnation never rest on us, who must at least admit the truth of one text in the Bible—or stand convicted by the united voice of all mankind, and by the testimony of the earth, the now shattered, the now disordered earth itself!—Calmet; Watson; Jones.

ARK OF THE COVENANT; a small chest or coffer, three feet nine inches in length, two feet three inches in breadth, and the same in height, in which were contained the golden pot that had manna, with Aaron's rod, and the tables of the covenant. Exod. 25: 10—16. Numb. 17: 10. with Heb. 9: 4. It was made of shittim-wood, and covered with the mercy-seat, which was of solid gold. At either end was a cherubim, looking towards each other, with expanded wings, which, embracing the whole circumference of the mercy-seat, met in the centre of it. Exod. 25: 17—22. and ch. 37: 1—9. On this ark, the Shechinah, or symbol of the Divine presence, rested, both in the tabernacle and temple, manifesting itself in the appearance of a cloud, as it were, hovering over it. Lev. 16: 2. And from thence, as often as Jehovah was consulted in behalf of his people, the divine oracles were given out by an audible voice. Hence it is that God is said to dwell between the cherubims, upon the mercy-seat; because that was the throne of the visible appearance of his glory among them. 2 Kings 19: 15. 1 Chron. 13: 6. Ps. 80: 1. And for this reason, the high-priest, once every year, on the great day of expiation, appeared before the mercy-seat, to make atonement for the people. Heb. 9: 7. On either side of the ark, were two rings of gold, through which staves overlaid with gold were passed, and by means of which, as they journeyed through the wilderness, it was carried on the shoulders of the Levites. Exod. 25: 13, 14. When the Hebrews passed through Jordan, Joshua commanded the priests who bare the ark to proceed with it before them, which they did; and as soon as their feet touched the brink of the river, its waters instantly divided, leaving them to pass over on dry ground, "and the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan; and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan." Josh. 3: 14—17. After the passage of Jordan, the ark continued for some time at Gilgal, from whence it was removed to Shiloh. From this place the Israelites carried it to their camp, where in an engagement with the Philistines it fell into the hands of the latter, who placed it in the temple of their idol Dagon, when the latter fell down and was broken in pieces before it; and in consequence of detaining it, they were so afflicted with emerods, that they returned it to the Hebrews. It halted at Bethshemesh, after this, where the people, for profanely looking into it, incurred the Divine displeasure, and fifty thousand of them were struck dead. It was then lodged at Kirjath-jearim, and afterwards at Nob. Numb. 10: 33—36. 1 Sam. 4: 5: 6: 7. 2 Sam. 6: David determined to convey it from Kirjath-jearim, after a different manner; and accordingly had it placed upon a new cart which was drawn by oxen; but the latter causing the ark to shake, Uzzah put forth his hand to prevent its fall, when the anger of the Lord was kindled against him, and he was instantly struck dead for his presumption. This awful judgment filled David with terror, and caused him to leave it during three months at the house of Obed-edom; it was, however, removed from thence to his palace in Jerusalem; and when Solomon had built and dedicated the temple, he there fixed it, in the most holy place. 1 Chron. 15: 25—28. 1 Kings 8: 1—11. The hundred and thirty-second psalm was evidently written on one of these occasions, and is easily understood when thus applied.

It remained in the temple till the times of the last kings of Judah, who gave themselves up to idolatry, and even dared to place their idols in the holy temple itself. The priests, being unable to bear this profanation, took the ark and carried it from place to place, to preserve it from the hands of those impious princes. Josiah commanded them to bring it back to the sanctuary, and it was accordingly replaced. 2 Chron. 35: 3. What became of the ark at the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, is a dispute among the rabbins. Had it been carried to Babylon with the other vessels of the temple, it would, in all probability, have been brought back with them, at the close of the captivity. But that this was not the case, is agreed on all hands; whence it is probable that it was destroyed with the temple.

The ark of the covenant was, as it were, the centre of worship to all those of the Hebrew nation who served God according to the Levitical law; and not only in the temple, when they came thither to worship, but every where else in their dispersions through the whole world; whenever they prayed, they turned their faces towards the place where the ark stood, and directed all their devotions that way. Dan. 6: 10. Whence the author of the book of Cosri justly says, that the ark, with the mercy-seat and cherubim, were the foundation, root, heart, and marrow of the whole temple, and all the Levitical worship performed therein; and, therefore, had there been nothing else wanting in the second temple but the ark only, this alone would have been a sufficient reason for the old men to have wept when they remembered the first temple in which it stood; and for the saying of Haggai, 2: 3., that the second temple was as nothing, compared with the first; so great a share had the ark of the covenant in the glory of Solomon's temple. However, the defect was supplied as to the outward form, for in the second temple there was also an ark of the same dimensions with the first, and put in the same place; but it wanted the tables of the law, Aaron's rod, and the pot of manna; nor was there any appearance of the Divine glory over it; nor any oracles delivered from it. The only use that was made of it, was to be a representation of the former on the great day of expiation, and to be a repository of the holy Scriptures, that is, of the original copy of that collection of them made by Ezra after the captivity; in imitation of which the Jews, in all their synagogues, have a like ark or coffer, in which they keep their Scriptures.

For the temple of Solomon a new ark was not made; but he constructed cherubim in the most holy place, which were designed to give additional state to this most sacred symbol of God's grace and mercy. These cherubim were fifteen feet high, and were placed at equal distance from the centre of the ark and from each side of the wall, so that their wings being expanded, the two wings which were extended behind touched the wall, and the other two met over the ark, and so overshadowed it. When these magnificent cherubim were finished, the ark was brought in and placed under their wings. 2 Chron. 5: 7—10.

The ark was called the ark of the covenant, because it was a symbol of the covenant between God and his people. It was also named the ark of the testimony, because the two tables which were deposited in it were witnesses against every transgression.—Jones; Watson.

ARM. The whole power and resources of men are often in Scripture, by an easy image, called their arm; because on the exertion of them they depend, and by them they are qualified for the execution of their purposes. Ps. 10: 15. 38: 17. How forcible and full of beauty, in this point of view, is that passage, Jer. 17: "Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm!" How just the confidence of Hezekiah against Sennacherib. 2 Chron. 32: 8. "With him is an arm of flesh: but with us is the Lord our God, to help us, and to fight our battles!"

It would seem to have been a custom with ancient warriors, when hotly engaged in battle, and aiming to strike an effectual blow, to make bare the arm. So in allusion to this, when some extraordinary and decisive exertion of Divine power is adverted to, it is not unusual for the sacred writers to describe it as making bare, revealing, and stretching out the arm. Isa. 52: 10. Hence these phrases always signify some signal act of Jehovah for the destruction of his enemies, and the deliverance of his people; or for the demonstration of his truth among men. Isa. 53: 1.

But inasmuch as the power of God is usually exerted in behalf of his church in intimate connection with that of the church herself, we may hence understand the import of Isa. 51: 9, which is the call of Zion on her God, "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord;" which is followed by the call of God upon his people, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion." Isa. 52: 1. See a similar idea in Phil. 2: 12, 13. Yet, when in obedient love and humble dependence, we have exerted ourselves to the utmost, what sweet propriety is there in the grateful acknowledgment, "THOU HAST WROUGHT ALL OUR WORKS IN US." Isa. 26: 12.

ARMAGEDDON; a place mentioned in the Apocalypse, ch. 16: 16, literally signifying the mountain of Megiddon, or Megiddo, a city situated in the great plain at the foot of mount Carmel, where king Josiah received his mortal wound in the battle with Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt. 2 Kings 23: 29, 30. It is also the place where Barak overcame Sisera with his great army. Judges 5: 19. At Armageddon, the three unclean spirits coming out of the dragon's mouth, are to gather together the kings of the earth to the battle of the great day of God Almighty. Rev. 16: 13, 14.

ARMENIA; a province of Asia, comprising the modern Turcomania, and part of Persia; having Georgia on the north; Kurdistan, which was the ancient Assyria, on the south; and Asia Minor, now called Natolia, on the west. This province includes the sources of the Tigris and the Euphrates, the Araxes and Phasis; and here also the country of Eden, in which paradise was situated, is supposed to lie.

Armenia is often confounded with Aramæa, the land of Aram or Syria; but they are totally different. Armenia, which is separated from Aram by mount Taurus, was so denominated from Ar-Men, the mountainous country of Meni or Minni, the people of which country are mentioned under this name by Jeremiah, when summoning the nations against Babylon.

The people of this country have in all ages maintained a great similarity of character, partly commercial and partly pastoral. They have, in fact, in the northern parts of the Asiatic continent, been what the Cushites and Ishmaelites were in the south, tenders of cattle, living on the produce of their flocks and herds, and carriers of merchandise between the neighboring nations; a part living at home with their flocks, and a part travelling as merchants and dealers into distant countries. In the flourishing times of Tyre, the Armenians, according to Ezekiel, 27: 14, brought horses and mules to the markets of that city; and, according to Herodotus, they had a considerable trade in wine, which they sent down the Euphrates to Babylon, &c. At the present day, the Armenians are the principal traders of the east; and are to be found in the capacity of merchants or commercial agents all over Asia,—a patient, frugal, industrious, and honest people, whose known character for these virtues has withstood the tyranny and extortions of the wretched governments under which they chiefly live.

It cannot be supposed that the Turks used every effort to impose on the conquered Armenians the doctrines of the Koran. More tolerant, indeed, than the Saracens, liberty of conscience was still not to be purchased of them but by great sacrifices, which for three centuries the Armenians have patiently endured, and exhibit to the world an honorable and solitary instance of a successful national opposition of Christianity to Mahometanism.

They are distinguished by superior cultivation, manners, and honesty, from the barbarians under whose yoke they live, and even from the Greeks and Jews. The cause (says the Encyclopedia Americana) is to be found in their creed, and in their religious union; but particularly to the Bible, which is freely distributed among the people by the clergy in translations, that are esteemed valuable in theological literature. The written language owes its cultivation to the translation of the Bible, begun in A. D. 411, and finished in 511. With the Biblical literature of the Armenians, is connected their theological, historical, and mathematical literature; which has recently found many assiduous students in Paris.—Jones; Watson; *Ency. ARMENIAN CHURCH; a branch, originally, of the Greek church, residing in Armenia; but they are widely dispersed over all the countries of the East. They probably received Christianity in the fourth century.

Their whole ecclesiastical establishment is under the government of four patriarchs; the first has his residence in Echiadzin, or Egmiathin, near Irivan; the second at Sis, in the lesser Armenia; the third in Georgia; and the fourth in Achiatar, (or Altavou,.) on the lake of Van; but the power of the two last is bounded within their own dioceses, while the others have more extensive authority, and the patriarch of Egmiathin has (or had) under him eighteen bishops, beside those who are priors of monasteries.

The Armenians every where perform divine service in their own tongue, in which their liturgy and offices are written, in the dialect of the fourth or fifth centuries. They have the whole Bible translated from the Septuagint, as they say, so early as the time of Chrysostom.

The Armenian confession is similar to that of the Jacobite Christians, both being Monophysites, acknowledging but one nature in the person of Christ; but this, according to Mr. Simon, is little more than a dispute about terms, few of them being able to enter into the subtleties of polemics.

In the year 1664, an Armenian bishop, named Usan, visited Europe for the purpose of getting printed the Armenian Bible, and communicated the above particulars to Mr. Simon.

They have among them a number of monasteries and convents, in which is maintained a severe discipline; marriage is discountenanced, though not absolutely prohibited; a married priest cannot obtain promotion, and the higher clergy are not allowed to marry. They worship in the eastern manner, by prostration; they are very superstitious, and their ceremonies much resemble those of the Greek church. Once in their lives they generally perform a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and in 1819, the number of Armenian pilgrims was 1300, nearly as many as the Greeks. Dr. Buchanan, however, says, "Of all the Christians in central Asia, they have preserved themselves most free from Mahometan and papal corruptions." ARMIES. (See ARMY.)

ARMINIANISM, strictly speaking, is that system of religious doctrine which was taught by Arminius, professor of divinity in the university of Leyden. (See ARMINIUS.) If therefore we would learn precisely what Arminianism is, we must have recourse to those writings in which that divine himself has stated and expounded his peculiar tenets.

This, however, will by no means give us an accurate idea of that which, since his time, has been usually denominated Arminianism. On examination, it will be found, that in many important particulars, those who have called themselves Arminians, or have been accounted such by others, differ far more widely from the nominal head and founder of their sect, than he himself did from Calvin, and other doctors of Geneva. There are, indeed, certain points, with regard to which he has been strictly and uniformly followed by almost all his pretended adherents; but there are others of equal or of greater importance, dogmatically insisted on by them, to which he unquestionably never gave his sanction, and even appears to have been decidedly hostile.

It may be proper, says Mr. Watson, to mention some tenets with regard to which Arminianism has been much misrepresented. If a man hold that good works are necessary to justification; if he maintain that faith includes good works in its own nature; if he reject the doctrine of original sin; if he deny that divine grace is requisite for the whole work of sanctification; if he speak of human virtue as meritorious in the sight of God; it is very generally concluded, that he is an Arminian. But the truth is, that a man of such sentiments is properly a disciple of the Pelagian and Socinian schools. To such sentiments pure Arminianism is as diametrically opposite as Calvinism itself. The genuine Arminians admit the corruption of human nature in its full extent. They admit that we are justified by faith only. They admit that our justification originates solely in the grace of God. They admit that the procuring and meritorious cause of our justification is the righteousness of Christ. Propter quam, says Arminius, Deus credentibus peccatum condonet, eosque pro justis reputat non aliter atque si legem perfecte impleverissent. They admit in this way that justification implies not merely forgiveness of sin, but acceptance to everlasting happiness. Junctum habet adoptionem in filios, et collationem juris in hereditatem vitæ æternæ. They admit, in fine, that the work of sanctification, from its very commencement to its perfection in glory, is carried on by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God by Jesus Christ. So sound, indeed, are the Arminians with respect to the doctrine of justification, a doctrine so important and essential in the opinion of Luther, that he scrupled not to call it articulus ecclesie stantis vel cadentis, that those who look into the writings of Arminius may be disposed to suspect him of having even exceeded Calvin in orthodoxy. It is certain, at least, that he declares his willingness to subscribe to every thing that Calvin has written on that leading subject of Christianity, in the third book of his Institutes; and with this declaration the tenor of his writings invariably corresponds.*

In the next year, after the death of Arminius, that is, in 1610, his followers and partisans presented a remonstrance against certain points of Calvinism, from which they received the name of Remonstrants. (See GROTIUS.) The chief differences were reduced to the famous FIVE POINTS; which are thus stated by Mosheim.

1. "That God has not fixed the future state of mankind by an absolute unconditional decree; but determined from all eternity to bestow salvation on those whom he foresaw would persevere unto the end in their faith in Jesus Christ, and to inflict everlasting punishment on those who should continue in their unbelief, and resist unto the end his divine succors." See Ezek. 18: 30—32. Acts 17: 24—30. Matt. 23: 37. Rom. 2: 4, 5. 5: 18. 1 Tim. 2: 1—4. 2 Pet. 1: 10. 3: 9.

2. "That Christ, by his death and sufferings, made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and of every individual in particular. That, however, none but those who believe in him can be partakers of the divine benefit." See John 2: 2. 3: 16, 17. Heb. 2: 9. Isa. 50: 19, 20. 1 Cor. 8: 11.

3. "That true faith cannot proceed from the exercise of our natural faculties and powers, nor from the force and operation of free-will; since man, in consequence of his natural corruption, is incapable either of thinking or doing any good; and that therefore it is necessary to his conversion and salvation, that he be regenerated and renewed by the operations of the Holy Ghost, which is the gift of God through Jesus Christ."

4. "That this divine grace, or energy of the Holy Ghost, which heals the disorders of a corrupt nature, begins, advances, and brings to perfection, every thing that can be called good in man; and that, consequently, all good works, without exception, are to be attributed to God alone, and to the operation of his grace; that, nevertheless, this grace is offered to all, and does not force men to act against their inclinations; but may be resisted, and rendered inefficual, by the perverse will of the impenitent sinner." Isa. 1: 16. Deut. 10: 16. Eph. 4: 22.

5. "That they who are united to Christ, by faith, are thereby furnished with abundant strength, and with succors sufficient to enable them to triumph over the seduction of Satan, and the allurements of sin and temptation; but that the question, 'Whether such may fall from their faith, and forfeit finally this state of grace,' has not yet been resolved with sufficient perspicuity; and must, therefore, be yet more carefully examined, by an attentive study of what the Holy Scriptures have declared, in relation to this important point." Heb. 6: 4—6. 2 Pet. 2: 20, 21. Luke 21: 35. 2 Pet. 3: 17.*

* Having prefixed above some observations of Mr. Watson, who is himself an Arminian, we subjoin some remarks prepared for this work by the Rev. Dr. Alexander, of Princeton Theo. Sem.—Ed. Envy.

It may be allowed here to subjoin two or three remarks on some of the above propositions, which, as Dr. Mosheim has stated them, lean too much toward Calvinism for many modern Arminians conscientiously to subscribe.

On the first article, no remark seems necessary. On the second, we may observe, that the universality of the death of Christ, in certain respects, was held by Calvin and many of the synod of Dort; by archbishop Usher, bishop Davenant, and the church of England; and also many Calvinists of the present day.—[See Griffin on the Atonement.]

The language of the third article is such as Calvinists would, perhaps, more generally admit, than many Arminians of the present day. In the "confession, or declaration, of the Remonstrants," said to be published, both in Dutch and Latin, soon after the synod of Dort, it is said, that Adam, "being the stock and root of all mankind, involved and entangled, not only himself, but also all his posterity (who were, as it were, shut up in his loins) in the same death and misery with himself: so that all men are, by this one only sin of Adam, deprived of that primeval happiness, and destitute of that true righteousness, which is necessary for the obtaining of eternal life; and, consequently, are now born liable to eternal death. And this is usually and vulgarly called original sin. Concerning which, notwithstanding, we are to hold that the most bountiful God, in and by his beloved Son Jesus Christ, as in and by another and new Adam, hath provided and prepared a free remedy for all, against that evil, or malady, which was derived unto us from Adam." pp. 119, 120.

Nothing is here said of the nature of free-will; yet it is certain that the doctrine of a self-determining power in the will makes an essential part of the present Arminian scheme.

On the doctrine of the fall, many modern Arminians talk more like Pelagians, (which see.) Thus Dr. G. Gregory and others contend, that "mankind are not totally depraved, and that depravity does not come on them by virtue of Adam's being their public head; but that mortality and natural evil only are the direct consequences of his sin to posterity."—[R. Adam's Direct. vol. ii. p. 252.]

In the fourth article, the term force is evidently improper, since it is never used by Calvinists (except in a strong figure of speech, as by our Lord, "Compel them to come in.") Calvinists own that grace may be, and often is, long resisted, though finally victorious, as is partly ad-

In these five articles the Arminian theory is not fully developed. The object was to present the new opinions in the most plausible dress, and in that form which would seem to deviate the least from the public standards of the Belgic church. But it was alleged by their opponents, that the real opinions of the Remonstrants were not fully expressed in these articles; and that, under the cover of orthodox expressions, great and dangerous errors lay concealed. And that they were not mistaken in these views became evident in the conferences which took place between the leading theologians of both parties, at the Hague, and at other places; and more evidently from the Apologetic for the Arminians, published after the meeting of the synod of Dort, by Episcopius, the leader of the party. In this document they avow and defend the opinions charged upon them by the Contra-remonstrants, and which have since been known under the name of Arminianism.

The cardinal point of difference between Calvinists and Arminians is, whether the reason why one man is saved and another not, is owing to the grace of God or to the free-will of man. All the other points of difference may easily be traced up to this one. For although the Arminians acknowledge the necessity of grace, which they make universal, yet they make the efficacy of that grace to depend on the human will; whereas Calvinists maintain, that the grace of God, without violence to human liberty, is efficacious to subdue the stubborn will, and to render men indubitably willing to be saved from their sins in the way of the gospel. If in this they are right, they cannot but be right in their views of the doctrines of election, of redemption, and final perseverance. Whereas, if the Arminian view be correct, the difference in the final destiny of men is not owing to any grace, but to the extent to which they are saved by others, but to the different improvement of the common grace afforded to all men. And if the final result depends in the first instance upon the will of man, so it will afterwards; consequently he who believes and repents to-day, may become an unbeliever and impenitent man to-morrow. However Arminians may differ among themselves in other matters, they all agree in this cardinal doctrine of their system. They, furthermore, all hold that there is no election of grace, but what depends on the foresight of faith and holiness in the creature; that Christ died equally for all men, and equally intended the salvation of all men; that in conversion the effect depends upon the right improvement of the grace afforded; and that by the exercise of the same free-will by which the gospel was embraced, the true believer may turn away from God, and become as bad, or worse, than before his conversion. And as acmitted in the last article. They further admit that impenitent sinners, in like manner as the Jews, "do always resist the Holy Ghost."

On the last point, of falling from grace, Arminius himself appears by no means dogmatical; for it is said that he declared, in his last public conference, but little before his death, "that he had never opposed the doctrine of the certain perseverance of the truly believing; nor thus far was he willing to oppose them, because those testimonies of Scripture stood for it, to which he was not as yet able to answer."—[Scott's Synod of Dort, p. 40.]

His followers, however, soon made up their minds on this article, and have universally agreed, that true believers may fall from grace, not only grossly, but even finally. And Dr. Mosheim says, "It is certain, whatever the Arminians may say to the contrary, that the sentiments of their most eminent theological writers, after the synod of Dort, concerning divine grace, and the other doctrines that are connected with it, approached much nearer to the opinions of the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians, than to those of the Lutheran church;" he should rather have said, than to those of Luther.—[Ecclesiastical History, vol. v. p. 446, and Note h.]—Mosheim; Watson's Bib. and Theo. Dict.; Williams; Prof. Stuart, in the Bib. Repos. for April, 1831.

ARMINIUS, (JAMES,) the reputed founder of the sect called Arminians, was born at Ouderwater, in Holland, in 1560. Having lost his father when very young, a clergyman kindly undertook his education, during the first four years of his life, till he went to the university at Utrecht. There he staid till death deprived him of his protector; and then he would have been entirely friendless, had not another gentleman kindly become his patron, and took him to Marburg, in 1575. In 1582, he was sent to Geneva, to perfect himself in his various studies, and there he applied himself chiefly to the lectures of the distinguished Theodore Beza. Being compelled to retire to Basil, on account of his privately and publicly inculcating the philosophical doctrines of Ramus, in opposition to those of Aristotle, he there soon acquired so great a reputation, that the faculty of divinity offered him the degree of doctor, when he was but twenty-two years of age; but this he modestly refused. He was ordained minister at Amsterdam, in 1588. His ministry was much followed, and he was greatly beloved. Martin Lydius, professor of divinity at Francker, thought him very capable of refuting the contents of a work, wherein the supralapsarian doctrine of absolute decrees had been attacked by Arnold Corcoring to the above view, the whole Arminian system depends on the doctrine that the will of man must first act and give consent, before common grace can become efficacious; so that the first right choice is not produced by the effectual operation of grace, but precedes it; it necessarily follows, that their views of human depravity are drawn from those of Calvinists; for while the latter believe that man's death in sin is so complete that he, until renewed, has no ability of will (see INABILITY and WILL) to do any thing spiritually good, the Arminian holds, that, under the enusive influence of truth, he may choose to embrace the gospel, and thus render efficacious that grace which can only operate by his consent.

The chief difficulty in the Arminian theory is to reconcile it with the language of Scripture, the nature of Christian prayer and thanksgiving, and with apparent facts. For example, if God had equally intended the salvation of the whole human race, would he not have equally furnished all men, in all ages, with the gospel and other means of grace? Can it be said with truth that sufficient grace has been granted to all the heathen to bring them to salvation? And the mere possibility of the salvation of some, if their views of human depravity are denegated. According to the principles of Arminianism, all men should enjoy equal advantages; or at least salvation should not be so improbable and difficult as it is to a vast majority of the human family. Various plans of evading this difficulty have been resorted to, none of which are sufficient to render the acknowledged fact consistent with the doctrine of universal and sufficient grace. The same difficulty is, in part, found in the salvation of some, if the conversion of many will of man uniformly resist, and why is it that often the amiable and moral are not converted, while the profligate, and even the blaspheming infidel, are made the subjects of grace? When we examine particular cases of Christian perseverance, we cannot easily avoid the conclusion that grace is sovereign and efficacious, and that the stability will of man uniformly resist, until overcome by the sweetly constraining power of God.

Arminianism, although introduced into the reformed churches by James Arminius, did not originate with him. The very same views, in substance, were maintained by the Semi-Pelagians, and afterwards by the Mohists and Jeeuits in the Romish church. It is a very remarkable fact, that the reformers seem to have unanimously agreed in their opinions respecting the efficacy of grace, and the impotency of the will in relation to holy acts. This is evident from all their early creeds and nelius and Renier Duntetlok, two sublapsarian Calvinist ministers of Delft. He accordingly undertook the task; but on weighing the arguments on both sides, he embraced the very opinions he was solicited to confute. This has generally been represented as if he then abandoned Calvinism; but this is a mistake. Calvin himself was not a supralapsarian, though Beza was. The chief difference between Arminius and Calvin is in the mode of explaining the sovereignty of divine decrees, and the effectual operations of divine grace; in both which Arminius himself believed to the very last; though his pretended followers have abandoned them, under the shelter of his great name. Episcopus is more properly the founder of the sect since called Arminians. In 1603, he was called to the professorship of divinity in Leyden, and began his lectures with three elegant orations: the first, on the object of theology; the second on the author and end of it; and the third on the certainty of it: and then proceeded to the exposition of the prophet Jonah. In all his lectures he was attended by a numerous audience, who admired the strength of his arguments, and were astonished at the great learning he displayed. This exposed him to the envy of his brethren, who treated him with harshness and cruelty. Disputes were at that time kindling into a flame in the university, and the states of the province were obliged to appoint conferences between Arminius and his adversaries. Gomares was his greatest opponent. These controversies, his continual labors, and his uneasiness at seeing his reputation blasted by aspersions and slanders, threw him into a complicated illness, which terminated his life on the 19th of October, 1609. Arminius was an energetic minister of the gospel. His voice was firm, but moderately low; and his conversation such as became a Christian. While it was pious and judicious, it was intermixed with that politeness of conduct and elegance of manners, which delights the young, and ensures the approbation and esteem of the aged. His enemies, indeed, endeavored to represent him in the most disadvantageous light; but his memory has been sufficiently vindicated by men of the greatest distinction and eminence; and in spite of all the malevolence and enmity of his antagonists, his character was in very many points highly commendable, and deserving of imitation.—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Watson's Bib. and Theo. Dict. But especially, Prof. Stuart's article on the Life, Times, and Creed of Arminius, in the Bib. Repos. for April, 1831.

ARMS, MILITARY, and ARMOR. The Hebrews used in war offensive arms of the same kinds as were employed by other people of their time, and of the East: swords, confessions, as well as from their writings. It is doubtless true, however, that the followers of Arminius, after his death, deviated much further from the common doctrines of the Reformation than he did; but this is what commonly takes place in all similar cases. The man who first calls in question received opinions, does not wish to appear to recede too far from the creed of the Christian community with which he has been connected; and all the necessary consequences of his opinions may not be obvious at first; but by discussion the system in all its bearings becomes more manifest; and a man's disciples are found to be more ready to extend his principles to all their legitimate consequences than he was. And in regard to all errors, it has been remarked that their tendency is downwards; the adoption of one error commonly prepares the way for another still more erroneous. Thus the leaders of the Arminian party in Holland approximated much nearer to Unitarianism after the synod of Dort than they had done before, and professed and publicly taught doctrines which, it is believed, Arminius would have rejected with horror. (See ARMINIUS.)

The decision of the synod of Dort, called to consider and find a remedy for the disturbances and disturbances of the church, was unfavorable to the doctrine of the Arminians on every one of the points of difference; and, in consequence, they were deposed from all ecclesiastical offices, and from the mastership of all schools and colleges in the United Provinces. And by the States General of Holland severe laws were passed against them, by which all who refused submission were condemned to banishment, fines, or imprisonment. Such persecution on account of religious opinions was rare, by the common consent of all Protestants, condemned as unjust and tyrannical; but this seemed to be the acts of a former age by the liberal sentiments of toleration which now happily prevail. All the reformers, and most of their immediate successors, conscientiously believed that heretics ought to be coerced by the arm of civil power. And it should be remembered, that in many places, while the Arminians were favored by the civil authorities, they treated the orthodox with insolence, and excited disturbances which the civil magistrature was not always able to suppress.

At present there are multitudes who profess Arminian doctrines, in whole or in part, and some large Christian denominations who maintain and propagate the whole system. These, however, differ from each other in minor points, while they agree in all the leading doctrines taught by Arminius, and strenuously oppose whatever bears the peculiar stamp of Calvinism, which they load with obloquy. For the conduct of the synod of Dort, see the article Dort.

darts, lances, javelins, bows, arrows, and slings. For defensive arms, they used helmets, cuirasses, bucklers, armor for the thighs, &c. At particular periods, especially when under servitude, whole armies of Israelites were without good weapons. In the war of Deborah and Barak against Jabin, there were neither shields nor lances among forty thousand men. Judg. 5: 8. In the time of Saul, (1 Sam. 13: 22.) none in Israel, beside Saul and Jonathan, was armed with swords and spears; because the Philistines, who were then masters of the country, forbade the Hebrews using the trades of armorers and sword cutlers, and even obliged them to employ Philistines to sharpen their tools of husbandry; but these being their masters, would make no arms for them.

The Hebrews do not appear to have had any peculiar military habit. As the flowing dress which they ordinarily wore would have impeded their movements, they girt it closely around them when preparing for battle, and loosened it on their return. 2 Sam. 20: 8. 1 Kings 20: 11. They used the same arms as the neighboring nations, both defensive and offensive; and these were made either of iron or of brass, principally of the latter metal. Of the defensive arms of the Hebrews, the following were the most remarkable: namely,

1. The helmet, for covering and defending the head. This was a part of the military provision made by Uzziah for his vast army, (2 Chron. 26: 14;) and long before the time of that king, the helmets of Saul and of the Philistine champion were of the same metal. 1 Sam. 17: 38. This military cap was also worn by the Persians, Ethiopians, and Libyans, (Ezek. 38: 5.) and by the troops which Antiochus sent against Judas Maccabæus. 1 Mac. 6: 35.

2. The breast-plate, or corslet, was another piece of defensive armor. Goliath, and the soldiers of Antiochus, (1 Sam. 17: 5. 1 Mac. 6: 35.) were accoutred with this defence; which, in our authorized translation, is variously rendered hubergeon, coat of mail, and brigandine. 1 Sam. 17: 38. 2 Chron. 26: 14. Isai. 59: 17. Jer. 46: 4. Between the joints of this harness, as it is termed in 1 Kings 22: 4, the profligate Ahab was mortally wounded by an arrow, shot at a venture. From these various renderings of the original word, it should seem that this piece of armor covered both the back and breast, but principally the latter. The corslets were made of various materials: sometimes they were made of flax or cotton, woven very thick, or of a kind of woollen felt: others again were made of iron or brazen scales, or laminae, laid one over another, like the scales of a fish; others were properly what we call coats of mail; and others were composed of two pieces of iron or brass, which protected the back and breast. All these kinds of corslets are mentioned in the Scriptures. Goliath's coat of mail, (1 Sam. 17: 5.) was literally a corslet of scales, that is, composed of numerous laminae of brass, crossing each other. It was called by Virgil, and other Latin writers, spuma lorica. Similar corslets were worn by the Persians and other nations. The breast-plate worn by the unhappy Saul, when he perished in battle, is supposed to have been of flax, or cotton, woven very close and thick. 2 Sam. 1: 9, marginal rendering.

3. The shield defended the whole body during the battle. It was of various forms, and made of wood, covered with tough hides, or of brass, and sometimes was overlaid with gold. 1 Kings 10: 16, 17. 14: 26, 27. Two sorts are mentioned in the Scriptures; namely, the tsannah, great shield or buckler, and the maginim, or smaller shield. It was much used by the Jews, Babylonians, Chaldeans, Assyrians, and Egyptians. David, who was a great warrior, often mentions a shield and buckler in his divine poems, to signify that defence and protection of heaven which he expected and experienced, and in which he reposed all his trust; (Psalm 5: 12.) and when he says, "God will with favor compass the righteous as with a shield," he seems to allude to the use of the great shield tsannah, (which is the word he uses,) with which they covered and defended their whole bodies. King Solomon caused two different sorts of shields to be made; namely, the tsannah, (which answers to clupeus among the Latins,) such a large shield as the infantry wore, and the maginim, or scuto, which were used by the horsemen, and were of a much less size. 2 Chron. 9: 15, 16. The former of these are translated targets, and are double in weight to the other. The Philistines came into the field with this weapon: so we find their formidable champion was appointed. 1 Sam. 17: 7. One bearing a shield went before him, whose proper duty it was to carry this and some other weapons, with which to furnish his master upon occasion.

The loss of the shield in fight was excessively resented by the Jewish warriors, as well as lamented by them; for it was a signal aggravation of the public mourning, that "the shield of the mighty was vilely cast away." 2 Sam. 1: 21. David, a man of arms, who composed this beautiful elegy on the death of Saul, felt how disgraceful a thing it was for soldiers to quit their shields in the field.

These honorable sentiments were not confined to the Jews. We find them prevailing among most other ancient nations, who considered it infamous to cast away or lose their shield. With the Greeks it was a capital crime, and punished with death. The Lacedæmonian women, it is well known, in order to excite the courage of their sons, used to deliver to them their fathers' shields, with this short address: "This shield thy father always preserved: do thou preserve it also, or perish." Alluding perhaps to these sentiments, St. Paul, when exhorting the Hebrew Christians to steadfastness in the faith of the gospel, urges them not to cast away their confidence, which "hath great recompense of reward." Heb. 10: 35.

4. Another defensive provision in war was the military girdle, which was for a double purpose: first, in order to hold the sword, which hung, as it does this day, at the soldier's girdle or belt: (1 Sam. 17: 39.) secondly, it was necessary to gird the clothes and the armor together. To gird and to arm are synonymous words in Scripture; for those who are said to be able to put on armor are, according to the Hebrew and the Septuagint, girt with a girdle; and hence comes the expression of "girding to the battle." 1 Kings 20: 11. Isa. 8: 9. 2 Sam. 22: 40. 1 Sam. 18: 4. There is express mention of this military girdle, where it is recorded that Jonathan, to assure David of his entire love and friendship by some visible pledges, stripped himself not only of his usual garments, but of his military habiliments, his sword, bow, and girdle, and gave them to David.

5. Boots or greaves were part of the ancient defensive harness, because it was the custom to cast certain impediments, (so called, because they entangled the feet,) in the way before the enemy. The military boot or shoe was therefore necessary to guard the legs and feet from the iron stakes placed in the way to gall and wound them; and thus we are enabled to account for Goliath's greaves of brass which were upon his legs.

The offensive weapons were of two sorts; namely, such as were employed when they came to a close engagement, and those with which they annoyed the enemy at a distance. Of the former description were the sword and the battle-axe.

1. The sword is the most ancient weapon of offence mentioned in the Bible. With it Jacob's sons treacherously assassinated the Shechemites. Gen. 34: 2. It was worn on the thigh; (Psalm 45: 4. Exod. 32: 27.) and, it would seem, on the left thigh; for it is particularly mentioned that Ehud put a dagger or short sword under his garments on his right thigh. Judges 3: 16. There appear to have been two kinds of swords in use, a larger one with one edge, which is called in Hebrew the mouh of the sword, (Joshua 6: 21.) and a shorter one with two edges, like that of Ehud. The modern Arabs, it is well known, wear a sabre on one side, and a cangiar, or dagger, in their girdles.

2. Of the battle-axe we have no description in the sacred volume: it seems to have been a most powerful weapon in the hands of cavalry, from the allusion made to it by Jeremiah: "Thou art my battle-axe and weapons of war; for with thee will I break in pieces the nations, and with thee will I destroy kingdoms: and with thee will I break in pieces the horse and his rider, and with thee will I break in pieces the chariot and his rider." Jer. 51: 20, 11.

3. The spear and javelin (as the words are variously rendered in Numb. 25: 7. 1 Sam. 13: 19, and Jer. 46: 4.)

were of different kinds, according to their length or make. Some of them might be thrown or darted; (1 Sam. 18: 11.) others were a kind of long swords, Numb. 25: 8.) and it appears from 2 Sam. 2: 23, that some of them were pointed at both ends. When armies were encamped, the spear of the general or commander-in-chief was stuck into the ground at his head.

4. Slings are enumerated among the military stores collected by Uzziah. 2 Chron. 26: 14. In the use of the sling, David eminently excelled, and he slew Goliath with a stone from one. The Benjamites were celebrated in battle because they had attained to great skill and accuracy in handling this weapon; "they could sling stones to a hair's breadth, and not miss;" (Judges 20: 16.) and where it is said that they were left-handed, it should rather be rendered ambidexters; for we are told, they could use "both the right hand and the left;" (1 Chron. 12: 2.) that is, they did not constantly use their right hand as others did, when they shot arrows or slung stones; but they were so expert in their military exercises, that they could perform them with their left hand as well as with their right.

5. Bows and arrows are of great antiquity; indeed, no weapon is mentioned so early. Thus Isaac said to Esau, "Take thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow;" Gen. 27: 3. though, it is true, these are not spoken of as used in war, but in hunting; and so they are supposed and implied before this, where it is said of Ishmael, that he became an archer, he used bows and arrows in shooting of wild beasts. Gen. 21: 20. This afterwards became so useful a weapon, that care was taken to train up the Hebrew youth to it betimes. When David had, in a solemn manner, lamented the death of king Saul, he gave orders for teaching the young men the use of the bow, (1 Sam. 1: 18.) that they might be as expert as the Philistines, by whose bows and arrows Saul and his army were slain. These were part of the military ammunition; for in those times bows were used instead of guns, and arrows supplied the place of powder and ball. From the book of Job, 20: 24, it may be collected, that the military bow was made of steel, and consequently was very stiff and hard to bend, on which account they used their foot in bending their bows; and therefore, when the prophets speak of treading the bow, and of bows trodden, they are to be understood of bows bent, as our translators rightly render it; (Jer. 50: 14. Isa. 5: 28. 21: 15.) but the Hebrew word which is used in these places, signifies to tread upon. This weapon was thought so necessary in war, that it is there called "the bow of war," or the "battle bow." Zech. 9: 10. 10: 14.

We have in Scripture, not only histories in which armor and some of its parts are described, but also allusions to complete suits of armor, and to the pieces which composed them. Without any formal attempt to expose the errors of critics, whose information on this article might have been improved by greater accuracy, Mr. Taylor furnishes the following remarks, which may contribute to our better acquaintance with the subject.

This figure, which is from Calmet, is usually offered, by way of illustrating the armor of the famous champion Goliath. As it is drawn from the description given of it, and according to the signification of the words used to describe each separate part, it may be something like the original. It should be observed, however, (1.) that swords so long as this are not known in antiquity; and that had it been of the length here represented, David would have found it cumbersome to use afterwards, constantly, as we learn he did; (2.) that this figure is composed on the principle, that the armor was worn without any other dress; which we think may be questioned, and is not easily determined; (3.) that the forms of Roman or Greek armor are not decidedly applicable to the Palestine history; yet the armor of the people has been studied for this figure.

This is a soldier in armor; from the column usually called of Antoninus, but perhaps more properly referred to Aurelius. The apostle (Eph. 6: 13, 14.) advises believers to "take unto themselves the whole armor of God;" and he separates this panoply into its parts: "your loins," says he, "girt about with truth;" now, this figure has a very strong composition of cinctures round his waist (loins); and if we suppose them to be of steel, as they appear to be, the defence they form to his person is very great; such a defence to the mind is truth. Undoubtedly there were, as we shall see, other kinds of girdles; but none that could be more thoroughly defensive than that of this soldier. Moreover, these cinctures surround the person, and go over the back, also. (1.) So truth defends on all sides. (2.) The remark that "Paul makes no armor for the back," is somewhat impaired; because if this part of the dress was what he referred to by perizosomenoi, "girded round about," then, its passing round the back, pretty high up, at least, was implied. The apostle proceeds to advise "having on the breast-plate of righteousness," to defend the vital parts: as our figure has on a breast-plate: and as one below has a covering made in one piece for the whole upper part of his body. "Having the feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;" not iron, not steel; but patient investigation, calm inquiry, assiduous, laborious, lasting; if not rather, with firm footing in the gospel of peace. Whether the apostle here alludes to the use of leather well prepared, by his "preparation of the gospel of peace," or shoes which had spikes in them, which running into the ground gave a steadfastness to the soldier who wore them, may come under remark hereafter. We shall only add, that Moses seems, at least according to our rendering, to have some allusion to shoes, either plated or spiked on the sole, when he says, (Deut. 33: 25.) "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days shall thy strength be."—"Above all, taking the shield of faith;" not above all in point of value; but of situation; over all—before; as our soldier holds his shield: for his protection. Faith may be a prime grace, but if raised too high, like a shield over-elevated, the parts it should defend may become exposed to the enemy. "Take the helmet of salvation;" security, safety. So far our figure applies; however, it has no word: it had originally a spear, but that weapon has been destroyed by time. "Praying," says the apostle, "and watching;" these are duties of soldiers, especially of Christian soldiers, but they are not of a nature to be explained by this figure; however, we very frequently meet with them in monuments of antiquity: nothing is more common than sacrifices, &c. in camps, and the very first soldiers in the Antonine pillar are sentinels. It may be remarked, that this soldier has no armor for his legs, or thighs, or arms: they are merely sheltered by clothing, but are not defended by armor. We do not find that the apostle alludes to any pieces of defence for the legs or the thighs of his Christian warrior.

This is among the most curious statues of antiquity remaining, being a portrait of Alexander the Great fighting on horseback; and probably, also, a portrait of his famous horse Bucephalus. The figure has a girdle round his waist; in which it is rather singular; and close to this girdle falls the sheath for his sword; his loins are girt about with a single piece of armor, buckled at the sides; which answers the purposes of a breast-plate, by covering high up on the thorax: his feet are not only shod, but ornamented with straps, &c. a considerable way up the leg. He has neither shield nor helmet; and Mr. Taylor remarks, that he has not found a commanding officer—a general—with a helmet on, neither during his actual engagement in fighting, as this figure is represented, nor when addressing his soldiers, though that could hardly be the fact. The form, size, &c. of this sword deserve notice; it is very different from the ideal sword of Goliath, in the first figure above. That girdles were of several kinds, we need not doubt; if we did, the entire difference between that of this figure, and that of the second above, would justify the assertion. In that, there is no room for concealing, or for carrying, any thing; but we know that one use of the girdle in the East was, and still is, to carry various articles. So we read, (2 Sam. 20: 8.) that "Joab's garment that he had put on, was girded (close) unto him, and upon it a sword-girdle, (or belt.) that is, a girdle of a military nature, fit for holding and enveloping a sword: and in this girdle was a sword in its sheath."—Then our translation (with others) says, "as he went forth, it fell out."—But it may be reasonably doubted, whether the narration is not to this effect: "He [Joab] went forth in a ceremonious manner to meet Amasa, now commander-in-chief, in order to seem to do to that officer, whom he considered as usurping his post, a most conspicuous honor, or rather homage, but really designing to approach his person and to slay him, so he went forth, and supplicated, humbly entreated, as it were; then, after this homage, he kissed Amasa's beard, and slew him. This entreaty is the regular meaning of the word terel. See 1 Kings 8: 28, 29, 33, 35. Gen. 20: 7, 17. Numb. 11: 2. 1 Sam. 1: 10. 2: 25, &c. Notwithstanding that there was much hypocritical baseness in Joab's behavior, with which this view of the events is in perfect coincidence, we ought to observe, that a sword might fall out of the girdle which contained it; for so we are told by Herodotus, that the sword of Cambyses fell out of the girdle, and wounded him in the thigh, of which wound he died: but if Joab's sword had fallen out of his girdle, how was it possible it should escape the notice of Amasa? Such an incident was the very thing to make him, and all other spectators, observe more particularly what became of his sword, and how Joab should dispose of it, after he had picked it off the ground.

We read of swords having two edges, and of the great execution expected to be done by them. See Psalm 149: 6. and Prov. 5: 4. That a sword so short as that of this figure might have two edges, seems probable enough, while that of Goliath would be both the weaker and the worse for such a form. The sharp sword issuing out of the mouth of our Lord, (Rev. 2: 12.) will be noticed elsewhere; we only observe here, that to imagine a long sword issuing out of the mouth of a person, suggests a very awkward image, or idea, to say the least: an idea which hardly could have its prototype in nature.

The nature of the embarrassments arising from this history being understood, the reader is requested to examine the annexed engraving, which represents a combat between a person on horseback and another on foot: it is from Montfaucon, (Supplement, vol. iii. page 397.) who thus remarks on it: "The horseman represented on an Etruscan vase of Cardinal Gualteri, is armed in such a singular manner, that I thought it necessary to give the figure here. This horseman is mounted on a naked horse with only a bridle: though the horse seems to have something on his neck, which passes between his two ears, but it is impossible to distinguish what it is." "The armor also of this horseman is as extraordinary as that of the Samaritan horseman on Trajan's pillar. His military habit is very close, and fitted to his body, and covers him even to his wrist, and below his ankles, so that his feet remain naked; which is very extraordinary. For, I think, both in the ancient and modern cavalry, the feet were a principal part which they guarded; excepting only the Moorish horse, who have for their whole dress only a short tunic, which reaches to the middle of the thigh; and the Numidians, who ride quite naked, upon a naked horse, except a short cloak which they have fastened to their neck, and hanging loose behind them in warm weather, and which they wrap about themselves in cold weather. Our Etruscan horseman here hath his feet naked; but he hath his head well covered with a cap folded about it, and large slips of stuff hanging down from it. He wears a collar of round stones. The close bodied coat he wears, is wrought all over with zigzags and large points, down to the girdle; which is broad, and tied round the middle of his body; the same flourishing is continued lower down his habit quite to his ankle, and all over his arms to his wrist. He brandishes his spear against his adversary, who is a naked man on foot, who nath only a helmet on, and holds a large oval shield in his left hand, and a spear in his right, which he darts at his enemy, without being frightened at his being so well equipped. The horseman, besides his spear, hath a sword fastened to his belt, or breast-girdle. The hilt of his sword terminates in a bird's head. Behind the man on foot, is a man well dressed, with his hat (which is like the modern ones) falling from his head. He is the esquire of the horseman; and holds a spear ready for him, which he may take if he happens to break his own." This may assist our inquiries on the subject of the close coat of Saul's armor. (1.) This being an Etruscan vase, is probably of pretty deep antiquity; as vases of the kind were not manufactured in later ages. (2.) These vases have, very often, histories depicted on them, referring to eastern nations: they have events, deities, fables, &c. as well as dresses, derived from Asia; whence the Etruscans were a colony. We risk little, therefore, in supposing that our subject is ancient, even advancing towards the time of king Saul; and that it is also Asiatic. Our next inquiry is, What it represents?—Certainly we may consider the person on horseback as no common cavalier; he is an officer at least, probably a general; if not rather a king: in which case, this is the very common subject of a king vanquishing an enemy; a subject which occurs in numerous instances on gems, medals, &c. as is well known to antiquaries. But the peculiarities of his dress are what demand our present attention. (1.) His coat is so close as to cover his whole person. (2.) It seems to have marks which, though they may be ornaments, yet are analogous to quiltings, and raise that idea strongly. Now supposing, that under these quiltings is a connected chain of iron rings, extending throughout the whole, it presents a dress well known in later ages, and, as this example proves, in times of remote antiquity; and to which agree the words used in describing Saul's shebetz, as already noticed.

In order further to justify these conjectures on the nature of the defence afforded by Saul's coat of mail, Mr. Taylor copied one of the Samaritan horsemen from the Trajan pillar. This dress, it will be seen, is wholly composed of scales, and fits the wearer with consummate accuracy; even his feet and his hands are covered with scales: and though his dress is divided into two parts, one for his body, the other for his legs, yet the whole shows not only his shape, but also every muscle of his body. This dress was made of horny substances, such as horses' hoofs, (Pausanias Attic. cap. 21.) or other materials of equal toughness and hardness: but scaly coats of mail were frequently made of iron, and, very commonly, we find parts of armor of defence imbricated in this manner. On the whole, these instances appear to justify the principle, that the shebetz of Saul should keep its proper import in the narrative of that king's death, as an embroidered coat, or coat wrought with oilet holes—a close coat, fitting tightly to his person; and if this close coat held in—detained—his life, so that he could not die speedily, though dreadfully wounded, we see the reason of his desiring the Amalekite to finish him. We see, too, how the arrows of the Philistines might penetrate some way into his body, yet not destroy his life immediately; we see how the Philistines might abuse him, in tearing this coat from him, and otherwise ill-treating his person, as a Hebrew, as well as a king, while yet alive, which he feared;—how they might distinguish the corpse of Saul by this coat, although his crown and bracelet were absent when they came to strip the slain, &c.—It will be recollected that Saul himself was the tallest man in Israel, and therefore would easily be distinguished; but nothing similar is said of his sons; their corpses would probably be known by what the modern Persians term bazibonds; the "bracelet" of our translators. "They are," says Mr. Morier, (Second Journey, p. 173.) "ornaments fastened above the elbows; composed of precious stones of great value, and are only worn by the king and his sons." In the portrait of the king of Persia, at the India-House, they form a striking appendage.—Calmet; Watson.

ARMY. Few things in history are more surprising than the great numbers which are recorded as forming eastern armies; even the Scripture accounts of the armies that invaded Judea, or were raised in Judea, often excite the wonder of their readers. To parallel these great numbers by those of other armies, is not all that is acceptable to the inquisitive; it is requisite also to show how so small a province as the Holy Land really was, could furnish such mighty armies of fighting men; with the uncertainty of the proportion of these fighting men to the whole number of the nation; in respect to which, many unfounded conjectures have escaped the pens of the learned. With a view to this, Mr. Taylor has made a not unsuccessful attempt, by adducing instances of numerous armies which have been occasionally raised, to show what may be done by despotic power, or the impulse of military glory; and also that the composition of Asiatic armies is such as may render credible those numbers which express their gross amount; while no just inference respecting the entire population of a country can be drawn from the numbers stated as occasionally composing its armies.

We learn from Xenophon, (Cyrop. lib. iv.) "that most of the inhabitants of Asia are attended in their military expeditions by those whom they live with at home."—"The army brought chariots which they had taken;—some of them full of the most considerable women, . . . for to this day all the inhabitants of Asia, in time of war, attend the service accompanied with what they value most; and they say, that they fight the better when the objects most dear to them are present." We may now, remarks Mr. Taylor, form a better notion of the policy of Barak, in stipulating for the presence of the prophetess who judged Israel with his army. Judges 4:6. She was a public person, was well known to all Israel, and her appearance would no less stimulate the valor of the troops to "fight the better for an object most dear to them," than it would sanction the undertaking determined on and executed against an oppressor so powerful as Jabin, king of Canaan.

This notion may be extended somewhat further; for Deborah in her triumphant song supposes that Sisera's mother attributed the delay in his return to the great number of captives—female captives—taken from the enemy—"to every man a damsel, or two;"—families of the warriors of Israel, taken prisoners in their camp, equally with seizures made in the villages and towns. Whether this be correct or not, no striking objection seems to oppose it—and we are sure that the presence of women of rank in the camps of the orientals was not uncommon. Every body is acquainted with the generosity of Alexander in the tent of Darius, when the royal family of Persia became his captives; and the story of Panthea is so beautifully told by Xenophon, (Cyrop. lib. v.) that if it be already familiar to the reader, he cannot be displeased with its repetition. The generosity of Alexander might emulate, but it could not excel, the generosity of Cyrus. "When we first entered her tent, (that of Panthea,) we did not know her; for she was sitting on the ground, with all her women-servants around her, and was dressed in the same manner as her servants were: but when we looked around, being desirous to know which was the mistress, she immediately appeared to excel all the others, though she was sitting with a veil over her, and looking down upon the ground. When we bid her arise, she and the servants around her rose. Standing in a dejected posture, her tears fell at her feet," &c. This idea of women attending soldiers, contributes an illustration to a verse in that sufficiently obscure effusion, Psalm 68: 12.

Kings of armies did flee, did flee,
And she who tarried at home divided the spoil.

1. Whenever there was an immediate prospect of war, a levy was made by the genealogists. Deut. 20: 5-9. In the time of the kings, there was a head or ruler of the persons that made the levy, who kept an account of the number of the soldiers, but who is, nevertheless, to be distinguished from the generalissimo. 2 Chron. 26: 11. (Compare 2 Sam. 8: 17, 20: 25. 1 Chron. 18: 16.) After the levy was fully made out, the genealogists gave public notice, that the following persons might be excused from military service: (Deut. 20: 5—8.) 1. Those who had built a house, and had not yet inhabited it. 2. Those who had planted an olive or vine garden, and had not as yet tasted the fruit of it;—an exemption, consequently, which extended through the first five years after such planting. 3. Those who had bargained for a spouse, but had not celebrated the nuptials; also those who had not as yet lived with their wife for a year. 4. The faint-hearted, who would be likely to discourage others, and who, if they had gone into battle, where, in those early times, every thing depended on personal prowess, would only have fallen victims.

2. At the head of each rank or file of fifty, was the captain of fifty. The other divisions consisted of a hundred, a thousand, and ten thousand men, each one of which was headed by its appropriate commander. These divisions ranked in respect to each other according to their families, and were subject to the authority of the heads of those families. 2 Chron. 25: 5, 26: 12, 13. The centurions, and chiliarchs, or captains of thousands, were admitted into the councils of war. 1 Chron. 13: 1—3. 1 Sam. 18: 13. The leader of the whole army was denominated the captain of the host. The genealogists, (in the English version, officers), according to a law in Deut. 20: 9, had the right of appointing the persons who were to act as officers in the army; and they, undoubtedly, made it a point, in their selections, to choose those who are called heads of families. The practice of thus selecting military officers ceased under the kings. Some of them were then chosen by the king, and in other instances the office became permanent and hereditary in the heads of families. Both kings and generals had armor-bearers. They were chosen from the bravest of the soldiery, and not only bore the arms of their masters, but were employed to give his commands to the subordinate captains, and were present at his side in the hour of peril. 1 Sam. 14: 6, 17: 7. The infantry, the cavalry, and the chariots of war were so arranged, as to make separate divisions of an army. Exod. 14: 6, 7. The infantry were divided likewise into light-armed troops, gedudim, and into spearmen. Gen. 49: 19. 1 Sam. 30: 8, 15, 23. 2 Sam. 3: 22. 4: 2. 22: 30. Psalm 18: 30. 2 Kings 5: 2. Hosea 7: 1. The light-armed infantry were furnished with a sling and javelin, with a bow, arrows, and quiver, and also, at least in latter times, with a buckler. They fought the enemy at a distance. The spearmen, on the contrary, who were armed with spears, swords, and shields, fought hand to hand. 1 Chron. 12: 24, 34. 2 Chron. 14: 8. 17: 17. The light-armed troops were commonly taken from the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin. 2 Chron. 14: 8. 17: 17. Compare Gen. 49: 27. Psalm 78: 9.

3. The art of laying out an encampment appears to have been well understood in Egypt, long before the departure of the Hebrews from that country. It was there that Moses became acquainted with that mode of encamping, which, in the second chapter of Numbers, is prescribed to the Hebrews. In the encampment of the Israelites, it appears that the holy tabernacle occupied the centre. In reference to this circumstance, it may be remarked, that it is the common practice in the East, for the prince or leader of a tribe to have his tent pitched in the centre of the others; and it ought not to be forgotten, that God, whose tent or palace was the holy tabernacle, was the prince, the leader of the Hebrews. The tents nearest to the tabernacle were those of the Levites, whose business it was to watch it, in the manner of a pretorian guard. The family of Gershom pitched to the west, that of Kehath to the south, that of Merari to the north. The priests occupied a position to the east, opposite to the entrance of the tabernacle. Numb. 1: 53; 3: 21—38. At some distance to the east, were the tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun; on the south were those of Reuben, Simeon, and Gad; to the west were Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin; to the north, Dan, Asher, and Naphtali. The people were thus divided into four bodies, three tribes to a division; each of which divisions had its separate standard, denel. Each of the large family associations likewise, of which the different tribes were composed, had a separate standard, termed, in contradistinction from the other, avet; and every Hebrew was obliged to number himself with his particular division, and follow his appropriate standard. Of military standards, there were,—1. The standard, denominated denel; one of which pertained to each of the four general divisions. The four standards of this name were large, and ornamented with colors in white, purple, crimson, and dark blue. The Jewish rabbins assert, (founding their statement on Genesis 49: 3, 9, 17, 22, which in this case is very doubtful authority,) that the first of these standards, namely, that of Judah, bore a lion; the second, or that of Reuben, bore a man; that of Ephraim, which was the third, displayed the figure of a bull; while that of Dan, which was the fourth, exhibited the representation of cherubim. They were wrought into the standards with embroidered work. 2. The standard, called avet. The ensign of this name belonged to the separate classes of families. 3. The standard, called nem. This standard was not, like the others, borne from place to place. It appears from Numb. 21: 8, 9, that it was a long pole fixed into the earth. A flag was fastened to its top, which was agitated by the wind, and seen at a great distance. Jer. 4: 6, 21. 51: 2, 12, 27. Ezek. 27: 7. In order to render it visible, as far as possible, it was erected on lofty mountains, and was in this way used as a signal to assemble soldiers. It no sooner made its appearance on such an elevated position, than the war-cry was uttered, and the trumpets were blown. Isa. 5: 26. 13: 2. 18: 3. 30: 17. 49: 22. 62: 10—13.

4. Before battle, the various kinds of arms were put into the best order; the shields were anointed, and the soldiers refreshed themselves by taking food, lest they should become weary and faint under the pressure of their labors. Jer. 46: 3, 4. Isa. 21: 5. The soldiers, more especially the generals and kings, except when they wished to remain unknown, (1 Kings 22: 30—34.) were clothed in splendid habiliments, which are denominated the sacred dress. Ps. 110: 3. It was the duty of the priests, before the commencement of the battle, to exhort the Hebrews to exhibit that courage which was required by the exigency of the occasion. The words which they used were as follows:—“Hear, O Israel; ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies; let not your hearts faint; fear not, and do not tremble; neither be ye terrified, because of them. For the Lord your God is he that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies, to save you.” Deut. 22: 2, &c. The last ceremony, previous to an engagement, was the sounding of the sacred trumpets by the priests. Numb. 10: 9, 10. 2 Chron. 13: 12—14. 1 Macc. 3: 64.

5. In the reign of David, the Hebrews acquired such skill in the military art, together with such strength, as gave them a decided superiority over their competitors on the field of battle. David increased the standing army, which Saul had introduced. Solomon introduced cavalry into the military force of the nation, also chariots. Both cavalry and chariots were retained in the subsequent age; an age, in which military arms were improved in their construction, the science of fortification made advances, and large armies were mustered. From this period, till the time when the Hebrews became subject to the Assyrians and Chaldeans, but little improvement was made in the arts of war. The Maccabees, after the return of the Hebrews from the captivity, gave a new existence to the military art among them. But their descendants were under the necessity of submitting to the superior power of the Romans. (See BATTLE.)—Calmet; Watson.

ARNAULD, (HENRY), was born in 1597, and, after having been entrusted with important missions to Rome and other Italian courts, was made bishop of Angers in 1649, and thenceforth devoted himself strictly to the performance of his episcopal duties. His piety and charity were exemplary, and the only time during nearly half a century, that he quitted his diocese, was to reconcile the prince of Tarento with his father. To a friend who told him he ought to take one day in the week for recreation, he replied, I will readily do so, if you will point out any day in which I am not a bishop. This worthy prelate died in 1692 deeply lamented by his flock. His Negotiations in Italy were published, in 1738, in five volumes.

ARNAULD, (ΑΡΝΑΟΥ,) brother of Henry, was born at Paris in 1612; studied at the colleges of Calvi, on the Sorbonne, and took his doctor's degree in 1641. He was a distinguished Jansenist, and attacked in succession the Jesuits and the Calvinists, or Protestants. He had also a contest with Malbranche. He belonged to the celebrated society of Port Royal, and was an intimate friend of Pascal. His enemies compelled him to leave France, and he closed his life at Brussels, in the Netherlands, in 1694.

Arnauld was a man of extensive erudition. He was an indefatigable and excellent writer. His works, which extend to no less than forty-five quarto volumes, embrace a great variety of subjects, literary and philosophical, as well as theological. He was of an impetuous disposition, though in social life his manners were mild and simple. His religious sentiments partook of the sublimity of his genius. When past seventy years of age, having requested his friend Nicole to assist him in executing a new work he had projected, Nicole remonstrated, on the ground that their advanced age might well allow them to rest. Rest! exclaimed Arnauld, will you not have all eternity to rest in?—Ency. Amer.

ARNOLD, (JOHN;) a Lutheran minister of distinguished piety, whose work, entitled True Christianity, has been translated into many languages, and obtained a most extensive circulation. He was born at Ballenstedt in Anhalt, in 1555, and died in 1621, at Zelle, after having officiated in various places, and suffered persecution both from the Lutherans and the Calvinists. A few hours before his death, he preached from Ps. 120: 5, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy;" and on arriving at his house, he spoke of it as his funeral sermon. The influence of his writings, in fostering a spirit of seriousness in religion, is perhaps unequalled.—Henderson's Buck.

ARNOBIUS; about A. D. 300, a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca Veneria, in Numidia; and, in 303, became a Christian. While yet a catechumen, he wrote seven books, Adversus Gentes, in which he defended the Christian religion, and showed the folly and absurdity of heathenism with great spirit and learning, though his knowledge of the truth appears to have been somewhat defective.

ARNOLD, (OF BRESCIA;) a disciple of Abelard and Berengarius, an eminent reformer of the twelfth century. In 1130, by his bold and lofty spirit, his knowledge of Christian antiquities, and the vehement eloquence of his public harangues, he roused Italy, France and Switzerland against the abuses of the Roman church and clergy, and even converted the pope's legate to his opinions. He was charged with heresy, and, together with his adherents, (called Arnoldists,) was excommunicated by Innocent II.; but it is probable, says Davenport, his real crime was his having taught, that the church ought to be divested of its worldly possessions, and reduced to its primitive simplicity. Dr. Wall allows that he was condemned, along with Peter de Bruys, for rejecting infant baptism. In 1144, he appeared at Rome, and there elevated the standard of civil and clerical reform, with such success, as to gain even the Roman senate; and for ten years possessed the chief power in the "eternal city." Adrian IV. succeeded, however, in expelling him in 1155, by laying an interdict on the city. The reformer retired to Tuscany, but was there seized and taken back to Rome, where he died by the hands of the executioner, the same year; being excommunicated, crucified, and burned.

Such was the fate of a man who is universally acknowledged to have been possessed of extraordinary erudition and eloquence, and of an irreproachable character. But the spirit of his doctrine descended through succeeding ages, and his memory is now both admired and revered. He is classed by Benedict among the most distinguished of the ancient Baptists.—Mosheim; New Edin. Ency.; Ency. Amer.; Davenport; Jones's History of the Christian Church.

ARNOLDISTS; a denomination in the twelfth century, which derive their name from Arnold of Brescia. Having observed the calamities that sprang from the opulence of the pontiffs and bishops, they maintained publicly, that the treasures and revenues of popes, bishops, and monasteries ought to be solemnly transferred to the rulers of each state; and that nothing was to be left to the ministers of the gospel, but a spiritual authority, and a subsistence, drawn from tithes, and from the voluntary oblations of the people. They thus took a noble stand on that fundamental principle of our Savior, "My kingdom is not of this world." The Arnoldists did not differ from the Waldenses. (See WALDENSES.)

The denomination, Arnoldists, was also conferred on the followers of one Arnold, of Villeneuve, a physician, in the fourteenth century. He was eminently skilled in chemistry, natural philosophy, and literature, which occasioned him to be taken, by the ignorant monks, for a magician; and he, in return, it is said, had so bad an opinion of the monks, that he thought they would "all be damned." This was his heresy, for which he was burnt by the Inquisition; happily for him, however, not till after he was dead.—Williams; Mosheim's Eccl. Hist., vol. iii. p. 162; Bell's Wanderings, p. 136.

ARNON; a river frequently mentioned in Scripture, (Deut. 2: 24, &c.) and which rises in the mountains of Gilead or Moab, and runs by a north-west course into the eastern part of the Dead sea. It is now called Wady Mod-jeb, and divides the province of Belka from that of Kerek, as it formerly divided the kingdom of the Moabites and Amorites.—Calmet.

AROER; a city of Gad, partly situate on a mountain on the north bank of the Arnon, at the extremity of the country which the Hebrews possessed eastward of the Jordan. Numb. 32: 34. Burckhardt says it is now called Araayr. It seems to have consisted of two parts, the one on the bank of the river, and the other on an island formed by it. Hence the phrase, "The city in the midst of the river."—Reland thinks that there was another city of this name, near Rabbah of the Ammonites, or Philadelphia; and that this is the Aroer meant, Josh. 13: 25. Judg. 11: 33. Aroer, in Hebrew, signifies heath; and it is, therefore, probable that several places were so named.

ARONA; a district beyond Jordan, along the river Arnon. ARPAD, or ARPHAD; a town in Scripture always associated with Hamath, the Epiphania of the Greeks, (2 Kings 18: 34, &c.) and probably the Arphas noticed in Josephus, as limiting the provinces of Galgalitis, Gualanitis, Batanæ, and Trachonitis, north-east, (Bel. l. 3. c. 2.) and the Raphan or Raphanæa, which Stephens places near Epiphania.—Calmet.

ARPHAXAD; son of Shem, and father of Salah; born A. M. 1648, one year after the deluge; died A. M. 2096, aged four hundred and thirty-eight years. Gen. 11: 12, &c.

ARRHABONARII; a sect who held that the eucharist is neither the real flesh or blood of Christ, nor yet the sign of them, but only the pledge or earnest thereof.—Buck.

ARROW. (See ARMS.) Divination with arrows was a method of presaging future events, practised by the ancients. Ezekiel, 21: 21, informs us, that Nebuchadnezzar, putting himself at the head of his armies, to march against Zedekiah, king of the Jews, and against the king of the Ammonites, stood at the parting of two ways, to mingle his arrows together in a quiver, in order to divine from thence which way he should march. Jerome, Theodoret, and the modern commentators after them, believe that this prince took several arrows, and upon each of them wrote the name of the king, town, or province which he was to attack: for example, upon one, Jerusalem; upon another, Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites; and upon another, Egypt, &c. After having put these into a quiver, he shook them together, and then drew them out; and the arrow which was drawn was thought to declare the will of the gods to attack first that city, province, or kingdom, with whose name it was inscribed.

The word ARROW is often taken figuratively for lightning, and other meteors, (the same as the heathen would call the thunderbolts of their Jupiter,) but there is a passage, (Psalm 91: 5.) where it has been thought dubious whether it should be taken literally, for war, or figuratively, for some natural evil:

Thou shalt have no occasion of fear,
From the dread, by night;
From the arrow that flieth by day;
From the pestilence in darkness waiting;
From the cutting off which destroys at noon-day.

The word rendered pestilence, seems to import a commission—a spoken-to—evil, from debir, to speak; but Parkhurst derives it from driving, an evil which drives men to their graves. The former derivation is most usual; but both senses may coalesce in this example. The cutting off (keren) is used for pestilence, in Deut. 32: 24. and Mr. Taylor conceives that the arrow in this passage means the pestilence also; and that the following lines are exegetical: an idea which is confirmed by two or three passages, which imply, that the Arabs denote the pestilence, by an allusion to this flying weapon. The following is from Busbequius: (Eng. edit.) "I desired to remove to a less contagious air. . . . I received from Solyman, the emperor, this message: that the emperor wondered what I meant, in desiring to remove my habitation. Is not the pestilence God's arrow, which will always hit his mark? If God would visit me herewith, how could I avoid it? Is not the plague, said he, in my own palace, and yet I do not think of removing?" We find the same opinion expressed in Smith's Remarks, &c. on the Turks: (p. 109.) "What, say they, is not the plague the dart of Almighty God? and can we escape the blow he levels at us? is not his hand steady to hit the persons he aims at? can we run out of his sight, and beyond his power?" So Herbert, (p. 99.) speaking of Curroon, says, "that year his empire was so wounded with God's arrows of plague, pestilence, and famine, as this thousand years before was never so terrible." See Ezek. 5: 15. "When I send upon them the evil arrows of famine," &c.—Watson; Calmet.

ARSENAL. The ancient Hebrews had each man his own arms, because all went to the wars; they had no arsenals, or magazines of arms, because they had no regular troops, or soldiers, in constant pay. There were no arsenals in Israel, till the reigns of David and Solomon. David made a large collection of arms, and consecrated them to the Lord, in his tabernacle. The high-priest Jehoiada took them out of the treasury of the temple, to arm the people and Levites, on the day of the young king Joash's elevation to the throne. 2 Chron. 23: 9. Solomon collected a great quantity of arms in his palace of the forest of Lebanon, and established well-provided arsenals in all the cities of Judah, which he fortified. 2 Chron. 11: 12. He sometimes enforced the conquered and tributary people to forge arms for him. 1 Kings 10: 25. Uzziah not only furnished his arsenals with spears, helmets, shields, cuirasses, swords, bows, and slings, but also with such machines as were proper for sieges. Hezekiah had the same precaution; he made stores of arms of all sorts. Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus had arsenals stored with good arms; not only such as had been taken from their enemies, but others which they had purchased, or commissioned to be forged for them.—Calmet.

ARTAXERXES, or AHASUERUS; a king of Persia, the husband of Esther, who, in the opinion of the learned Usher and Calmet, was the Darius of profane writers. (See AHASUERUS.)

II. ARTAXERXES LONGIMANUS, is supposed by Dr. Prideaux to be the Ahaserus of Esther. He was the son of Xerxes, and grandson of Darius Hystaspes, and reigned in Persia from the year of the world 3531 to 3579. He permitted Ezra, with all those inclined to follow him, to return into Judea, in the year of the world 3537. Ezra 7: 8. Afterwards, Nehemiah also obtained leave to return, and to build the walls and gates of Jerusalem, in the year of the world 3550. Nehem. 1: 11. From this year, chronologists reckon the beginning of Daniel's seventy weeks. Daniel 11: 29. These are weeks of years, and make four hundred and ninety years. Dr. Prideaux, who discourses very copiously, and with great learning, on this prophecy, maintains that the decree mentioned in it for the restoring and rebuilding of Jerusalem, cannot be understood of that granted to Nehemiah, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes; but of that granted to Ezra, by the same Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign. From that time to the death of Christ, are exactly four hundred and ninety years, to a month: for in the month Nisan, the decree was granted to Ezra; and in the middle of the same month Nisan, Christ suffered, just four hundred and ninety years afterwards.

The easterns think that the surname of Longimanus was given to Artaxerxes by reason of the extent of his dominions; as it is commonly said that princes have long hands: but the Greeks maintain that this prince had really longer hands or arms than usual; and that, when he stood upright, he could touch his knees. He is said to have been the handsomest man of his time. The eastern people call him Bahaman, and give him the surname of Ard-schir-diraz-dest, or the long-handed. He was the son of Asferdian, sixth king of the second dynasty of the Persians. After having extinguished the family of Rostam, which was formidable to him on account of the great men who composed it, he carried his arms into the western provinces, Mesopotamia and Syria, which formed part of his empire. He took Babylon from Belshazzar, son of Nebuchadnezzar; and he put in his place Kiresch, who by us is called Cyrus. Some Persian historians assert, that the mother of Artaxerxes was a Jewess, of the tribe of Benjamin, and family of Saul; and that the most beloved of his wives was of the tribe of Judah, and race of Solomon, by Rehoboam, king of Judah. If this be true, we need not wonder that he should recommend to Cyrus to favor the Jewish nation. This Cyrus performed, by sending back the people into their own country, and permitting them to rebuild their temple. But the truth of this story is doubtful; and were it true, the interference of the special providence of God must still be acknowledged. Artaxerxes reigned forty-seven years, and died in the year of the world, 3579, and before Jesus Christ, 425.—Watson.

ARTAXERXES; a name given by Ezra to the Magus, called by Justin, Oropastes; by Herodotus, Smerdis; by Æschylus, Mardus; and by Ctesias, Sphendadates. After the death of Cambyses, he usurped the government of Persia, pretending to be Smerdis, son of Cyrus, whom Cambyses had put to death. This is the Artaxerxes who wrote to his governors beyond the Euphrates, signifying, that having received their advices relating to the Jews, he required them to forbid the Jews from rebuilding Jerusalem. Thus, from A. M. 3483, the Jews did not dare to forward the repairs of the city walls, till 3550; when Nehemiah obtained permission to rebuild them, from Artaxerxes Longimanus. Neh. 1: 2.—Calmet.

ARTEMAS; St. Paul's disciple, who was sent by that apostle into Crete, in the room of Titus, chap. 3: 12, while he continued with St. Paul at Nicopolis, where he passed the winter. We know nothing particular of the life or death of Artemas; but the employment to which he was appointed by the apostle is a proof of his great merit.

ARTEMIUS; a distinguished martyr of the fourth century. He was commander-in-chief of the Roman forces in Egypt. He was accused by the pagans, 1st. of having demolished several idols in the reign of Constantine the Great; and 2d. of assisting the bishop of Alexandria in plundering the temples. Being summoned before the emperor Julian, to answer these charges, he confessed them, and owned his faith, upon which he was deprived of his commonwealth and estate, and finally beheaded.—Fox.

ARTEMONITES; a denomination in the second century; so called from Artemon, who taught that, at the birth of the man Christ, a certain divine energy united itself to him. He was a Unitarian, of the same principles as Theodotus, (the tanner,) Paul of Samosata, and the modern Socinians.—Moshem's Ecl. Hist. vol. p. 235; Milner's Church Hist. vol. i. p. 256; Lardner's Heretic, pp. 360—362.—Williams.

ARTICLE OF FAITH, is, by some, defined a point of Christian doctrine, which we are obliged to believe, as having been revealed by God himself, and allowed and established as such by the church. (See CONFESIONS.)

ARTICLES, FIVE, OF PERTH; to which James I., by intrigues and threatenings, procured the sanction of the general assembly and the Scottish parliament. They were,—1st. Kneeling at the sacrament: 2d. Private communion: 3d. Private baptism: 4th. Confirmation of children; and 5th. The observation of holidays.

ARTICLES OF SMALCALD; certain articles drawn up at that place by Luther, on occasion of the meeting of the electors, princes, and states. They were principally designed to show how far the Lutherans were disposed to go in order to avoid a final rupture, and in what sense they were willing to adopt the doctrine of Christ's presence in the eucharist. The terms in which they are expressed are somewhat dubious, and not so harsh and irritating as those employed in the Confession, the Apology, and the Form of Concord.—Henderson's Buck.

ARTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. (See CHURCH OF ENGLAND.)

ARTICLES, LAMBETH. The Lambeth articles were so called, because drawn up at Lambeth palace, under the eye, and with the assistance, of archbishop Whitgift, bishop Bancroft, bishop Vaughan, and other eminent dignitaries of the church. That the reader may judge how Calvinistic the clergy were under the reign of queen Elizabeth, we shall here insert them. "1. God hath from eternity predestinated certain persons to life, and hath reprobated certain persons unto death. 2. The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith, or of perseverance, or of good works, or of any thing that is in the persons predestinated; but the alone will of God's good pleasure. 3. The predestination are pre-determined and certain number, which can neither be lessened nor increased. 4. Such as are not predestinated to salvation shall inevitably be condemned on account of their sins. 5. The true, lively, and justifying faith, and the Spirit of God justifying, is not extinguished, doth not utterly fail, doth not vanish away in the elect, either finally or totally. 6. A true believer, that is, one who is endowed with justifying faith, is certified by the full assurance of faith that his sins are forgiven, and that he shall be everlastingly saved by Christ. 7. Saving grace is not allowed, is not imparted, is not granted to all men, by which they may be saved, if they will. 8. No man is able to come to Christ, unless it be given him, and unless the Father draw him; and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to his Son. 9. It is not in the will or power of every man to be saved." What gave occasion to the framing these articles was this:—Some persons had distinguished themselves at the university of Cambridge by opposing predestination. Alarmed at the opinions that were vented, the above-mentioned archbishop, with others, composed these articles, to prevent the belief of a contrary doctrine. These, when completed, were sent down to Cambridge, to which the scholars were strictly enjoined to conform.

ARTICLES, SIX; an act which passed both houses of parliament, and obtained the assent of Henry VIII., by which the whole body of popery was restored, and which consisted of the following points:—That in the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, but the natural body and blood of Christ; that communion in both kinds is not necessary; that priests, according to the law of God, may not marry; that vows of chastity ought to be observed; that private masses ought to be continued; and that auricular confession is expedient and necessary, and ought to be retained in the church. Archbishop Cranmer made a noble stand against this act while it was passing the house of lords, and disputed every inch of ground; but all his efforts were ineffectual.—Henderson's Buck.

ARTICLE, GREEK. Horne, in his Introduction, speaking of the signification of words and phrases, lays down the two following rules;

FIRST. Emphases, in the sacred Scriptures, are to be sought, sometimes in words, in particles, and also in the Greek article. Instances of the latter emphasis are found in Matt. 26: 28. Matt. 16: 16. John 1: 21. and John 10: 11.

SECOND. When two or more personal nouns of the same gender, number, and case, are connected by the copulative kai (and); if the first has the definitive article, and the second, third, &c. have not, they both relate to the same person. Examples of this rule occur in 2 Cor. 1: 3. 1 Cor. 15: 24. Ephes. 5: 5. 2 Thess. 1: 12. 1 Tim. 5: 21. Tit. 2: 13. 2 Pet. 1: 1. Jude 4; and altogether furnish a most striking body of evidence in behalf of the divinity of our Savior.

The importance and force of the Greek article are fully illustrated in the late Mr. Granville Sharp's Remarks on the Uses of the Definitive Article of the Greek Text of the New Testament, 12mo. 1803; in Dr. Wordsworth Letters to Mr. Sharp; and especially in Dr. Middleton's Doctrine of the Greek Article, 8vo. 1808; and the Supplementary Researches of Mr. Hugh Stuart Boyd, inserted in Dr. A.

Clarke's Commentary on Ephes. 6, and at the end of his Commentary on the Epistle to Titus. In the latter, Mr. Boyd has combated and refuted the philosophical objections of Unitarians.—Horne's Introduction.

ARTOTYRITES, (bread and cheese eaters;) a branch of the Montanists, in the second century, who are charged with eating bread and cheese in the eucharist. It is asserted that they did this in imitation of Ebel, of whom it is said, (Gen. 4: 4.) he "brought of the firstling of his flock, and the fat thereof;" which, it is possible, they might interpret, of their milk, or rather cream, as Grotius has since done. But it is very possible that they might do this in their love-feasts, rather than the eucharist.

The Artotyrites admitted women to the priesthood and episcopacy; and Epiphanius tells us that it was a common thing to see seven girls at once enter into their church robed in white, and holding a torch in their hands; where they wept and bewailed the wretchedness of human nature, and the miseries of this life.—Williams; Buck.

ARTS. The arts, which are now brought to such an admirable state of perfection, it is universally allowed, must have originated partly in necessity and partly in accident. At first, they must have been very imperfect and very limited; but the inquisitive and active mind of man, seconded by his wants, soon secured to them a greater extent and fewer imperfections. Accordingly, in the fourth generation after the creation of man, we find mention made of artificers in brass and iron, and also of musical instruments. Gen. 4: 21, 22. Those communities which, from local or other causes, could not flourish by means of agriculture, would necessarily direct their attention to the encouragement and improvement of the arts. These consequently advanced with great rapidity, and were carried to a high pitch as far back as the time of Noah; as we may learn from the very large vessel built under his direction, the construction of which shows that they must have been well acquainted with some at least of the mechanical arts. They had also, without doubt, seen the operations of artificers in other ways besides that of building, and, after the deluge, imitated their works as well as they could. Hence it is, that shortly after that event, we find mention made of utensils, ornaments, and many other things which imply a knowledge of the arts. Compare 9: 21. 11: 1—9. 12: 7, 8. 14: 1—16. 17: 10. 18: 4—6. 19: 32. 31: 19, 27, 34.

Egypt in the early ages of the world excelled all other nations in a knowledge of the arts. The Hebrews, in consequence of remaining four hundred years with the Egyptians, must have become initiated to a considerable degree into that knowledge which their masters possessed. Hence we find among them men who were sufficiently skilful and informed to frame, erect, and ornament the tabernacle. Moses, it is true, did not enact any special laws in favor of the arts, nor did he interdict or lessen them in the eyes of the people; on the contrary, he speaks in the praise of artificers. Exod. 35: 30—35. 36: 38: 22, 23, &c. The grand object of Moses, in a temporal point of view, was to promote agriculture, and he thought it best, as was done in other nations, to leave the arts to the ingenuity and industry of the people.

Soon after the death of Joshua, a place was assigned by Joab, of the tribe of Judah, to artificers; for in the genealogy of the tribe of Judah, delivered in 1 Chron. 11: 14. we read of a place called the valley of craftsmen, and, verses 21, 23, of a family of workmen of fine linen, and another of potters; and when Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, the enemy carried away all the craftsmen and smiths. 2 Kings 24: 14. But as proof that their skill in manufactures and trade therein could not be very extensive, we find that the prophet Ezekiel, chap. 27. in describing the affluence of the goods which came to Tyre, makes mention of nothing brought thither from Judea except wheat, oil, grapes, and balm, which were all the natural product of their ground. It appears that the mistress of the family usually made the clothing for her household, and also for sale. Exod. 35: 25. 1 Sam. 2: 19. Prov. 31: 18—24. Acts 9: 39. Employment consequently as far as the arts were concerned, was limited chiefly to those who are engaged in the more difficult performances; for instance, those who built chariots, hewed stones, sculptured idols, it made them of metal, or who made them of instruments of gold or silver, and brass, and vessels of clay, and the like. Judg. 17: 4. Isa. 29: 16. 30: 14. Jer. 28: 13. Artificers among the Hebrews were not, as among the Greeks and Romans, servants and slaves, but men of some rank and worth: and as luxury and riches increased, they became very numerous. Jer. 24: 1. 29: 2. 2 Kings 24: 14. Building and architecture, however, did not attain much perfection prior to the reign of the accomplished Solomon. We read, indeed, before the Israelites came into the land of Canaan, that Bezaleel and Aholiab (who were employed in the construction of the tabernacle) excelled in all manner of workmanship. Exod. 35: 30—35. but we are then told, that they had their skill by inspiration from God, and it does not appear that they had any successors; for, in the days of Solomon, when they were at rest from all their enemies, and were perfectly at liberty to follow out improvements of any kind, yet they had no professed artists that could undertake the work of the temple; so that Solomon was obliged to send to Hiram king of Tyre for a skilful artist, 2 Chron. 7: 13, 14. by whose direction the model of the temple and all the curious furniture of it was both designed and finished. But after the Jews were under the influence or power of the Romans, there is no doubt that a better taste prevailed among them. Herod, at least, must have employed some architects of distinguished abilities to repair and beautify the temple, and render it the superb structure which the description of Josephus shows that it must have been. From the frequent mention made in sacred history, of numerous instruments and of various operations in metals, we are authorized to infer, as well as from other sources, that a considerable number of the arts was known and practised among them.

During the captivity, many Hebrews, (most commonly those to whom a barren tract of the soil had been assigned,) applied themselves to the arts and merchandise. Subsequently, when they were scattered abroad among different nations, a knowledge of the arts became so popular, that the Talmudists taught, that all parents ought to learn their children some art or handicraft. They indeed mention many learned men of their nation, who practised some kind of manual labor, or as we should say, followed some trade. Accordingly, we find in the New Testament, that Joseph the husband of Mary was a carpenter, and that he was assisted by our Savior in his labors. Matt. 13: 55. Mark 6: 3. Simon is mentioned as a tanner in the city of Joppa. Acts 9: 43. 10: 32. Alexander, a learned Jew, was a coppersmith. 2 Tim. 4: 14. Paul and Aquila were tent-makers. Not only the Greeks but the Jews also, esteemed certain trades infamous. At any rate, the rabbins reckoned the drivers of asses and camels, barbers, sailors, shepherds, and innkeepers, in the same class with robbers. Those Ephesians and Cretans, who were lovers of gain, 1 Tim. 3: 8. Tit. 1: 7. were men, as we may learn from ancient authors, who were determined to get money in however base a manner. In the apostolic age, the more eminent Greek tradesmen were united into a society. Acts 19: 25. (See WRITING, POETRY, MUSIC, DANCING.)—Horne.

ASA; the son and successor of Abijam, king of Judah, began to reign in the year of the world 3049, and before Christ 955. He reigned forty-one years at Jerusalem, and did right in the sight of the Lord. He purged Jerusalem from the infamous practices attending the worship of idols; and he deprived his mother of her office and dignity of queen, because she erected an idol to Astarte, which he burnt in the valley of Hinnom. 1 Kings 15: 8. &c.

The Scripture, however, reproaches Asa with not destroying the high places, which, perhaps, he thought it politic to tolerate, to avoid the greater evil of idolatry. His application also to Benhadad for assistance, was inexcusable. It implied, that Asa distrusted God's power and goodness, which he had so lately experienced. Therefore the prophet Hanani was sent to reprove him for his conduct. Asa, however, was so exasperated at his rebukes, that he put the prophet in chains, and at the same time ordered the execution of several persons in Judah. Towards the latter part of his life, he was incommoded with swellings in his feet, which, gradually rising upwards, killed him. The Scripture reproaches him, also, because, in his last sickness, he had recourse to physicians, rather than to the Lord.—Watson.

ASAHIEL; the son of Zeruiah, and brother to Joab. He was killed by Abner, in the battle of Gibeon, 2 Sam. 2: 18, 19. while he obstinately persisted in the pursuit of that general. To revenge his death, his brother Joab, some years after, treacherously killed Abner, who had come to wait on David at Hebron, in order to procure him to be acknowledged king by all Israel. 2 Sam. 3: 26, 27. (See ABNER.)—Watson.

ASAPH; a celebrated musician in the time of David, was the son of Barachias of the tribe of Levi. Asaph, and also his descendants, presided over the musical band in the service of the temple. Several of the psalms, as the fiftieth, the seventy-third to the eighty-third, have the name of Asaph prefixed; but it is not certain whether the words or the music were composed by him. With regard to some of them, which were written during the Babylonish captivity, they cannot in any respect be ascribed to him. Perhaps they were written or set to music by his descendants, who bore his name, or by some of that class of musicians of which the family of Asaph was the head 1 Chron. 6: 39. 2 Chron. 29: 30. 35: 15. Neh. 12: 46. The psalms which bear the name of Asaph are doctrinal or preceptive: their style, though less sweet than that of David, is more vehement, and little inferior to the grandeur of Isaiah.—Watson.

ASBURY, (FRANCIS;) senior bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. He was born near Birmingham, England, August 20, 1745; but as most of his life was spent in laborious services among the American Methodists, he is identified with them, in their own feelings, and in the view of the public. He came to this country in 1771, at the age of twenty-six, as a preacher. In 1773, the first annual conference of the Methodists was held at Philadelphia, when it consisted of ten preachers, and about eleven hundred members. He was consecrated bishop by Dr. Coker in 1784, an office which he continued to fill with great reputation till his death, which happened at the house of his old friend, Mr. George Arnold, in Virginia. He was there on a journey, and died suddenly, March 31, 1816, in the seventy-first year of his age, and the fifty-fifth of his ministry. His remains, by order of the general conference, were brought to Baltimore, and deposited in a vault prepared for that purpose under the recess of the pulpit of the Methodist church in Eutaw street, in that city.

From the time of his consecration, a period of thirty-two years, bishop Asbury travelled yearly through the United States. From the ardor of his feelings, he was peculiarly calculated to keep the great machinery of the travelling connection in motion. In the exercise of his episcopal office, he ordained not less, probably, than three thousand preachers, and preached seventeen thousand sermons.—Asbury's Journal; M.S. of Rev. E. Mudge; Bond's Letter to Bishop M'Kendree; Allen's Biog. Dict.; Benedict's All Religions.

ASCENSION OF CHRIST; his visible elevation to heaven. Our Savior, having repeatedly conversed with his apostles after his resurrection, and afforded them many infallible proofs of its reality, led them from Jerusalem to Bethany, and was raised up to heaven in their sight; there to continue till he shall descend at the last day to judge the quick and the dead.

1. The evidences of this fact were numerous. The disciples saw him ascend. Acts 1: 9, 10. Two angels testified that he did ascend. Acts 1: 11. Stephen, Paul, and John saw him in his ascended state. Acts 7: 55, 56; 9: Rev. 1. The ascension was demonstrated by the descent of the Holy Ghost; John 16: 7—14. Acts 2: 33; and the terrible overthrow and dispersion of the Jewish nation is still a standing proof of it. John 8: 21. Matt. 26: 64.

2. The time of Christ's ascension was forty days after his resurrection. He continued so many days upon earth that he might give repeated proofs of his resurrection; Acts 1: 3; instruct his apostles in every thing of importance respecting their office and ministry; Acts 1: 3; and might open to them the Scriptures concerning himself, and renew their commission to preach the Gospel. Acts 1: 5, 6. Mark 16: 15.

3. As to the manner of his ascension, it was from mount Olivet to heaven, not in appearance only, but in reality, and that visibly and locally. It was a real motion of his human nature; sudden, swift, glorious, and in a triumphant manner. He was parted from his disciples while he was solemnly blessing them; and multitudes of angels attended him with shouts of praise. Psalm 68: 17.; 47: 5, 6.

4. The effects or ends of his ascension were, 1. To fulfil the types and prophecies concerning it; 2. To "appear" as a priest "in the presence of God for us;" 3. To take upon him more openly the exercise of his kingly office; 4. To receive gifts for men, both ordinary and extraordinary; Psalm 68: 18.; 5. To open the way to heaven for his people; Heb. 10: 19, 20.; 6. To assure the saints of their ascension to heaven after their resurrection from the dead. John 14: 1, 2.—Watson; Buck.

ASCETICS; such as inured themselves to greater degrees of abstinence and fasting than other men; as those mentioned by Origen, who abstained from flesh and living creatures, in order to mortify and subdue their passions. Such abstinence the apostolical canons call askesis, the exercise of an ascetic life. So that all who abstained from flesh on account of mortification, not out of an opinion of its uncleanness, (as some heretics did,) were called ascetics. The same appellation was given to those, who were more than ordinarily intent on the exercises of prayer and devotion. Accordingly, Cyril of Jerusalem calls the prophetess Anna, who departed not from the temple, but served God night and day, Asketria eulabesate, the most religious ascetic. In short, every kind of uncommon piety and virtue laid claim to the name. Whence it appears that the ascetics were not originally the same with monks, as Baronius, and the generality of the Romish writers, pretend they were. Ascetics had been long in the church; but the monastic life was not known till towards the fourth century. The difference between ascetics and monks is this:—1. The monks were men who retired from the business and conversation of the world to some distant mountain or desert wilderness; but the first ascetics were men of an active life, living in cities as other men, and differing from them only in the heights to which they carried their virtue. 2. The monks were to be only laymen; but the ascetics were indifferently of any order. 3. The monks were tied up to certain rules and laws of discipline; but the ancient ascetics were governed by no laws but those of the Gospel. In short, though every monk is an ascetic, every ascetic is not a monk; the former appellation being of a more general import than the latter.

A monastery has sometimes the name asceterium given it. The college of Undertakers, (Funerarii;) founded by the emperor Anastasius, in which eight monks and three acolythists were employed in burying the dead, was also called by this name; as appears from the confirmation of it by the emperor Justinian.—Henderson's Buck.

ASCHAM, (ROGER,) a distinguished English scholar, and preceptor to queen Elizabeth, was born, 1515; entered Cambridge, 1530; was chosen fellow in 1534, and tutor in 1537. At this time he took side with the Protestants. Such was his skill in Greek and Latin, that he was successively chosen Latin secretary to king Edward and queen Mary. His most valuable work is a treatise on education called the School-master, which even now is in high reputation. His last hours were those of a pensive sinner, rejoicing only in Christ.—Am. Encyc.; Clissold.

ASCITES. (See ASCOPOGITES.)

ASCLEPIDOTEANS; a petty sect in the third century; so called from Asclepiodotus, who taught, like Artemon and the modern Socinians, that Jesus Christ was a mere man.—Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

ASCOBROGITES, or ASCITES; a party of Montanists, in the second century, who, it is said, brought into their churches bags, skins, or bottles, filled with new wine, to represent the new wine mentioned by Christ; then danced round these bottles, and intoxicated themselves with the wine. They are likewise called Ascite, and both words are derived from the Greek askos, a bottle. The charge appears improbable and ridiculous; (but see MONTANISTS.)—Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

ASCOBRUTES; a branch of Gnostics, or Valentinians, in the second century, who asserted, that divine mysteries, being the images of invisible things, ought not to be represented by visible things, nor incorporeal things by corporeal and sensible. Therefore they rejected the sacraments, and are said to have confined their religion to theory. (See Gnostics.)—Broughton's Dict.; Bell's Wanderings, p. 138.

ASENATH; daughter of Potiphar, wife of Joseph, Gen. 41: 45.; and mother of Ephraim and Manasseh. (See POTIPHAR, ad fin.)—Calmet.

ASHAN; a city of Judah; Josh. 15: 42.; but, perhaps, afterwards yielded to Simeon. Josh. 19: 7. Eusebius says, that, in his time, Beth-Ashan was sixteen miles from Jerusalem, west.—Calmet.

ASHDOD; a city of the Philistines, Josh. 15: 46. 1 Sam. 5: 1. This city, says Herodotus, (lib. ii. 157.) sustained the longest siege of any city in the world, against Pseumeticus, king of Egypt. (See AZORUS.)—Calmet.

ASHDOTH; a city in the tribe of Reuben, called Ash doth-pisgah, Josh. 12: 3. 13: 20., because it was seated in the plains at the foot of mount Pisgah; or, at the springs of Pisgah.

Ashdath may be taken as Sheduth, for springs; or rather for rills, which, falling from some height, form small cascades in their descent, and shed their waters around.—Calmet.

ASHER; one of the sons of Jacob and Zilpah, Leah's servant. He had four sons and one daughter. Gen. 49: 20. Deut. 33: 24. The inheritance of his tribe lay in a very fruitful country, with Phœnicia west, Libanus north, Carmel and the tribe of Issachar south, and Zebulun and Naphtali east: but it never possessed the whole range of district assigned to it. (See CANAAN.)—Calmet.

ASHER; a city between Scythopolis and Schechem, and, consequently, remote from the tribe of Asher. Josh. 17: 7. In the Old Itinerary to Jerusalem, it is placed between Scythopolis and Neapolis. Eusebius says there was a large town of this name between Azoth and Ascalon also.—Calmet.

ASHES. To repent in sackcloth and ashes, or to lie down among ashes, was an external sign of self-affliction for sin, or of grief under misfortune. We find it adopted by Job; (chap. 2: 8;) by many Jews when in great fear; Esth. 4: 3.; and by the king of Nineveh. Jonah 3: 6. Homer describes old Laertes grieving for the absence of his son,—“Sleeping in the apartment where the slaves slept, in the ashes near the fire.” Compare Jer. 6: 26. “Daughter of my people,—wallow thyself in ashes.” “I am but dust and ashes,” said Abraham to the Lord; Gen. 18: 27.; indicating his deep sense of his own meanness in comparison with God. God threatens to shower down dust and ashes on the lands instead of rain; Deut. 28: 24.; thereby to make them barren instead of blessing them. (See RAIN.) The Psalmist, in great sorrow, says, poetically, that he had “eaten ashes.” Psal. 102: 9. He sat on ashes, and threw them on his head; his food was sprinkled with the ashes wherewith he was himself covered. So Jeremiah (Lam. 3: 16.) introduces Jerusalem saying, “the Lord hath covered me with ashes.” There was a sort of ley and lustral water, made with the ASHES of the heifer, sacrificed on the great day of expiation; these ashes were distributed to the people, and used in purifications, by sprinkling, to such as had touched a dead body, or been present at funerals. Numb. 19: 17.

The ancient Persians had a punishment which consisted in executing certain criminals by stifling them in ashes. (Valerius Maximus, lib. ix. cap. 2.) Thus, the wicked Menelaus was despatched, who caused the troubles which had disquieted Judæa; (2 Macc. 13: 5, 6.) being thrown headlong into a tower, fifty cubits deep, which was filled with ashes to a certain height. The action of the criminal to disengage himself, plunged him still deeper in the whirling ashes; and this agitation was increased by a wheel, which kept them in continual movement, till he was entirely stifled.—Calmet.

ASHIMAH; a deity adored by the men of Hamath who were settled in Samaria. 2 Kings 17: 30. Some of the rabbins say, that Ashimah had the shape of an ape; others, that of a lamb, a goat, or a sc'yr. (Selden, de Diis Syr. Syntagm. ii. cap. 9. et additiones And. Beyr. ibidem.) Both the ape and the goat were worshipped in Egypt, and in the east. (Diodor. Sicul. lib. i. Basnage, Antiq. Jud. tom. i. p. 190.) It may be further observed, that these people came from Hamath, or Emesa, a city of Syria, on the river Orontes, and we read, that the sun was adored in this city under the name of Elah-Gabalah: whence the emperor Helio-gabalus took his name. The god Elagabal was represented by a large stone, round at the bottom, which, rising insensibly to a point, terminated in a conic or pyramidal figure. His worship became celebrated at Rome, from the time of Helio-gabalus, who caused a magnificent temple to be erected to him. Around this temple were several altars, on which hecatombs of bulls and great quantities of sheep were sacrificed every morning, and abundance of excellent wine and spices poured out. The name of Ashimoh may very well be understood of fire from heaven, or the sun; or it may be derived from the Persian Asuman, the name of an angel, or genius, who, according to the ancient Magi of Persia, presides over the twenty-seventh day of every solar month, in the Persian year; which, therefore, is called by the name of this genius. The Magi believe Asuman to be the angel of death, which separates the souls of men from their bodies. The Persians likewise called heaven Asuman, and Suman; which comes near to the Hebrew Schamaim.—Calmet.

ASHLEY, (JONATHAN,) minister of Deerfield, Massachusetts, was graduated at Yale college, in 1730, and was ordained in 1738. He died in 1780, aged sixty-seven. He possessed a strong and discerning mind and lively imagination, and was a pungent and energetic preacher. He proclaimed the doctrines of grace with a pathos, which was the effect, not merely of his assent to their divine authority, but of a deep sense of their importance and excellency. He published a sermon on visible saints, vindicating Mr. Stoddard's sentiments respecting church membership; a sermon on the ordination of John Norton, Deerfield, 1741; the great duty of charity, 1742; a letter to W. Cooper, 1745.—Allen.

ASHMUN, (JEREMI,) agent of the American Colonization Society, was born of pious parents in Champlain, on the western shore of the lake of the same name, New York, in April, 1794. In early life he was an unbeliever; but it pleased God to disclose to him the iniquity of his heart and his need of mercy, and the value and glory of the Gospel. He graduated at Burlington college in 1816, and after preparing for the ministry, was elected a professor in the theological seminary at Bangor, Maine, in which place, however, he continued but a short time. Removing to the district of Columbia, he became a member of the Episcopal church, edited the Theological Repository, and published his memoirs of Rev. Samuel Bacon. He also projected a monthly journal for the American Colonization Society, and published one number; but the work failed for want of patronage. Being appointed to take charge of a reinforcement to the colony at Liberia, he embarked for Africa, June 19, 1822, and arrived at cape Montserado, August 8th. He had authority, in case he should find no agent there, to act as such for the society, and also for the navy department. In the absence of the agents, it was at a period of great difficulty, that he assumed the agency. The settlers were few, and surrounded with numerous enemies. It was necessary for him to act as a legislator, and also as a soldier and engineer, to lay out the fortifications, superintending the construction, and this too in the time of affliction from the loss of his wife, and while suffering himself under a fever, and to animate the emigrants to the resolute purpose of self-defence. About three months after his arrival, just as he was beginning to recover strength, and while his whole force was thirty-five men and boys, he was attacked at the dawn of day, November 11, by eight hundred armed savages; but by the energy and desperate valor of the agent, the assailants were repulsed with the loss of four colonists killed, and four wounded, and again in a few days, when they returned with redoubled numbers, were utterly defeated. Here was a memorable display of heroism. The same energy, diligence, and courage were displayed in all his labors for the benefit of the colony. When ill health compelled him to take a voyage to America, he was escorted to the place of embarkation, March 26, 1828, by three companies of the militia; and the men, women, and children of Monrovia parted with him with tears. He left a community of twelve hundred freemen. The vessel touched and landed him at St. Bartholomews in very ill health. He arrived at New Haven, August 10th, a fortnight before his death. In his sickness he was very humble and patient. He said, "I have come here to die. It is hard to be broken down by the slow progress of disease. I wish to be submissive. My sins, my sins! they seem to shut me out from that comfort which I wish to enjoy. I have been praying for light; and a little light has come, cheering and refreshing beyond expression." He died in the evening of August 25, 1828, aged thirty-four years. An eloquent discourse was preached by Leonard Bacon at his funeral, describing his remarkable character, the important influence on the tribes of Africa of his piety and regard to justice, and his great services for the colonists. He was, as Mrs. Sigourney represents,

"Their leader, when the blast
Of ruthless war sweeps by;—
Their teacher, when the storm was past,
Their guide to worlds on high."

Mr. Gurley, the editor of the African Repository, is preparing an account of his life. In the Repository, various communications, written by Mr. Ashmun, were published: his Memoirs of S. Bacon have been already mentioned.—Afric. Repos. vol. iv. p. 214—224, 286; Christian Spect. vol. ii. p. 528; N. Y. Merc. vol. 1. p. 13; Allen's B. Diet.

ASHKENAZ, or ASHCENAZ; one of the sons of Gomer, and grandson of Japheth, who gave his name to the country first peopled by him in the north and north-western part of Asia Minor, answering to Bithynia; where were traces long after of his name, particularly in that of Ascanus, applied to a bay and city, as well as to some islands lying along the coast. It was also from this country, most probably, that the king Ascanius, mentioned by Homer, came to the aid of Priamus at the siege of Troy. From the same source, likewise, the Pontus Euxinus, or Black sea, derived its name. It may further be remarked on the identity of these countries, that the prophet Jeremiah, predicting the capture of Babylon, and calling by name the countries which were to rise against it, exclaims, "Call together against her the kingdoms of Ararat, (or Armenia,) Minni, and Ashkenaz;" which was literally fulfilled; as Xenophon informs us that Cyrus, after taking Sardis, became master of Phrygia on the Hellespont, and took along with him many soldiers of that country.—Watson.

ASHPENAZ; attendant, or governor of king Nebuchadnezzar's eunuchs, who changed the name of Daniel and his companions. Dan. 1: 3.—Calmet.

ASHTAROTH. (See ASTAROTH.)

ASHUR; a son of Shem, who gave name to Assyria. It is believed that he dwelt originally in the land of Shinar, and about Babylonia; but was compelled by Nimrod to remove thence, higher towards the springs of the Tigris, in the province of Assyria, where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen. This is the sense generally given to Gen. 10: 11, 12: "Out of the land (Shinah) went forth Ashur, and builded Nineveh," &c. But others understand it to speak of Nimrod, who left his own country and attacked Assyria, which he overcame, built Nineveh, and here established the seat of his empire. The prophet Micah (chap. 5: 6) calls Assyria the land of Nimrod. (See Bochart, in Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 12.) (See ASSYRIA.)—Calmet.

ASH-WEDNESDAY; the first of Lent. It is so called from the custom observed in the ancient church, of penitents expressing their humiliation at this time by appearing in sackcloth and ashes. But it is not certain that this was always done precisely on Ash-Wednesday, there being a perfect silence in the most ancient writers about it. The discipline used towards penitents in Lent, as described by Gratian, differed from their treatment at other times; for on Ash-Wednesday they were presented to the bishop, clothed in sackcloth, and barefooted: then the seven penitential psalms were sung; and after which the bishop laid his hands on them, sprinkled them with holy water, and poured ashes upon their heads; declaring to them that as Adam was cast out of paradise, so they, for their sins, were cast out of the church. Then the inferior ministers expelled them out of the doors of the church. In the end of Lent, on the Thursday before Easter, they were again presented for reconciliation by the deacons and presbyters at the gates of the church. But this method of treating penitents in Lent carries with it the marks of a more modern practice; for there was no use of holy water in the ancient discipline; nor seven penitential psalms in their service, but only one, viz. the fifty-first. Neither was Ash-Wednesday anciently the first day of Lent, till Gregory the Great first added it to Lent, to make the number of fasting days completely forty, which before were but thirty-six. Nor does it appear that anciently the time of imposing penance was confined to the beginning of Lent, but was granted at all times, whenever the bishop thought the penitent qualified for it. In Rome, the spectacle on this occasion is most ridiculous. After giving themselves up to all kinds of gaiety and licentiousness, during the carnival, till twelve o'clock on the Tuesday night, the people go on Ash-Wednesday morning into the churches, when the officiating priests put ashes on their heads, repeating the words, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."

The want of this discipline in the English church is at present supplied by reading publicly, on Ash-Wednesday, the curses denounced in the holy Scriptures against several sorts of sins, the people repeating after each curse, Amen.—Henderson's Buck.

ASIA; one of the four quarters into which geographers have divided the earth. It lies between 26 and 190 degrees of east, or 170 of west longitude; and between the equator and 78 degrees of north latitude, extending in length from the Dardanelles to Behring's straits, about seven thousand five hundred and eighty-three British miles; and in breadth from the southern cape of the peninsula of Malacca, to the most northern parts of Siberia, about five thousand two hundred and fifty. To have a clear comprehension of the geography of this division of the earth; the courses of the rivers; the direction of the chain of mountains; and the climate and relative situation of its various kingdoms; it is necessary to attend to a peculiar feature in the configuration of its surface. The central regions of the Asiatic continent rise into a vast and highly elevated plain, extending several thousand miles in every direction, and standing aloft like an immense table, supported on all sides by high and precipitous mountains which overlook the surrounding countries. From this vast elevation, the rivers of Asia flow as from a common centre in every direction; and the numerous kingdoms stretch themselves around in gradual descent. On the south of this high central region, the vast plains of India gradually descend to the great Southern ocean. From their exposure they receive the fiercest rays of a tropical sun, and are sheltered by the elevated front of the high tract behind from every northern blast. On the west of this extended elevation, lies the ancient Persian empire, which also descends gradually towards the setting sun, and the territory of Europe. On the east is the immense empire of China, descending with the rivers to the Eastern ocean; and on the north is Siberia, descending without interruption to the Frozen sea.

Asia, though in extent of surface inferior to America, surpasses all the other divisions, in the antiquity of its population, the agreeableness of its climate, the fertility of its soil, and its luxuriant and delicious productions. Europe has no doubt surpassed it in the career of political importance; but in a historical and philosophical point of view, Asia is still the most interesting portion of the globe. Here were transacted the most important events both of sacred history and profane. Here the human race first made their appearance; it was the theatre of their earliest achievements; the grand centre from which population, science and all the arts of civilized life have gradually diffused themselves over the other regions of the world. In this quarter, the Almighty planted his favorite people the Jews, among whom "he made bare his arm, and by signs, wonders, and mighty deeds," established the conviction of his righteous providence, leading the people of Israel like a flock by the hands of Moses and Aaron. It was also the great scene of Divine revelation;

the theatre on which the prophets uttered their predictions and where the Son of God illustrated and fulfilled them. Here the work of human redemption was accomplished by the Messiah; and from hence the light of the glorious Gospel was diffused over a benighted world. In Asia, the Christian faith was propagated by the aid of miracles and cherished with the blood of martyrs, and there the first Christian churches were planted under the direction of inspired apostles.

Asia is divided by geographers into the following kingdoms, provinces, or states; most of which there will be occasion to speak of under their respective heads, and consequently a bare enumeration of them will suffice in this place. PALESTINE, or the land of Judea; SYRIA, in which was included Phœnicia; ASIA MINOR, now called Natolia; MESOPOTAMIA, now termed Diarbeck; CHALDEA; ARMENIA; GEORGIA; ASSYRIA; CRINA; HINDOSTAN; INDIA beyond the Ganges; PERSIA; ARABIA; and TARTARY; besides a number of very considerable islands lying in the Pacific ocean and Indian seas.—Jones.

ASIA MINOR. Asia was generally divided into Major and Minor. Asia Minor was a large country, (Acts 19: 10.) lying between the Euxine or Black sea northward, and the Mediterranean southward. It is now called Anatolia or Natolia. Asia Major denotes all the rest of the Asiatic continent. Asia Minor contained the provinces of Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycæonia, Phrygia, Mysia, Troas—all of which are mentioned in the New Testament;—Lydia, Ionia, and Æolis—which are sometimes included under Lydia—Caria, Doris, and Lycia. Of these, Lydia and Caria—taken in their larger acceptations, the latter including Doris—Mysia and Phrygia, including Troas or Phrygia Minor, formed the Roman PROCONSULAR ASIA, which has been thought by some to be the same as the Scripture Asia. But, as Dr. Wells remarks, it is evident that Mysia, Phrygia, and Troas are reckoned by the sacred writers as distinct provinces from the Asia so called in Scripture. It is therefore more reasonably supposed, that by Asia in the New Testament is sometimes to be understood Lydia in its largest acceptation, so as to include Ionia and Æolis; for in this were comprehended the seven cities, the churches of which are styled the churches of Asia. How far this may be the country intended, 1 Pet. 1: 1. it is difficult to determine: certainly proconsular Asia is too distant from Cappadocia and Bithynia to be united with them, or with any other province mentioned in his salutation; not to say, that proconsular Asia was previously occupied and taught by Paul, and afterwards by John.—Calmet.

ASIARCHS; or Asia Princes, as they are called in the Latin version of the Acts, (chap. 19: 31. "Certain of the chief of Asia." Eng. Tr.)—were opulent citizens, chosen like our stewards of public assemblies, into an office of distinction, to celebrate public and solemn games at their own expense. These chiefs, then holding such games at Ephesus, out of friendly consideration for Paul, restrained him from appearing, as he proposed, in the theatre, during the sedition raised by Demetrius, the goldsmith, respecting Diana of Ephesus. The Asiarchs were frequently priests of the religion whose games they celebrated: thus in the martyrdom of Polycarp, Philip the Asiarch (a little afterwards called the high-priest) is solicited to let out a lion against Polycarp, which he declares he could not do, because that kind of spectacle was over. These Asiarchs should by no means be confounded with the archon, or chief magistrate of Ephesus; for they were representatives, not of a single city, but of many cities united. Hence we find on medals and inscriptions, the dignity of Bithyniarches; also, Galatarches, and Cretarches. The Asiarchs were elected in the following manner: Each of the cities of Asia, about the beginning of their year, which was at the autumnal equinox, held a council, in which a proper person from among their own cities was proposed; these names being transmitted to the general council of proconsular Asia, one of them was fixed on. The dignity was great; but the expense also was great; so that only men of wealth could undertake it. Hence we find Aristides exerting himself strenuously to be discharged from this costly office, to which he had been three or four times nominated. This notion of the Asiarch is confirmed by a medal of Rhodes, struck under Hadrian, on the reverse of which we read, "a coin struck in common by thirteen cities, in honor of the magistrate of Rhodes, Claudio Fronto, ASIARCH and high-priest of the thirteen cities."

The consideration of these Asiarchs for the apostle Paul, during the tumult, is not only extremely honorable to his character, and to theirs, but is also a strong confirmation of the remark made by the evangelist, (ver. 10.) that "all they who dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks." It shows also in what light the tumult of Demetrius was beheld, since he took especial care to observe that "all Asia" worshipped their goddess. Yet were the very Asiarchs, now engaged in this worship, intent on securing the man whom Demetrius represented as its most formidable enemy. Though there was, properly speaking, only one Asiarch at a time, yet those who had passed through the office retained the title; for which reason they are mentioned in the plural by the evangelist.—Calmet.

ASK; (1.) To inquire. Gen. 32: 29. (2.) To demand. Gen. 34: 10. (3.) To seek counsel. Isa. 30: 2. (4.) To pray for. John 15: 7. (5.) To accuse. Ps. 35: 10, 11. Christ's asking of the Father imports his pleading in our nature for favors, as the due reward of his obedience unto death. Ps. 21: 4. 2: 8. We ask in Christ's name, and in faith, when by the help of his Spirit, and in a believing dependence on his person, righteousness, and intercession, we, in obedience to his command, plead for, and firmly expect, whatever he hath promised in his word suited to our mind and capacity of enjoyment. John 14: 13. Jam. 1: 6. We ask amiss when we pray for what God has neither commanded nor promised; when we request any thing in an ignorant, careless, unbelieving manner; or seek it to answer some unworthy and sinful end. Jam. 4: 3. The nations that asked not for Christ, and were not called by his name, are the Gentiles, who under the Old Testament were destitute of the knowledge of Christ, void of desire after him, and made no profession of regard to him. Isa. 66: 1. We "ask the beasts, fowls, fishes, and earth, that they may declare unto us," when we earnestly observe how the Divine power, wisdom, and goodness are manifested in their creation, preservation, and government. Job 12: 7, 8.—Brown.

ASHKELON; a city in the land of the Philistines, situated between Azotus and Gaza, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea. It was a place of great note among the Philistines, and one of the seats of government; famed also for a temple dedicated to Apollo, at which Herod, the father of Antipater and grandfather of Herod the Great, officiated as priest. After the death of Joshua, the tribe of Judah took the city of Ashkelon. Judges 1: 18. Much is said of the vine of Ashkelon; and the cypress-tree, a shrub much esteemed of old, was very common in this place. Ashkelon still subsists under the name of Scalona, but is now inconsiderable.—Calmet; Jones; Wells's Geography.

ASLEEP; (1.) Taking rest in natural SLEEP. John 1: 5. (2.) Dead. Acts 7: 60. (3.) Careless, unconcerned, spiritually drowsy or dead. Song 7: 9.—Brown.

ASMODEUS; destroyer. The Jewish name of an evil spirit; the demon of vanity or dress. Also the same as Ashmudai, Abaddon, and Apollyon, the angel of death.

ASMONÆANS; a name given to the Maccabees, descendants of Mattathias, who was, according to Josephus, (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 8.) the great-grandson of Asmonæus. The family of the Asmonæans became very illustrious in the later times of the Hebrew commonwealth; it was the support of the religion and liberty of the Jews; and possessed the supreme authority, from Mattathias to Herod the Great. (See MACCABEES.) It is nowhere said whether the Asmonæans were of the race of Jozedech, in whose family the office of high-priest continued in a lineal descent, till Alcimus was promoted to that dignity. This is certain of the Asmonæans, that they were of the course of Joarib, the which was the first class of the sons of Aaron; and, therefore, on failure of the former pontifical family (which had now happened by the flight of Onias, son of Onias, into Egypt) they had the best right to succeed to that station. Under this right, Joathan took the office, when nominated to it by the reigning king in Syria; being also elected thereto, by the general suffrage of the people.—Prid. Connect. &c. Part II. book iv.

ASNAPPAR; a king of Assyria, who sent the Cnethæans into Israel, Ezra 4: 10. Many think this was Salmannesser; but others, with more probability, think it was Esar-haddon.

ASP; a species of serpent, often mentioned in Scripture, and therefore entitled to notice in this work. It belongs to the genus Coluber of Linnæus, who thus defines it: Nose terminated by an erect wart, body tawny, with figured streaks, alternately distinct and confluent; beneath, steel-blue, dotted with yellow. It is said to be common in Africa, and about the banks of the Nile. Naturalists differ in their accounts of its length. On the upper part of the body, are three longitudinal rows of red spots with a black margin; the union of the rows under the tail produces a kind of waved band, from which, as well as other particulars, the asp bears some resemblance to the viper. Its poison is more deadly than that of any other venomous creature inhabiting the East. Its bite induces slumber, which by degrees is converted into profound sleep. Death ensues within twenty-four hours, unaccompanied by pain or violent symptoms; the only perceptible change being the gradual diminution of pulsation. The whole body immediately becomes of a blackish color; and mortification, as if from a gangrene, follows in the space of a day. The bite of the asp is said by Aristotle to admit of no remedy; and Pliny allows of no other cure but to cut off the wounded part.

The Hebrew pether is variously translated into our version; but interpreters generally consider it as referring to the asp. Zophar alludes to it more than once in his description of a wicked man: "Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him.—He shall suck the poison of asps; the viper's tongue shall slay him." Job 20: 14. The venom of asps is the most subtle of all; it is incurable, and, if the wounded part be not instantly amputated, it speedily terminates the existence of the sufferer. To these circumstances Moses evidently alludes, in his character of the heather: "Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps." Deut. 33: 33. See also Rom. 3: 13. To tread upon the asp is attended with extreme danger; and to express in the strongest manner the safety which the godly man enjoys under the protection of his heavenly Father, it is promised, that he shall tread with impunity upon the adder and the dragon, Ps. 91: 13. No person of his own accord approaches the hole of these deadly reptiles; for he who gives them the smallest disturbance, is in extreme danger of paying the forfeit of his rashness with his life. Hence, the prophet Isaiah, predicting the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ, and the glorious reign of peace and truth in those regions, which, prior to that period, were full of horrid cruelty, declares, "The sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy, in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Isaiah 11: 6—9. In the glowing descriptions of the golden age, with which the oriental writers and the rapturous bards of Greece and Rome entertained their contemporaries, the wild beasts grow tame, serpents resign their poison, and noxious herbs their deleterious qualities: all is peace and harmony, plenty and happiness.

The soaring genius of these elegant writers, however, could reach no higher than a negative felicity: but the inspired bard, far surpassing them in the beauty and elegance, as well as in the variety of imagery, with which he clothes the same ideas, exhibits a glowing picture of positive and lasting happiness. The wolf and the leopard not only forbore to destroy the lamb and kid, but even take their abode with them, and lie down together. The calf and the young lion, and the fating, not only come together, but also repose under the same covert, and are led quietly in the same band, and that by a little child. The cow and the she-bear not only feed together, but even lodge their young ones, for whom they used to be most jealously fearful, in the same place. All the serpent kind is so perfectly harmless, that the sucking infant, or the newly-weaned child, puts his hand on the basilisk's den, and plays upon the hole of the asp. The lion, not only abstains from preying on the weaker animals, but also becomes tame and domestic, and feeds on straw like the ox. These are all beautiful circumstances, not one of which has been touched by the ancient poets.—Jones; Abbot.

ASPINWALL, (WILLIAM;) M. D.; an eminent physician, was born in Brookline, Mass., in June, 1743, and graduated at Cambridge in 1764. In the war of the revolution he acted as a surgeon in the army. In the battle of Lexington he served as a volunteer, and bore from the field the corpse of his townsman, Isaac Gardiner, Esq., whose daughter he afterwards married. After the death of Dr. Boylston, he engaged in the business of inoculating for the small pox, and erected hospitals for the purpose. Perhaps no man in America ever inoculated so many, or had such reputation for skill in that disease. Yet, when the vaccine inoculation was introduced, after a proper trial, he acknowledged its efficacy and relinquished his own profitable establishment. For forty-five years, he had extensive practice, frequently riding on horseback forty miles a day. In his youth he lost the use of one eye; in his old age, a cataract deprived him of the other. He died April 16, 1823, in his eightieth year, in the peace of one who had long professed the religion of Jesus Christ and practised its duties. At the bed of sickness he was accustomed to give religious counsel. His testimony in favor of the Gospel he regarded as his best legacy to his children. In his political views, he was decidedly democratic or republican; yet he was not a persecutor, and when in the council, he resisted the measures of the violent. He was anxious, that wise and good men should bear sway, and that all benevolent and religious institutions should be perpetuated.—Allen; Thacher's Med. Biog.

ASPHALTUS, or Jews' Pitch; a kind of bitumen, which rises from the lake of Sodom, and which, being collected, is much employed in the preparation of medicines, and particularly, in embalming dead bodies. Joseph. Ant. lib. v. De Bello, cap. iv. see cap. v. in Lat. p. 892. The asphaltus of the Dead sea, which rises at particular seasons from the bottom of the lake, is thought to be superior to every other kind. The Arabians fish for it diligently, or gather it on the shore, whither the wind drives it. It is shining, dark, heavy, and of a strong smell when burnt. The ancients used it instead of mortar, and the walls of Babylon were cemented by it. (See DEAD SEA.)—Calmet.

ASS; an animal, well known for domestic uses, and frequently mentioned in Scripture. People of the first quality in Palestine rode on asses, Judg. 5: 10. 10: 4. 12: 14. The ass was unclean by the law, because it did not chew the cud. To draw with an ox and an ass together, was prohibited, Lev. 11: 26.

We read in Matt. 21: 4. that in order to accomplish a prophecy of Zechariah, (9: 9.) our Savior rode on an ass into Jerusalem, in a triumphant manner. This has been made a subject of ridicule by some; but we ought to consider, not only that the greatest men in Israel rode on asses anciently, as we have seen above, but also, that God had thought fit absolutely to prohibit the use of horses, and of chariots for war; (Deut. 17: 16.—compare Josh. 11: 6.) that David rode on a mule, and ordered Solomon to use it at his coronation; (1 Kings 1: 33, 34.)—that afterwards, when Solomon and succeeding princes multiplied horses, they were rebuked for it; (Isaiah 2: 6, 7. 31: 1. Hosea 14: 3.) and that the removal of horses is promised in the days of the Messiah, Hosea 1: 7. Micah 5: 10, 11. Zech. 9: 10. So that on the whole we find, that this action of our Lord is to be viewed not merely as an accomplishment of a prophecy, but also as a revival of an ancient and venerable Hebrew custom. An uncertainty, if not a difficulty, has been started, whether to adhere to the opinion of Dr. Doddridge, or to that of Mr. Hervey, in respect to the kind of ass on which our Lord rode into Jerusalem. Dr. Doddridge observes, that the eastern asses are larger and much better than ours, and that our Lord's triumphant entry was not degraded by indignity; though humble, it was not mean. Mr. Hervey, on the contrary, glories in whatever of meanness and disrepute attached to that circumstance. It may, however, be remarked, that much of that extreme meanness which some have found in the character and situation of Jesus, arises from their imperfect acquaintance with local customs and manners, and is greatly diminished on closer inspection: for, however humble might be his appearance, yet it was neither vulgar nor mean. How far the following extracts support this idea, in respect to the kind of ass rode by our Lord when entering Jerusalem, is left to the reader; but this is not the only instance in which the medium is safest and best.

“Christians cannot, indeed, repine at being forbidden to ride on horseback in the streets of Cairo, for the asses are there VERY HANDSOME, and are used for riding, by the greater part of the Mahometans, and by the most distinguished women of the country.” (Niebuhr, p. 39. French edition.) In fact, this use of asses is general in the East; and only the grandees use horses in the cities. This excepts the Arabs of the country, those in offices of government, &c.

In the Gospel is mentioned the mulus onikos, (Matt. 18: 6.) to express a large mill-stone, turned by asses, heavier than that turned by women, or by slaves.

The Jews were accused by the pagans of worshipping the head of an ass. Apion, the grammarian, who seems to have been the author of this slander, (Joseph. lib. ii. contra Apion,) affirmed, that the Jews kept the head of an ass in the sanctuary; that it was discovered there, when Antiochus Epiphanes took the temple, and entered into the most holy place. He added, that one Zabulus having secretly got into the temple, carried off the ass's head, and conveyed it to Dora. Suidas (in Damocrito, and in Juda) says, that Damocritus, or Democritus, the historian, averred that the Jews adored the head of an ass, made of gold, and sacrificed a man to it every three, or every seven, years, after having cut him in pieces. Plutarch (Symposia, lib. iv. cap. 5.) and Tacitus (Hist. lib. v.) being imposed on by this calumny, report, that the Hebrews adored an ass, out of gratitude for the discovery of a fountain by one of these creatures in the wilderness, at a time when the army of this nation was parched with thirst, and extremely fatigued. It is probable, that no good reason can be given for the accusation, which might have arisen from a joke, or from accident. M. Le Moine says, in regard to the first, that in all probability the golden urn containing the manna, which was preserved in the sanctuary, was taken for the head of an ass; and that the omer of manna might have been confounded with the Hebrew hamor, which signifies an ass. See ASSARON.

Washington, so justly named the father of his country, was the first who introduced this useful animal into the United States. A few agriculturists only, owing either to prejudice or neglect, have followed his laudable example. The circumstances, (says the Encyclopedia Americana,) which entitle the ass to a greater degree of attention and more general employment for draught and burden in this country are these; it is gentle, strong, hardy, patient of toil, requiring but a small quantity of coarse food, surefooted, and capable of a high degree of attachment to its owner.—Calmet; Ency. Am.; Watson; Abbot's Scrip. Nat. History.

ASS OF BALAAM. Here we shall only inquire, whether it were a reality, or an allegory; an imagination, or a vision of Balaam? Austin, with the greater number of commentators, supposes it was a certain fact, and takes it literally. The greater part of the Jewish authors consider it, not as a circumstance which actually took place, but as a vision, or some similar occurrence.

Le Clerc solves the difficulty, by saying, Balaam believed in the transmigration of souls, passing from one body into another, from a man into a beast, reciprocally; and, therefore, he was not surprised at the ass's complaint, but conversed with it, as if it were rational. Others have imagined different ways of solving the difficulties of this history.

There is yet to be considered whether the ass uttered sounds, which, by the power of the angel then present, were conveyed to Balaam as combined into distinct words, though not such when they quitted the ass's mouth—in which case the miracle would lie in the words, or the combination of sounds in the air—or, whether the miracle lay in the ears of Balaam, who heard, as combined into articulate words, sounds which the ass uttered without being conscious of speaking, or any verbal sense meant, or understood by her, the ass, beyond her ordinary braying, or those utterances whereby she had formerly been accustomed to express her complaints. In the determination of this question, Mr. Taylor assumes as facts: (1.) That Balaam was accustomed to angry and presages. (2.) That on this occasion he would notice every event capable of such interpretation, as presages were supposed to indicate. (3.) That he was deeply intent on the issue of his journey. (4.) That the whole of his conduct towards Balak was calculated to represent himself as an extraordinary personage. (5.) That the behavior of the ass did actually RE-FIGURE the conduct of Balaam in the three particulars of it which are recorded. First, the ass turned aside, and went into the field; for which she was smitten, reprov- ed; so Balaam, on the first of his perverse attempts to curse Israel, was, as it were, smitten, reprov- ed, punished, (1.) by God, (2.) by Balak. The second time the ass was more harshly treated for hurting Balaam's foot against the wall: so Balaam for his second attempt was no doubt still further mortified. Thirdly, the ass, seeing inevitable danger, fell down and was smitten severely: in like manner Balaam, the third time, was overruled by God, to speak truth, to his own disgrace; and escaped, not without hazard of his life, from the anger of Balak. Nevertheless, as Balaam had no sword in his hand, though he wished for one, with which to slay his ass; so Balak, notwithstanding his fury, and his seeming inclination, had no power to destroy Balaam. In short, as the ass was opposed by the angel, but was driven forward by Balaam, so Balaam was opposed by God, but was driven forward by Balak, against his better knowledge. Were we sure that Balaam wrote this narrative, and that Moses copied it, as the rabbins affirm, (see Balaam,) this view of the subject would remove the difficulties which have been raised about it. It might then be entitled "a specimen of Balaam's angry."—Calmet.

ASS, WILD. This animal, which was formerly well known in the East, and is frequently mentioned in Scripture, is a much handsomer and more dignified animal than the common ass. It is called para by the Hebrews, and onager by the Greeks. That the wild ass was known and valued for its mettle, appears from a passage in Herodotus, (Pol. 86.) where that writer says, "The Indian horse were well armed like their foot: but, beside led horses, they had chariots of war, drawn by horses and wild asses." The reference of these animals to the troops of India (a province at the head of the Indus, not our Hindoostan) deserves attention; because, the troops of the onager are said by Gmelin, to "return towards India, where they winter." Aristotle (Hist. lib. vi. cap. 36.) mentions the wild ass, which is said to exceed horses in swiftness; and Xenophon says (Cyp. lib. i.) that he has long legs, is very rapid in running, swift as a whirlwind, having strong and stout hoofs. Elian says the same; but that he may be tired, and when taken, is so gentle that he may easily be led about. Martial gives the epithet "handsome" to the wild ass—"Pulcher adest onager;" (Lib. xiii. Epig. 190.) and Oppian describes it as "handsome, large, vigorous, of stately gait, and his coat of a silvery color, having a black band along the spine of his back; and on his flanks patches as white as snow." Mr. Morier says, "We gave chase to two wild asses, which had so much the speed of our horses, that when they had got at some distance, they stood still and looked behind at us, snorting with their noses in the air, as if in contempt of our endeavors to catch them." (Second Journey in Persia, p. 200.) The latest traveller who has described the onager is Sir R. K. Porter, in his "Travels in Persia," who also gives a figure of the animal. The mode of hunting it is, as it was in Xenophon's time, by means of several horses relieving each other, till the onager is completely tired. The color of Sir Robert's figure is a bright bay.

It is to Professor Gmelin, however, who brought a female and a colt from Tartary to St. Petersburg, that we are principally indebted for our acquaintance with the wild ass. The female, which had been caught when very young, though of small stature, and probably stunted in growth by its captivity, and by want of suitable food, travelled from Astracan to Moscow (fourteen hundred werstes) with the ordinary post, without any other repose than that of a few nights; she also travelled from Moscow to Petersburg, (seven hundred and thirty werstes,) and did not seem to have suffered by the journey; though she died* in the autumn following apparently from the effect of the herbage of a marshy soil, and the cold and humidity of so northern a climate. She had nothing of the dullness and stupidity of the common ass. "I remarked that she often passed two days without drinking, especially in moist weather, or when very heavy dews fell. She also preferred brackish water to fresh, and never drank of what was troubled. She loved bread sprinkled with salt, and sometimes would eat a handful of salt. I was told, that when at Derbent, she always ran to drink of the Caspian sea, though fresh water was near to her. She also selected plants impregnated with saline particles . . . or those of bitter juices. She loved raw cucumbers; and some herbs which she refused when green, pleased her when dried. She would not touch odoriferous or marsh plants, nor even thistles. I was informed that the Persians, when taming the young onagers, feed them with rice, barley, straw, and bread. Our animal was extremely familiar, and followed persons who took care of her, freely, and with a kind of attachment. The smell of bread strongly attracted her; but, if any attempt was made to lead her against her will, she showed all the obstinacy of the ass: neither would she suffer herself to be approached behind, and if touched by a stick, or by the hand, on her hinder parts, she would kick; and this action was accompanied by a slight grumbling, as expressive of complaint. The male onager, which was brought at the same time as the female, but which died in the voyage from Derbent to Astracan, was larger and less docile. His length from the nape of the neck to the origin of his tail was five feet; his height in front, four feet four inches; behind, four feet seven inches; his head two feet in length; his ears one foot; his tail, including the tuft at the end, two feet three inches. He was more robust than the female; and had a bar or streak crossing at his shoulders, as well as that streak which runs along the back, which is common to both sexes. Some Tartars have assured me that they have seen their cross-bar double in some males. Our onager was higher on her legs than the common ass; her legs also were more slender than those of the ass; and she resembled a young filly: she could also scratch her neck and head easily with her hind foot. She was weak on her fore legs; but behind she could very well support the heaviest man. Notwithstanding her state of exhaustion, she carried her head higher than the ass, her ears well elevated, and showed a vivacity in all her motions. The color of the hair on the greater part of the body, and the end of the nose, is silvery white; the upper part of the head, the sides of the neck, and the body, are flaxen, or pale isabella color. The mane is deep brown; it commences between the ears, and reaches the shoulders; its hair is soft, woolly, three or four inches long, like the mane of a young filly. The coat in general, especially in winter, is more silky and softer than that of horses, and resembles that of a camel. The Arabs, no less than the Tartars, esteem the flesh of the onager; and the Arab writers, who permit the eating of its flesh, make the same difference between this ass and the domestic ass, as the Hebrews did, whose law did not permit the coupling of the onager with the she ass, as being of different kinds."—Calmet.

ASS'S HEAD. The following passage occurs in 2 Kings 6: 25.—"And there was a great famine in Samaria, until an ass's head was sold for eighty pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." The ass here mentioned was probably a measure, or a kind of pack, or other quantity, well known. Jesse sent to Saul an ass of bread; (1 Sam. 16: 20.) three asses of bread were eaten by one person, in one day; and it may be doubted whether Abigail (1 Sam. 25: 18;) really loaded asses, quadrupeds, with her presents to David; for the original literally is, "she took two hundred of bread, &c. and placed them on the asses;" which seems to hint at something distinct from asses, animals; for then it would be as it is in our version, "she placed them on asses." Hence, it may read onwards here to the dove's dung, in the following clause: "The whole of the quantity called an ass, (of dove's dung,) was sold for eighty pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." The reader will consider the above so far as it seems to be reasonable. (See DOVE'S DUNG.)—Calmet.

ASSARON, or OMER; a measure of capacity, used by the Hebrews: the tenth part of an ephah, as its name denotes; for it signifies tenth. Exod. 16: 16. It contained five pints. The assaron was the measure of manna which God appointed for every Israelite. Assaron, and dekaton, signify the same as omer. Josephus calls it issaron. In the Hebrew, instead of omer, assarith is often used. Josephus says, that in the time of Claudius, an assaron or omer of meal was sold for four drachme; that is, about eight shillings a peck; but this was in a time of dearth.—Calmet.

ASSASSINS; a tribe or clan in Syria, called also Ismaelians, probably from Ishmael, whose "hand was against every man." Gen. 16: 12. Also, Bateafets, or Bateniens. They are supposed to owe their origin to the Karmatians, (which see,) an heretical sect among the Mahometans, who settled in Persia about the year 1090; from whence in process of time they sent a colony into Syria, which took possession of a considerable tract of land among the mountains of Lebanon, extending nearly from Antioch to Damascus. Their religion was compounded of the various superstitions of the Persians, Jews, and Mahometans; but the distinguishing article of it was, that the Spirit of the Supreme resided in their sheike (or chief); and that all his injunctions were the commands of God; and they were trained to that degree of submission, that they would instantly kill themselves at his command, being assured of immediate entrance into paradise. Their chief was known in Europe by the name of the "Old Man of the Mountain;" and his followers were called Assassins—according to some, from the family of one of their leaders, named Arsacidæ; or, according to Mr. Mills, by corruption, from Hussanees, the followers of Hussan; or, according to Volney, from the Turkish word, Hassassin, (to kill silently and by surprise,) a night robber. Their office was to murder any person whom their sheike commanded. "This chief, from his exalted residence on the summit of mount Lebanon, like a vindictive deity, with the thunderbolt in his hand, sent inevitable death to all quarters of the world;" so that the chiefs of all nations dreaded this sanguinary tyrant; and many were weak enough to pay him a secret pension, by way of security. In 1272, however, they were subdued by the forces of the sultan Bibaris; but it is supposed that the Druses, who now inhabit those mountains, sprang from some remains of these barbarians. (See Druses.)

In the Greek and Roman republics, the murder of a reputed tyrant was held to be an act of heroic virtue, though nothing could be more unjust, since the accused had no opportunity of self-justification. Some wild republicans in Germany, France, and even England, have attempted to revive the abominable tenet; and it has produced the murders of the duke de Berry, Kotzebue, and other important characters. In some parts of Italy, assassination is professed for hire; and the government is deficient either in strength or principle, for its suppression.—Ency. Brit.;—Williams.

ASSEMBLIES OF THE CLERGY, are called convocations, synods, councils. The annual meeting of the church of Scotland is called a general assembly. In this assembly his majesty is represented by his commissioner, who dissolves one meeting and calls another in the name of the king, while the moderator does the same in the name of Jesus Christ. (See CONVOCATION, PRESBYTERIANS.)—Buck.

ASSEMBLY OF DIVINES; a synod of laymen and divines, who assembled, by authority of parliament, in king Henry the seventh's chapel, Westminster. On the first day, July 1st, 1643, sixty-nine assembled, among whom were several Episcopalians, who afterwards withdrew. Lord Clarendon says, "about twenty of them were reverend and worthy persons," and some of them certainly the most learned men of their time; as Selden, Ainsworth, Gataker, Featly, &c. They signed "The Solemn League and Covenant," drew up the Confession of Faith, the Longer and Shorter Catechisms, &c.; and several of them jointly published a commentary on the Bible, in 2 vols. folio.—Neale's Hist. of Puritans, vol. ii. p. 63, &c. Parsons's ed.; B. Bennett's Memoirs of the Reformation, p. 270, 2d ed.—Williams.

ASSENT; that act of the mind whereby it takes or acknowledges any proposition to be true or false. There are three degrees of assent:—conjecture, opinion, and belief. Conjecture is but a slight and weak inclination to assent to the thing proposed, by reason of the weighty objections that lie against it. Opinion is a more steady and fixed assent, when a man is almost certain, though yet some fear of the contrary remains with him. Belief is a more full and assured assent to the truth. (See BELIEF.)—Buck.

ASSIDEANS; by some named Chasideans, from chasideim, "merciful, pious." They were a kind of religious society among the Jews, whose chief and distinguishing character was, to maintain the honor of the temple, and observe punctually the traditions of the elders. They were therefore not only content to pay the usual tribute for the maintenance of the house of God, but charged themselves with farther expense upon that account; for every day, except that of the great expiation, they sacrificed a lamb, in addition to the daily oblation, which was called the sin-offering of the Assideans. They practised greater hardships and mortifications than others; and their common oath was, "By the temple;" for which our Savior reproves the Pharisees, who had learned that oath of them, Matt. 23: 16. From this sect the Pharisees sprung. The Assideans are represented as a numerous sect, distinguished by its valor, as well as by its zeal for the law, 1 Mac. 2: 42. A company of them resorted to Mattathias, to fight for the law of God, and the liberties of their country. This sect arose either during the captivity, or soon after the restoration, of the Jews; and were probably in the commencement, and long afterward, a truly pious part of the nation; but they at length became superstitious.—Watson.

ASSOS; a maritime city, by some geographers described as belonging to Mysia, by others, to Troas. Luke, and others, went by sea from Troas to Assos; but Paul went by land thither, and meeting them at Assos, they went together to Mitylene, Acts 20: 13, 14. A. D. 56. But there were many cities of this name. (1.) A maritime city, in Lycia.—(2.) Another in the territory of Eolis.—(3.) Another in Mysia.—(4.) Another in Lydia.—(5.) Another in Epirus Minor, the native country of Cleanthis the philosopher, which also was called Apollonia, as Pliny says. To this last city Paul sailed, Acts 20: 15. It was between Troas and Mitylene, therefore, in the district of Troas, and is marked accordingly in the maps. Strabo says, that the luxurious kings of Persia had the grain of which their bread was made brought from Assos, the wine which they drank from Syria, and the water which they drank from the river Utæus. This need not be taken literally: the import of the phrase being that their power extended over these places; and that they received tribute from them.—Calmet.

ASSUMPTION; a festival in the Romish church, in honor of the pretended miraculous ascent of the Virgin, body and soul, into heaven. It was established in the seventh century, and fixed to the 15th of August. The assumption of Mary was not always a point of faith; the ancient martyrologies speak of it with very great reserve, as a thing not fully ascertained; yet is it at present universally believed in the Roman church, and a divine who should deny it would be obliged to retract. The Greek church also celebrate the festival of the Assumption on the 15th of August. The most ridiculous fables are believed on this subject.

There were two apocryphal books entitled The Assumption of Moses, and The Assumption of the Virgin.—Henderson's Buck.

ASSURANCE is the firm persuasion we have of the certainty of any thing, or a certain expectation of something future.

Assurance of the Understanding is a well-grounded knowledge of divine things, founded on God's Word. Col. 2.—Assurance of Faith does not relate to our personal interest in Christ, but consists in a firm belief of the revelation that God has given us of Christ in his word, with an entire dependence on him. Heb. 10: 22. Assurance of hope is a firm expectation that God will grant us the complete enjoyment of what he has promised. Heb. 6: 11.

The doctrine of assurance, i. e. the belief that we have an interest in the Divine favor, has afforded matter for dispute among divines. Some have asserted that it is not to be obtained in the present state, allowing that persons may be in a hopeful way to salvation, but that they have no real or absolute assurance of it; but this is clearly refuted by facts as well as by Scripture. That it is to be obtained is evident; for we have reason to believe many persons have actually obtained it. Job 19: 25. Ps. 17: 15. 2 Tim. 1: 12. The Scriptures exhort us to obtain it. 2 Cor. 13: 5. Heb. 6: 11. 1 Thess. 5: 21. The Holy Spirit is said to bear witness of it. Rom. 8: 16. The exercise of the Christian graces is considered as a proof of it. 1 John 3: 14. 1 John 2: 3. We must, however, guard against presumption; for a mere persuasion that Christ is ours, is no proof that he is so. We must have evidence before we can have genuine assurance. It is necessary to observe also, that it is not a duty imposed upon all mankind, so that every one, in whatsoever state he may be, ought to be fully persuaded of his salvation. "We do not affirm," says Saurin, "that Christians, of whose sincerity there may be some doubt, have a right to assurance; that backsliders, as such, ought to persuade themselves that they shall be saved; nor do we say that Christians who have arrived to the highest degree of holiness can be persuaded of the certainty of their salvation in every period of their lives; nor, if left to their own efforts, can they enjoy it; but believers supported by the divine aid, who walk in all good conscience before him, these only have ground to expect this privilege."

Some divines have maintained that assurance is included in the very essence of faith, so that a man cannot have faith without assurance; but we must distinguish between assurance and justifying faith. The apostle, indeed, speaks of the full assurance of faith; but then this is a full and firm persuasion of what the Gospel reveals; whereas the assurance we are speaking of relates to our personal interest in Christ, and is an effect of this faith, and not faith itself. Faith in Christ certainly includes some idea of assurance; for, except we be assured that he is the Savior, we shall never go to or rely upon him as such: but faith in Christ does not imply an assurance of our interest in him; for there may be faith long before the assurance of personal interest commences. The confounding of these ideas has been the cause of presumption on the one hand, and despair on the other. When men have been taught that faith consists in believing that Christ died for them, and been assured that, if they can only believe so, all is well; and that then they are immediately pardoned and justified, the consequence has been, that the bold and self-conceited have soon wrought themselves up to such a persuasion, without any ground for it, to their own deception; whilst the dejected, humble, and poor in spirit, not being able to work themselves to such a pitch of confidence, have concluded, that they have not the faith of God's elect, and must inevitably be lost.

The means to attain assurance are not those of an extraordinary kind, as some people imagine: such as visions, dreams, voices, &c.; but such as are ordinary; self-examination, humble and constant prayer, consulting the sacred oracles, Christian communication, attendance on the divine ordinances, and perseverance in the path of duty; without which all our assurance is but presumption, and our profession but hypocrisy.

Assurance may be lost for a season through bodily diseases, which depress the spirits, unwatchfulness, falling into sin, manifold temptations, worldly cares, and neglect of private duty. He, therefore, who would wish to enjoy this privilege, let him cultivate communion with God, exercise a watchful spirit against his spiritual enemies, and give himself unreservedly to Him whose he is, and whom he professes to serve. ASSURITANS; a branch of the Donatists, (which see,) charged with Arianism.

ASSYRIA; an ancient kingdom or empire of Asia, comprehending those provinces of Turkey and Persia which are now called Kurdistan, Diarbec, and Irac Arabia. It was bounded by Armenia on the north; Media and Persia on the east; Arabia on the south; and the river Euphrates, which divides it from Syria and Asia Minor, on the west. According to the description of the Greek and Roman writers, the boundaries of Assyria comprehended all the countries and nations between the Mediterranean sea on the west, and the river Indus on the east; and between the deserts of Scythia on the north, and the Southern and Indian ocean. This empire having once extended over so large a portion of Asia, the provinces under its dominion came to be distinguished by the name of the sovereign state, an appellation which it retained long after the dissolution of that great monarchy. Thus Mesopotamia was called Middle Assyria; the same name was also given to Babylon and Chaldea; and according to Justin, book i. chap. 2. the country of Syria was first called Assyria.

The whole country is said to have been remarkably fertile in ancient times; but the great antiquity which is given to this kingdom, extending beyond the period when letters were invented, added to the fabulous spirit of its earliest annalists, has involved its history in darkness, which, at this distance of time, it is not possible to dissipate. Much of the Assyrian history, from the days of Ninus to those of Sardanapalus, a period of twelve hundred years, as handed down by several ancient writers, and detailed by the moderns, requires to be received with extreme caution, the whole of it being taken from the original historian, Ctesias of Cnidus, a writer whom Aristotle, who lived only a few years after him, declares to have been altogether unworthy of credit. It abounds with improbabilities; and is, in a variety of respects, incompatible with the sacred history.

Of the origin, revolutions, and termination of Assyria, properly so called, and distinguished from the grand monarchy which afterwards bore this appellation, the following account is given by Mr. Playfair, as the most probable:—"The founder of it was Ashur, the second son of Shem, who departed from Shinar, upon the usurpation of Nimrod, at the head of a large body of adventurers, and laid the foundations of Nineveh, where he resided, and erected a new kingdom, called Assyria, after his name. Gen. 10: 11. These events happened not long after Nimrod had established the Chaldean monarchy, and fixed his residence at Babylon; but it does not appear that Nimrod reigned in Assyria. The kingdoms of Assyria and Babylon were originally distinct and separate; (Micah 5: 6.) and in this state they remained until Ninus conquered Babylon, and made it tributary to the Assyrian empire. Ninus, the successor of Ashur, (Gen. 10: 11.) seized on Chaldea after the death of Nimrod, and united the kingdoms of Assyria and Babylon. This great prince is said to have subdued Asia, Persia, Media, Egypt, &c. If he did so, the effects of his conquests were of no long duration; for, in the days of Abraham, we do not find that any of the neighboring kingdoms were subject to Assyria. Ninus was succeeded by Semiramis, a princess bold, enterprising, and fortunate; of whose adventures and exploits many fabulous relations have been recorded. Playfair is of opinion that there were two princesses of this name, who flourished at different periods: one, the consort of Ninus; and another, who lived five generations before Nitocris, queen of Nebuchadnezzar. Of the successors of Ninus and Semiramis, nothing certain is recorded. The last of the ancient Assyrian kings was Sardanapalus, who was besieged in his capital by Abaces, governor of Media, in concurrence with the Babylonians. These united forces defeated the Assyrian army, demolished the capital, and became masters of the empire, B. C. 821.

"After the death of Sardanapalus," says Mr. Playfair, "the Assyrian empire was divided into three kingdoms; namely, the Median, Assyrian, and Babylonian. Arba ces retained the supreme authority, and nominated governors in Assyria and Babylon, who were honored with the title of kings, while they remained subject and tributary to the Persian monarchs. Belesis," he says, "a Chaldean priest, who assisted Arbaces in the conquest of Sardapanalus, received the government of Babylon as the reward of his services; and Phul was intrusted with that of Assyria. The Assyrian governor gradually enlarged the boundaries of his kingdom, and was succeeded by Tiglath-pileser, Salmanasar, and Sennacherib, who asserted and maintained their independence. After the death of Esar-haddon, the brother and successor of Sennacherib, the kingdom of Assyria was split, and annexed to the kingdoms of Media and Babylon. Several tributary princes afterwards reigned in Nineveh; but we hear no more of the kings of Assyria, but of those of Babylon. Cyaxares, king of Media, assisted Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in the siege of Nineveh, which they took and destroyed, B. C. 606."

The history of Assyria, deduced from scripture, and acknowledged as the only authentic one by Sir Isaac Newton and many others, ascribes the foundation of the monarchy to Pul, or Phul, about the second year of Menahem, king of Israel, twenty-four years before the era of Nabonassar, fifteen hundred and seventy-nine years after the flood, and, according to Blair, seven hundred and sixty-nine, or, according to Newton, seven hundred and ninety years before Christ. Menahem, having taken forcible possession of the throne of Israel by the murder of Shallum, (2 Kings 15: 10.) was attacked by Pul, but prevented the hostilities meditated against him by presenting the invader with a thousand talents of silver. Pul, thus gratified, took the kingdom of Israel under his protection, returned to his own country, after having received voluntary homage from several nations in his march, as he had done from Israel, and became the founder of a great empire. As it was in the days of Pul that the Assyrians began to afflict the inhabitants of Palestine, (2 Kings 11: 9. 1 Chron. 5: 26.) this was the time, according to Sir Isaac Newton, when the Assyrian empire arose. Thus he interprets the words, "since the time of the kings of Assyria;" (Nehem. 9: 32.) that is, since the time of the kingdom of Assyria, or since the rise of that empire. But though this was the period in which the Assyrians afflicted Israel, it is not so evident that the time of the kings of Assyria must necessarily be understood of the rise of the Assyrian empire. However, Newton thus reasons; and observes, that "Pul and his successors afflicted Israel, and conquered the nations round about them; and upon the ruin of many small and ancient kingdoms erected their empire; conquering the Medes, as well as other nations." It is further argued, that God, by the prophet Amos, in the reign of Jeroboam, about ten or twenty years before the reign of Pul, (see Amos 6: 13, 14.) threatened to raise up a nation against Israel; and that, as Pul reigned presently after the prophecy of Amos, and was the first upon record who began to fulfil it, he may be justly reckoned the first conqueror and founder of this empire. (See 1 Chron. 5: 26.) Pul was succeeded on the throne of Assyria by his elder son Tiglath-pileser; and at the same time he left Babylon to his younger son, Nabonassar, B. C. 747. Of the conquests of this second king of Assyria against the kings of Israel and Syria, when he took Damascus, and subdued the Syrians, we have an account in 2 Kings 15: 29, 37. 16: 5, 9. 1 Chron. 5: 26. by which the prophecy of Amos was fulfilled, and from which it appears that the empire of the Assyrians was now become great and powerful. The next king of Assyria was Shalmaneser, or Salmanassar, who succeeded Tiglath-pileser, B. C. 729, and invaded Phœnicia, took the city of Samaria, and, B. C. 721, carried the ten tribes into captivity, placing them in Chalach and Chabor, by the river Gazon, and in the cities of the Medes. 2 Kings 17: 6. Shalmaneser was succeeded by Sennacherib, B. C. 719; and in the year B. C. 714, he was put to flight with great slaughter by the Ethiopians and Egyptians. In the year B. C. 711, the Medes revolted from the Assyrians; Sennacherib was slain; and he was succeeded by his son Esar-Haddon, Asserhaddon, Asordan, Assaradin, or Sarchedon, by which names he is called by different writers. He began his reign at Nineveh, in the year of Nabonassar, 42; and in the year 68 extended it over Babylon. He then carried the remainder of the Samaritans into captivity, and peopled Samaria with captives brought from several parts of his kingdom; and in the year of Nabonassar 77 or 78, he seems to have put an end to the reign of the Ethiopians over Egypt. "In the reign of Sennacherib and Asser-Haddon," says Sir Isaac Newton, "the Assyrian empire seems arrived at its greatness; being united under one monarch, and containing Assyria, Media, Apolloniatis, Susiana, Chaldæa, Mesopotamia, Cilicia, Syria, Phœnicia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and part of Arabia; and reaching eastward into Elymais, and Parætacene, a province of the Medes; and if Chalach and Chabor be Colchis and Iberia, as some think, and as may seem probable from the circumcision used by those nations till the days of Herodotus, we are also to add these two provinces, with the two Armenias, Pontus, and Cappadocia, as far as to the river Halys; for Herodotus tells us that the people of Cappadocia, as far as to that river, were called Syrians by the Greeks, both before and after the days of Cyrus; and that the Assyrians were also called Syrians by the Greeks." Asser-Haddon was succeeded in the year B. C. 668, by Saouduchinus. At this time, Manasseh was allowed to return home, and fortify Jerusalem; and the Egyptians also, after the Assyrians had harassed Egypt and Ethiopia three years, (Isa. 20: 3, 4,) were set at liberty. Saouduchinus, after a reign of twenty years, was succeeded at Babylon, and probably at Nineveh also, by Chyniladon, in the year B. C. 647. This Chyniladon is supposed by Newton to be the Nebuchodonosor mentioned in the book of Judith, (1: 1—15,) who made war upon Arphaxad, king of the Medes; and, though deserted by his auxiliaries of Cilicia, Damascus, Syria, Phœnicia, Moab, Ammon, and Egypt, routed the army of the Medes, and slew Arphaxad. This Arphaxad is supposed to be either Dejojces or his son Phraortes, mentioned by Herodotus. Soon after the death of Phraortes, in the year B. C. 635, the Scythians invaded the Medes and Persians; and in 625, Nabopolassar, the commander of the forces of Chyniladon in Chaldea, revolted from him, and became king of Babylon. Chyniladon was either then or soon after succeeded at Nineveh by the last king of Assyria, called Sarac by Polyhistor. The authors of the Universal History suppose Saouduchinus to have been the prince, who in the book of Judith is called Nebuchodonosor. Following up his successes, he reduced many of the cities in Media, stormed the celebrated capital Ecbatana, and levelled it with the ground, after which he returned in triumph to Nineveh, the capital of his dominions. No sooner were the rejoicings for this victory over, than he resolved to punish the nations who had refused to assist him; and for that purpose sent Holofernes, the general of his army, to destroy by fire and sword all that should oppose him. The command, dictated by revenge, was executed with cruelty, and the march of Holofernes through Mesopotamia was marked by desolation and blood. The brave inhabitants of Bethulia first dared to oppose his progress. Fired with indignation, he invested the city, cut off every supply of water, and reduced the place to the utmost distress. The beauty and the intrepidity of Judith, if we may give credit to the book which bears her name, saved her city and country from inevitable destruction. Approaching the hostile camp, she insinuated herself into the tent and affections of Holofernes; and in the dead of night, when her watchful eye observed him buried in sleep and wine, severed his head from his body with his own sword, and escaped to her friends. The death of the leader struck his army with consternation, and in their sudden flight they lost their baggage, and were pursued with great slaughter. Nebuchodonosor seems not long to have survived the destruction of his army, and his throne was filled by Sarac.

At length, Nebuchadnezzar, the son of Nabopolassar, married Amyit, the daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes, and sister of Cyaxares; and by this marriage the two families having contracted affinity, they conspired against the Assyrians. Nabopolassar being old, and Astyages dead, their sons Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares led the armies of the two nations against Nineveh, slew Sarac, destroyed the city, and shared the kingdom of the Assyrians. This victory the Jews refer to the Chaldeans; the Greeks, to the Medes; Tobit, (14: 15.) Polyhistor, and Ctesias, to both. With this victory commenced the great successes of Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares, and it laid the foundation of the two collateral empires of the Babylonians and Medes, which were branches of the Assyrian empire; and hence the time of the fall of the Assyrian empire is determined, the conquerors being then in their youth. In the reign of Josiah, when Zephaniah prophesied, Nineveh and the kingdom of Assyria were standing; and their fall was predicted by that prophet. Zeph. 1: 3. 2: 13. And in the end of his reign, Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, the successor of Psammetichus, went up against the king of Assyria to the river Euphrates, to fight against Carchemish, or Circutium; and in his way thither slew Josiah, (2 Kings 23: 29. 2 Chron. 35: 20.) and therefore the last king of Assyria was not yet slain. But in the third and fourth years of Jehoiakim, the successor of Josiah, the two conquerors having taken Nineveh, and finished their war in Assyria, prosecuted their conquests westward; and leading their forces against the king of Egypt, as an invader of their right of conquest, they beat him at Carchemish, and took from him whatever he had recently taken from the Assyrians; (2 Kings 24: 7. Jer. 46: 2.) "and therefore we cannot err," says Sir Isaac Newton, "above a year or two, if we refer the destruction of Nineveh, and fall of the Assyrian empire, to the third year of Jehoiakim," or the hundred and fortieth, or, according to Blair, the hundred and forty-first, year of Nabonassar; that is, the year B. C. 607.

Of the government, laws, religion, learning, customs, &c., of the ancient Assyrians, nothing absolutely certain is recorded. Their kingdom was at first small, and subsisted for several ages under hereditary chiefs; and their government was simple. Afterwards, when they rose to the sublimity of empire, their government seems to have been despotic, and the empire hereditary. Their laws were probably few, and depended upon the mere will of the prince. To Ninus we may ascribe the division of the Assyrian empire into provinces and governments; for we find that this institution was fully established in the reigns of Semiramis and her successors. The people were distributed into a certain number of tribes; and their occupations or professions were hereditary. The Assyrians had several distinct councils, and several tribunals for the regulation of public affairs. Of councils there were three, which were created by the body of the people, and who governed the state in conjunction with the sovereign. The first consisted of officers who had retired from military employments; the second, of the nobility; and the third, of the old men. The sovereigns also had three tribunals, whose province it was to watch over the conduct of the people. The Assyrians have been competitors with the Egyptians for the honor of having invented alphabetic writing. It appears, from the few remains now extant of the writing of these ancient nations, that their letters had a great affinity with each other. They much resembled one another in shape; and they ranged them in the same manner, from right to left.—Jones; Watson.

ASTAROTH, or ASTARTE, or ASHTORETH; the name of one of the Syrian deities, called by Jeremiah "the queen of heaven," (ch. 7: 18, and 44: 17—25.) A temple was erected to this idol, at the city of Hierapolis in Syria, where three hundred priests attended at her altar, and were constantly employed in offering sacrifices. Solomon, seduced from his allegiance to the God of his fathers through the influence of his foreign wives, introduced the worship of Ashtoreth in Israel, and built a temple to her on the mount of Olives. 1 Kings 11: 4—8. 2 Kings 23: 13. Milton, in the first book of his Paradise Lost, l. 437, &c., thus refers to this object of idolatrous worship:

—With these in troops
Came ASHTORETH, whom the Phenicians call'd
ASTARTE, queen of heav'n, with crescent horns;
To whose bright image nightly by the moon
Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs,
In Sion also not unang, where stood
Her temple on th' offensive mountain, built
By that uxorious king, whose heart, though large,
Reguill'd by fair idolatresses, fell
To idols foul.

Her temple at Aphac, on mount Libanus, is said to have been a perfect stew of lewdness, a very school of the most beastly lusts, there practised by her votaries, because Venus was supposed to have had her first intercourse with that place with her beloved Adonis.—Gibbon's Rome, vol. i. chap. 6.; Jones.

ASTAROTH, ASTAROTH-CARNAÏM, or CARENAÏM, or CARNEA, (Gen. 14: 5.) was a city beyond Jordan, six miles from Adraa, or Edrei, between that city and Abila. There were two places named Astaroth, in the Batanea, nine miles from each other, between Abila and Adraa. There was also a Carnaïm, as Eusebius says, not far from Jerusalem. (See CARNAÏM.) Astaroth Carnaïm is supposed to be derived from the goddess Astarte, adorned there, who was represented with horns, or a crescent: for car- naim signifies horns. 2 Mac. 12: 26. mentions a temple of the goddess Atargatis, in Carnion. Atargatis was the same as Derceto, of Askelon, represented as a woman with the lower parts of a fish, called by the Hebrews, Dagon, or the god-fish. (See DAGON.)

ASTARTE. (See ASTAROTH.)
ASTELL, (MARY;) an English lady, eminent for her piety and erudition, was born 1668, and died 1731. She exerted herself much to raise the standard of female education; and her vigorous pen advocated both the rights of her sex, and the doctrines of the Church of England. Living and conversing with the fashionable world, she yet lived a life of holiness; severe in virtue, serene in mind, and cheerful in manner and conversation. She would often say, 'that the real Christian alone has reason to be cheerful; but he ought to be so always.' Her habits were abstemious; regarding temperance as essential to study, as well as to the spirit of devotion, and occasional abstinence as her best physic. She enjoyed uninterrupted health, until, late in life, she was seized with a fatal cancer in her breast. This she long endured; and at length submitted to its amputation with patience and intrepidity. Finding her dissolution drawing near, she ordered her coffin and shroud to be made and brought to her bedside, that her thoughts might not wander from the steady contemplation of God and the world to come.—Betham; Davenport.

ASTONIED; astonished.
ASTONISHMENT; a kind or degree of wonder introduced by surprise. This emotion always relates to things of the highest importance; to things which appear too vast and extensive for the grasp of intellect, rather than to any thing of an intricate nature. The body marks in a striking manner the singular state of the mind under this emotion. The eyes are firmly fixed, without being directed to any particular object; the character of countenance, which was formed by the habitual influence of some predominant affection, is for a time effaced; and a suspension of every other expression, a certain vacuity, strongly notes this state of mind.—Buck. (See AMAZEMENT, WONDER, WINE.)

ASTROLOGERS; such as by observation of the stars and sky, and calculations relative thereto, pretend to foretell future events: they were famous among the heathen, chiefly at Babylon. Isa. 47: 13. Dan. 1: 20.—Brown.

ASTROLOGY; the art of foretelling future events, from the aspects, positions, and influences of the heavenly bodies. The word is compounded of aster, star, and logos, discourse; whence, in the literal sense of the term, astrology should signify no more than the doctrine or science of the stars. Astrology judiciary, or judicial, is what we commonly call simple astrology, or that which pretends to foretell mortal events, even those which have a dependence on the free will and agency of man; as if they were directed by the stars. This art, which owed its origin to the practice of knavery on credulity, is now universally exploded by the intelligent part of mankind. Judicial astrology is commonly said to have been invented in Chaldea, and thence transmitted to the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans; though some will have it of Egyptian origin, and ascribe the invention to Cham. But we derive it from the Arabians. The Chaldeans, and the Egyptians, and indeed almost all the nations of antiquity, were infatuated with the chimeras of astrology. It originated in the notion, that the stars have an influence, either beneficial or malignant, upon the affairs of men, which may be discovered, and made the ground of certain prediction, in particular cases: and the whole art consisted in applying astronomical observations to this fanciful purpose. Diodorus Siculus relates, that the Chaldeans learned these arts from the Egyptians; and he would not have made this assertion, if there had not been at least a general tradition that they were practised from the earliest times in Egypt. The system was, in those remote ages, intimately connected with Sabianism, or the worship of the stars as divinities; but whether it emanates from idolatry or fatality, it denies God and his providence, and is therefore condemned in the Scriptures, and ranked with practices the most offensive and provoking to the Divine Majesty.—Watson. (See ASTRONOMY.)

ASTRONOMY. The interests of agriculture and navigation required some knowledge of astronomy. An evidence that an attempt was made, at a very early period, to regulate the year by the annual revolution of the sun, may be found in the fact, that the Jewish months were divided into thirty days each. Gen. 7: 11. 8: 4. In astronomy, the Egyptians, Babylonians, and Phenicians exhibited great superiority. We are informed, there were magicians or enchanters in Egypt, (Exod. 7: 11. Lev. 20: 27. 19: 31. Deut. 18: 20.) denominated in Hebrew mek-shephim, because they computed eclipses of the sun and moon, and pretended to the people, that they produced them by the efficacy of their own enchantments. Some of the constellations are mentioned by name in Job 9: 9. 38: 31, 32. Isa. 13: 10. Amos 5: 8. 2 Kings 23: 5.

It is by no means a matter of wonder, that the Hebrews did not devote greater attention to astronomy, since the study of astrology, which was intimately connected with that of astronomy, and was very highly estimated among the neighboring nations, Isa. 47: 9. Jer. 27: 9. 1: 35. Dan. 2: 13, 43., was interdicted to the Hebrews. Deut. 18: 10. Lev. 20: 27. Daniel, indeed, studied the art of astrology at Babylon, but he did not practise it. Dan. 1: 20. 2: 2. The astrologers (and those wise men mentioned, Matt. 2: appear to have been such,) divided the heavens into apartments or habitations, to each one of which apartments they assigned a ruler or president. This develops the origin of the word, beelzeboul, or the Lord of the celestial dwelling. Matt. 10: 25. 12: 24, 27. Mark 3: 22. Luke 11: 15—19.—Hornac's Introduction.

I. ASTYAGES, otherwise CYAXARES, king of the Medes, successor of Phraortes, reigned forty years, and died A. M. 3109, ante A. D. 595. He had a son, called Astyages, or Darius; and two daughters, Mandane and Amyit. For Astyages, or Darius, or Ahasuerus, see the following article. Amyit married Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, king of Chaldea, and was mother of Evil-merodach. Mandane married Cambyzes the Persian, and was mother of Cyrus.—Calmet.

II. ASTYAGES, otherwise ANASUERUS, (Dan. 9: 1.) or ARTAXERXES, (Dan. 6: 1. Gr.) or DARIUS the Mede, (Dan. 5: 31.) or CYAXARES, (by his father's name,) or Apandaz, was, by his father, Cyaxares, appointed governor of Media, and sent with Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, against Sarac, (or Chimiladanus,) king of Assyria, whom they besieged in Nineveh, took that city, and dismembered the Assyrian empire. (See ASSYRIA.) Astyages was with Cyrus at the conquest of Babylon, and succeeded Belshazzar, king of Babylon. Dan. 5: 30, 31. A. M. 3147. Cyrus succeeded him, 3456, Dan. 5: 65. See Isa. 13: 14: 21: 45: 46: 47. Jer. 50: 51.—Calmet.

ASUPPIM, HOUSE OF. This word occurs 1 Chron. 26: 15. Asuppim signifies collections. Hence the phrase is used evidently for a store-house; probably of precious things, connected with the temple.

ASYLUM. This word signifies a sanctuary, whither unfortunate persons might retire for security from their enemies, and from whence they could not be forced. It has been supposed that Hercules' grandsons were the institutors of these places of refuge, in Greece, if not in Europe; for, apprehending the resentment of those whom Hercules had ill-treated, they appointed an asylum or temple of mercy at Athens. Cadmus erected another at Thebes, and Romulus another at Rome, on mount Palatine. That of Daphne, near Antioch, was very famous. 2 Macc. 4: 31. Theseus built an asylum at Athens in favor of slaves, and of the poor who should fly thither, from the oppression of the rich. There was one in the isle of Calauria.—The temples of Apollo at Delphi, of Juno at Samos, of Esculapius at Delos, of Bacchus at Ephesus, and many others in Greece, had the privileges of being asyla. Romulus gave this right to a wood adjoining the temple of Vejovis. (Virgil, Æneid. viii. 342.) Ovid speaks of a wood near Ostium, that enjoyed the same privilege. (Fast. l. 1.) Austin observes, (de Civit. lib. i. cap. 34.) that the whole city of Rome was an asylum to all strangers.—The number of these privileged places was so much increased in Greece, under the emperor Tiberius, that he was obliged to recal their licenses, and to suppress them. (Sueton. in Tiberio. Tacit. Annal. lib. iii. cap. 6.) But his decree was little observed after his death.

The altar of burnt sacrifices, and the temple at Jerusalem, were sanctuaries. Hither Joab retired; (1 Kings 2: 28, 29, 31.) but Solomon observing that he would not quit the altar, ordered him to be killed there. Moses commands (Exod. 21: 14.) that any who had committed murder, and fled for protection to the altar, should be dragged from thence. Sanctuaries were not for the advantage of wicked men, but in favor of the innocent, when attacked unjustly. When criminals retired to the sanctuary of a temple, they were either starved, or forced thence, by fires kindled around them. (See REFUGE.)—Calmet.

ATAD. At Atad's threshing-floor (Gen. 1: 11.) the sons of Jacob, and the Egyptians who accompanied them, mourned for Jacob; whence it was afterwards called Abel-Mizraim, "the mourning of the Egyptians." (See ABEL-MIZRAIM.)—Calmet.

ATAROTH. There are several cities of this name:—1. One in the tribe of Gad, beyond Jordan, (Numb. 32: 3, 34.) the same, probably, with Atroth-Shophan, given to this tribe, verse 35.—2. Another on the frontiers of Ephraim, between Janohah and Jericho, (Josh. 16: 7.) probably Ataroth-Addar, 16: 5. 18: 13.—3. ATAROTH BETH-JOAB, in Judah. 1 Chron. 2: 51.—Calmet.

ATHALIAH; daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, and wife of Joram, king of Judah. Her history is given in the eleventh chapter of 2 Kings, and is fearfully monitory. Racine has written a tragedy upon it.

ATHANASIUS, the celebrated patriarch of Alexandria, was born in that city about 296. At the council of Nice, though then but a deacon of Alexandria, his reputation for skill in controversy gained him an honorable place in the council, and with signal ability he exposed the sophistry of those who pleaded on the side of Arius. Six months after, he was appointed the successor of Alexander. Notwithstanding the influence of the emperor, who had recalled Arius from banishment, and upon a plausible confession of his faith, in which he affected to be orthodox in his sentiments, directed that he should be received by the Alexandrian church, Athanasius refused to admit him to communion, and exposed his prevarication. The Arians upon this exerted themselves to raise tumults at Alexandria, and to injure the character of Athanasius with the emperor, who was prevailed upon by falsehoods to pronounce against him a sentence of banishment. In the beginning of the reign of Constantius, he was recalled to his happy people, but was again disturbed and deposed through the influence of the Arians. Accusations were also sent against him and other bishops from the east to the west; but they were acquitted by pope Julius in full council. Athanasius was restored a second time to his see upon the death of the Arian bishop, who had been placed in it. Arianism, however, being in favor at court, he was condemned by a council convened at Arles, and by another at Milan, and was a third time obliged to fly into the deserts. His enemies pursued him even here, and set a price upon his head. In this situation, Athanasius composed writings full of eloquence to strengthen the faith of believers, and expose the falsehood of his enemies. He returned with the other bishops whom Julian the apostate recalled from banishment, and in A. D. 362, held a council at Alexandria, where the belief of a consubstantial Trinity was openly professed. Many now were recovered from Arianism, and brought to subscribe the Nicene creed. But his peace was again interrupted by the complaints of the heathen, whose temples the zeal of Athanasius kept always empty. He was again obliged to fly to save his life. The accession of Jovian brought him back. During the reign of Jovian, also, Athanasius held another council, which declared its adherence to the Nicene faith; and with the exception of a short retirement under Valens, he was permitted to sit down in quiet and govern his affectionate church of Alexandria, until his death, in 373. Of the forty-six years of his official life, he spent twenty in banishment.

Athanasius, (says the Encyclopedia Americana,) is one of the greatest men of whom the church can boast. His deep mind, his noble heart, his invincible courage, his living faith, his unbounded benevolence, sincere humility, lofty eloquence, and strictly virtuous life, gained the honor and love of all. In all his writings, his style is distinguished for clearness and moderation. The best edition is that of Montfaucon, Paris, 1698.

Athanasius was an eminent instrument of maintaining the truth, in an age when errors affecting the great foundation of our faith were urged with great subtlety. The Scripture doctrine of the Trinity, as explained by him, at length triumphed over the heresies which at one time met with so much support and sanction; and the views of Athanasius have been received, in substance, by all orthodox churches to the present time.—Watson; Encyclopedia Americana.

ATHANASIANS; the orthodox followers of St. Athanasius, the great and able antagonist of Arius. The Athanasian creed, though generally admitted not to be drawn up by this father, (but probably, as Dr. Waterland says, by Hilary, bishop of Arles, in the fifth century,) is universally allowed to contain a fair expression of his sentiments. This creed says, "The catholic faith is this: that we worship one God in trinity, and trinity in unity: neither confounding the persons, nor dividing the substance. For there is one person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost. But the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal. Such as the Father is, such is the Son, and such is the Holy Ghost;" namely, "uncreate, incomprehensible, eternal," &c. "The Father is made of none, neither created nor begotten. The Son is of the Father alone; neither made nor created, but begotten. The Holy Ghost is of the Father and the Son; neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding."

The true key to the Athanasian creed lies in the knowledge of the errors to which it was opposed. The Sabellians considered the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as one in person;—this was "confounding the persons:" the Arians considered them as differing in essence—three beings;—this was "dividing the substance;" and against these two hypotheses was the creed originally framed. And since every sect was willing to adopt the language of Scripture, it was thought necessary to adopt scholastic terms, in order to fix the sense of Scripture language.

The eternal generation of the Son of God forms an essential part of this creed, as well as of the Nicene: it is on this principle that the Son is called "God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made;"—which certainly does not apply to the human nature of Christ, which was "made of a woman—made under the law." Most certain it is, that many of the Christian fathers maintain this mysterious doctrine of eternal generation; and it has had able defenders, down to Dr. J. Owen, Dr. Waterland, Dr. Edward Williams, and Andrew Fuller. On the other hand, Trinitarians equally zealous have considered the opinion as both inconsistent in itself, and derogatory to the Son of God—"as implying derivation and inferiority"—though certainly not so intended by the Athanasians. Dr. Watts, and other advocates for the pre-existence of Christ's human soul, have considered the production of this first of creatures, as the highest sense in which our Savior is in Scripture called "the Son of God."—Doddridge's Works, (Parsons's edit.) vol. v. p. 182.

If on this subject the writer might, as an individual, express his own sentiments, the chief fault in the creed itself is, its overstepping the modesty of Scripture, and attempting to define, with accuracy, where the sacred writers seem designedly to have left the subject under the veil of mystery. The Supreme Being is, in all respects, so infinitely above the conception of men, and perhaps of angels, that it becomes us to conduct all speculations relative to the Deity with reverence, and even awe; to veil our faith under the wings of devotion, as the seraphim cover their faces while they worship.

But the most exceptionable part of this creed lies in what are commonly called "the damnatory clauses"—"Whoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the catholic faith; which faith, except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly. And the catholic faith is this?"—proceeding to the statements of the doctrine of the trinity above given. Now it is most certain, that we cannot use too much caution on this subject. The Scripture indeed speaks of faith in Christ as necessary to salvation, but refers rather, perhaps, to the vital principle itself, than to any form of confession; and it seems above all things improper to mingle anathemas with our devotions. This has led many of the English clergy and bishops, to wish they were "well rid" of this creed altogether, which is certainly a prevailing sentiment; and were the question now put, on admitting this formulary into the church service, there are, perhaps, but few, comparatively, that would vote for it. However orthodox it may be, it does not appear to be written in a Christian spirit. (See ARTICLES.)—Watson; Williams; Dr. Waterland's Cr. Hist. of the Athanasian Creed; Rev. T. H. Horne's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity; Burnett on the Articles, art. ii. and viii.; Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 62.

ATHEIST; in the strict and proper sense of the word, is one who does not believe in the existence of a God, or who owns no being superior to nature. It is compounded of the two terms, a, negative, and theos, God, signifying without God. Atheists have been also known by the name infidels; but the word infidel is now commonly used to distinguish a more numerous party, and is become almost synonymous with deist. He who disbelieves the existence of a God, as an infinite, intelligent, and a moral agent, is a direct or speculative atheist; he who confesses a Deity and providence in words, but detests them in his life and actions, is a practical atheist. That atheism existed in some sense before the flood, may be suspected from what we read in Scripture, as well as from heathen tradition; and it is not very unreasonable to suppose, that the deluge was partly intended to evince to the world a heavenly power, as Lord of the universe, and superior to the visible system of nature. This was at least a happy consequence of that fatal catastrophe; for, as it is observed by dean Sherlock, "The universal deluge, and the confusion of languages, had so abundantly convinced mankind of a divine power and providence, that there was no such creature as an atheist, till their ridiculous idolatries had tempted some men of wit and thought, rather to own no God than such as the heathens worshipped."

Atheistical principles were long nourished and cherished in Greece, and especially among the atomical, peripatetic, and sceptical philosophers; and hence some have ascribed the origin of atheism to the philosophy of Greece. This is true, if they mean that species of refined atheism, which contrives any impious scheme of principles to account for the origin of the world, without a Divine Being. For though there may have been in former ages, and in other countries, some persons irreli-gious in principle as well as in practice, yet we know of none who, forming a philosophical scheme of impiety, became a sect, and erected colleges of atheistical learning, till the arrogant and enterprising genius of Greece undertook that detestable work. Carrying their presumptuous and ungoverned speculations into the very essence of the divinity, at first they doubted, and at length denied, the existence of a first cause independent of nature, and of a providence that superintends its laws, and governs the concerns of mankind. These principles, with the other improvements of Greece, were transferred to Rome; and, excepting in Italy, we hear little of atheism, for many ages after the Christian era. "For some ages before the Reformation," says archbishop Tillotson, "atheism was confined to Italy, and had its chief residence at Rome. But, in this last age, atheism has travelled over the Alps and infected France, and now of late it hath crossed the seas, and invaded our nation, and hath prevailed to amazement." However, to Tillotson, and other able writers, we owe its suppression in England; for they pressed it down with a weight of sound argument, from which it has never been able to raise itself. For although in our time, in France and Germany a subtle atheism was revived, and spread its unhallowed and destructive influence for many years throughout the continent, it made but little progress in that better-instructed nation.

Atheism, in its primary sense, comprehends, or at least goes beyond, every heresy in the world; for it professes to acknowledge no religion, true or false. The two leading hypotheses which have prevailed, among atheists, respecting this world and its origin, are, that of Ocellus Lucanus, adopted and improved by Aristotle, that it was eternal; and that of Epicurus, that it was formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms. "That the soul is material and mortal, Christianity an imposture, the Scripture a forgery, the worship of God superstition, hell a fable, and heaven a dream, our life without providence, and our death without hope, like that of asses and dogs, are part of the glorious gospel of our modern atheists."

The being of a God may be proved from the marks of design, and from the order and beauty visible in the world; from universal consent; from the relation of cause and effect; from internal consciousness; and from the necessity of a final as well as an efficient cause.

Of all the false doctrines and foolish opinions that ever infested the mind of man, nothing can possibly equal that of atheism, which is such a monstrous contradiction of all evidence, of all the powers of understanding, and the dictates of common sense, that it may be well questioned whether any man can really fall into it by a deliberate use of his judgment. All nature so clearly points out, and so loudly proclaims, a Creator of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, that whoever hears not its voice, and sees not its proofs, may well be thought wilfully deaf, and obstinately blind. If it be evident, self-evident to every man of thought, that there can be no effect without a cause, what shall we say of that manifold combination of effects, that series of operations, that system of wonders, which fill the universe, which present themselves to all our perceptions, and strike our minds and our senses on every side? Every faculty, every object of every faculty, demonstrates a Deity. The meanest insect we can see, the minutest and most contemptible weed we can tread upon, is really sufficient to confound atheism, and baffle all its pretensions. How much more that astonishing variety and multiplicity of God's works with which we are continually surrounded! Let any man survey the face of the earth, or lift up his eyes to the firmament; let him consider the nature and instincts of brute animals, and afterwards look into the operations of his own mind, and will he presume to say or suppose that all the objects he meets with are nothing more than the result of unaccountable accidents and blind chance? Can he possibly conceive that such wonderful order should spring out of confusion? or that such perfect beauty should be ever formed by the fortuitous operations of unconscious, inactive particles of matter? As well, any better, and more easily, might he suppose that an earthquake might happen to build towns and cities; or the materials carried down by a flood fit themselves up without hands into a regular fleet.

For what are towns, cities, or fleets, in comparison of the vast and amazing fabric of the universe! In short, atheism offers such violence to all our faculties, that it seems scarce credible it should ever really find any place in the human understanding. Atheism is unreasonable, because it gives no tolerable account of the existence of the world. This is one of the greatest difficulties with which the atheist has to contend. For he must suppose either that the world is eternal, or that it was formed by chance and a fortuitous concourse of the parts of matter. That the world had a beginning, is evident from universal tradition, and the most ancient history that exists; from there being no memorials of any actions performed previously to the time assigned in that history as the era of the creation; from the origin of learning and arts, and the liability of the parts of matter to decay. That the world was not produced by chance, is also evident. Nothing can be more unreasonable than to ascribe to chance an effect which appears with all the characters of a wise design and contrivance. Will chance fit means to ends, even in ten thousand instances, and not fail in a single one? How often might a man, after shaking a set of letters in a bag, throw them on the ground, before they would become an exact poem, or form a good discourse in prose? In short, the arguments in proof of Deity are so numerous, and at the same time so obvious to a thinking mind, that to waste time in disputing with an atheist, is approaching too much towards that irrationality, which may be considered as one of the most striking characteristics of the sect.

The more noted atheists, since the Reformation, are Machiavel, Spinoza, Hobbes, Blount, and Vanini. To these may be added Hume, and Voltaire, the corypheus of the sect, and the great nursing father of that swarm of them which has appeared in these last days.

Dr. Samuel Clarke, in his "Demonstration of the Being of a God," says, that atheism arises either from stupid ignorance, or from corruption of principles and manners, or from the reasonings of false philosophy; and he adds, that the latter, who are the only atheistical persons capable of being reasoned with at all, must of necessity own, that, supposing it cannot be proved to be true, yet it is a thing very desirable, and which any wise man would wish to be true, for the great benefit and happiness of man, that there was a God, an intelligent and wise, a just and good Being, to govern the world. Whatever hypothesis these men can possibly frame, whatever argument they can invent, by which they would exclude God and providence out of the world; that very argument, or hypothesis, will of necessity lead them to this concession. If they argue, that our notion of God arises not from nature and reason, but from the art and contrivance of politicians; that argument itself forces them to confess, that it is manifestly for the interest of human society, that it should be believed there is a God. If they suppose that the world was made by chance, and is every moment subject to be destroyed by chance again; no man can be so absurd as to contend, that it is as comfortable and desirable to live in such an uncertain state of things, and so continually liable to ruin, without any hope of renovation, as in a world that is under the preservation and conduct of a powerful, wise, and good God. If they argue against the being of God, from the faults and defects which they imagine they can find in the frame and constitution of the visible and material world; this supposition obliges them to acknowledge that it would have been better the world had been made by an intelligent and wise Being, who might have prevented all faults and imperfections. If they argue against providence, from the faultiness and inequality which they think they discover in the management of the moral world; this is a plain confession that it is a thing more fit and desirable in itself, that the world should be governed by a just and good Being, than by mere chance or unintelligent necessity. Lastly, if they suppose the world to be eternally and necessarily self-existent, and consequently that every thing in it is established by a blind and eternal fatality; no rational man can at the same time deny, but that liberty and choice, or a free power of acting, is a more eligible state, than to be determined thus in all our actions, as a stone is to move downward, by an absolute and inevitable fate. In a word, which way soever they turn themselves, and whatever hypothesis they make, concerning the original and frame of things, nothing is so certain and undeniable, as that man, considered without the protection and conduct of a superior Being, is in a far worse case than upon supposition of the being and government of God, and of men's being under his peculiar conduct, protection, and favor.—Watson; Paley's Nat. Theology; Gisborne's do.; Dwight's Theology, vol. i. sermons 1, 2, and 3.

ATHENAIS, (afterwards ELIA EUDOCIA,) empress of the East, was the daughter of Leontinus, an Athenian philosopher, who gave her a most elegant and liberal education. To the learning and philosophy of the Greeks she added the arts of elocution and music. Her father at his death left all his property to her two brothers, except one hundred pieces of gold, saying in his will, that "her unequalled merit was a sufficient portion." This merit, however, was certainly no apology for such manifest injustice; which was aggravated by the harsh treatment of her brothers, who forced her to take refuge with an aunt on her mother's side. Her aunt took her to Constantinople, about the year 420, and made the princess Pulcheria acquainted with her situation. This princess, struck with her singular beauty, learning, and modesty, found means of making the admirable qualities of her fair protegee known to her brother Theodosius, surnamed the Young. To him Athenais was soon married, and was acknowledged empress of the East in 422. Before her marriage she embraced Christianity; the spirit of which she exercised towards her brothers. On hearing of her good fortune, they had fled; but she caused them to be brought to Constantinople, obtained their forgiveness of the emperor, and their elevation to stations of honor and trust. "I regard you" said she, "as the instruments of my elevation. It was not your cruelty, but the hand of Providence which brought me here, to raise me to the throne."

Arrayed in the imperial purple, she still cultivated her studies with ardor, and in every department of the sciences then known, was thought to equal any philosopher of the other sex. Her poems were the admiration of her own and succeeding ages. She translated into verse the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, together with the prophecies of Daniel and Zechariah. The learned Photius speaks highly both of the merit of the poetry, and of the fidelity of the translations; so that her name was ranked among theologians, as well as among the literati; and this while at the head of a magnificent court!

About the year 442, falling under the suspicion of the emperor for some trifling cause, she obtained leave to retire to Jerusalem. Here, indignant at the murder of some of her friends, she stained her exalted character by an act of revenge, which she afterwards never ceased to lament. The remaining twenty years of her life were spent in acts of benevolence and usefulness.—Batham.

ATHENS; a city of ancient Greece, distinguished not merely for political greatness, and military power, but rendered still more illustrious by the glory it acquired tants, and from the arts and sciences which were indebted to it either for their origin or their perfection.

Athens was situated on the Saronic gulf, opposite to the eastern coast of the Peloponnesus. It was inclosed in a sort of peninsula, formed by the confluence of the two rivers, the Ilissus and the Cephissus. From the sea, on which its greatness and importance so essentially depended, it lay at the distance of about four miles. It was surrounded by walls of great extent and strength, and had three harbors, the Piræus, Munychia, and Phalerus. A bay, formed by projecting rocks, furnished a species of triple harbor, at once spacious and secure, and the surrounding shore was covered with edifices, the splendor of which soon rivalled those of Athens itself. These harbors were joined to the city by a double range of walls, called "the long walls," of which the north side extending to Piræus was five miles; the south, which branched off to Phalerus, was four miles and a quarter in length; and that encompassing the Piræus was built of hewn stone, and so broad that carriages could cross each other upon them.

In the centre of the city itself, and constituting its chief ornament, stood the Acropolis, the glory of the Grecian art. On this elevation the whole of Athens was originally built; but as the city extended, the Acropolis came to serve merely the purpose of a citadel. Here were accumulated all those works of ornament of which Athens was so prolific; the Acropolis became the grand depository for every thing the most splendid which human genius could produce in painting, sculpture, and architecture. But its prime ornament was the Parthenon or virgin temple of Minerva, an engraving of which is here given; a splendid edifice, two hundred and seventeen feet in length, and ninety-eight in breadth. Destroyed by the Persians, it was rebuilt by Pericles with great additional splendor. Within was the statue of Minerva, by Phidias, the masterpiece of the art of statuary. It was of ivory, thirty-nine feet in height, and entirely covered with pure gold, to the value of twenty-four talents, or one hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling, nearly five hundred thousand dollars. It is now in ruins, and presents an appearance of great desolation. The Propylea also, of white marble, formed magnificent entrances to the Parthenon. This edifice was on the north side of the Acropolis; and near it was the Erechtheum, of white marble also, consisting of two temples, one dedicated to Minerva, the other to Neptune, besides a remarkable edifice called the Pandroseum. In front of the Acropolis, and at each end, were the two theatres, called the theatre of Bacchus, and the Odeum; the one designed for dramatic representations, and the other for music, both of extraordinary magnificence. But though the principal treasures of the Athenian art were accumulated in the Acropolis, the city itself contained many noble structures, among which were the gallery of historical engravings, the tower of the winds, with numerous monuments of illustrious men. of architecture; and the latter of the Corinthian. In fact, the temple of Jupiter Olympius surpassed, if possible, every other structure of which Athens could boast. Immense sums were expended upon it by the Athenians; additions were made to it by successive sovereigns; and at length the fabric was completed by the emperor Adrian. The exterior contained about one hundred and twenty fluted columns, sixty feet high, and six in diameter. The enclosure was half a mile in circumference.

Besides these wondrous productions of art, Athens presented other scenes, sacred in the eyes of posterity by the classical associations to which they give rise. The Academy where Plato taught, was about three quarters of a mile to the north of the town. The Lyceum, where Aristotle diffused the light of science, and which from him became the seat of the Academic school, was situated on the north side of the city, beyond the river Ilissus. Near it was the less famous Cynosarges, where Antisthenes delivered his instructions, and founded the Cynic school. Zeno chose the portico called Paecile, for the place of his lectures; an edifice embellished with representations of Athenian victories. Epicurus, fond at once of society and of rural scenery, was the first to introduce a garden within the walls, thus enjoying at the same instant these two kinds of luxury. But political associations conspired equally with such as were literary, to give interest to particular districts of Athens. The hill of Areopagus, where that august assembly pronounced its decisions; the Prytaneum, or senate-house; the Pnyx, or forum in which the sovereign people of Athens met to deliberate; all these places, without being particularly splendid in themselves, become interesting by the importance of the events of which they were the theatre.

The religion of the common people of Athens consisted in prayers, sacrifices, and purifications. They repaired to the temples of their respective deities with downcast eyes, and dejected countenances; they kissed the ground, offered their prayers, standing, or on their knees, or prostrate; and held branches in their hands which they lifted up towards heaven, or stretched out towards the statue of the god, after applying it to their mouths. In addressing the infernal deities, they struck the earth with their feet or hands. Some pronounced their devout addresses in a low voice; but Pythagoras wished them always to be uttered aloud, that nothing might be asked which could excite a blush. The priests were the principal ministers of religion; next to them were the soothsayers and interpreters of omens. Their worship was originally performed in the open air, upon the tops of mountains, and on these spots temples were afterwards erected, and dedicated to Jupiter, to Apollo, and their other deities. There were several orders of priests, and among them one was denominated "high-priest," who had the superintendance of the rest. Some temples were served by priestesses, and particularly that of Bacchus. Their altars were constructed of various materials, and of different dimensions, according to the variety of gods to whom they were consecrated. Both temples and altars were places of refuge, or asylum, for malefactors and criminals of all descriptions; and it was deemed an act of sacrilege to force them from their sanctuary. Their sacrifices were also of various kinds, according to their object or design, the materials of which they consisted, and the places in which they were offered, as well as the ceremonies that attended them. As public worship was prescribed by one of the fundamental laws, and therefore closely connected with the constitution, it was impossible to attack their superstition without endangering that constitution; it was consequently the duty of magistrates to maintain it, and to oppose all innovations visibly tending to its destruction.

This celebrated city affords a striking instance of a fact which has often been mentioned by the friends of revelation in their controversies with the deists, namely, of how little avail the highest advantages of civilization, of human learning, and of philosophy are, in teaching men the knowledge of the true God, and that worship which is acceptable to him. Athens enjoyed all these advantages in a measure which scarcely any other city that ever existed in the world could boast of. The activity, the cumulation, the free scope to talents of every description, which were excited by her popular form of government, raised her to the highest pinnacle of political consequence. The multitude of great men in every department, who followed each other in splendid succession, even to her last decline, is altogether unexampled. In every branch of science, of philosophy, and of literature, Athens was renowned. But what was its state in regard to the subject of religion? Luke, the sacred historian, has informed us, that when the apostle Paul visited it, A. D. 52, his soul was moved at beholding so fine a city "wholly given up to idolatry." Acts 17: 16. "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools; and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man." Rom. 1: 22, 23. From the earliest times, the objects of religious worship multiplied among the Athenians. They received the twelve principal divinities from the Egyptians, and added to them others from the Lybians and different nations; and so fearful were they of neglecting any deity, or of being found deficient in their religious worship, that they dedicated an altar "to the unknown God." In process of time, a law was enacted, prohibiting, under pain of death, the introduction of any foreign worship, with, ut a decree of the Areopagus. (See AREOPAGUS.)

On the place where the great apostle bore his noble testimony against idols, and declared to them the God whom they ignorantly worshipped, Dr. E. D. Clarke, the traveller, remarks, "It is not possible to conceive a situation of greater peril, or one more calculated to prove the sincerity of a preacher, than that in which the apostle was here placed; and the truth of this, perhaps, will never be better felt than by a spectator, who from this eminence actually beholds the monuments of pagan pomp and superstition by which he, whom the Athenians considered as the setter forth of strange gods, was then surrounded: representing to the imagination the disciples of Socrates and of Plato, the dogmatist of the porch, and the sceptic of the academy, addressed by a poor and lowly man, who, 'rude in speech,' without the 'enticing words of man's wisdom,' enjoined precepts contrary to their taste, and very hostile to their prejudices. One of the peculiar privileges of the Areopagites seems to have been set at defiance by the zeal of St. Paul on this occasion; namely, that of inflicting extreme and exemplary punishment upon any person who should slight the celebration of the holy mysteries, or blaspheme the gods of Greece. We ascended to the summit by means of steps cut in the natural stone. The sublime scene here exhibited is so striking, that a brief description of it may prove how truly it offers to us a commentary upon the apostle's words, as they were delivered upon the spot. He stood upon the top of the rock, and beneath the canopy of heaven. Before him there was spread a glorious prospect of mountains, islands, seas, and skies; behind him towered the lofty Acropolis, crowned with all its marble temples. Thus every object, whether in the face of nature, or among the works of art, conspired to elevate the mind, and to fill it with reverence towards that Being who made and governs the world, Acts 17: 24, 28; who sitteth in that light which no mortal eye can approach, and yet is nigh unto the meanest of his creatures; in whom we live, and move, and have our being."—Jones; Watson; Travels of Anacharsis, vol. ii. ch. 12; Gillies' History of Greece, vol. ii.; Young's History of Athens.

ATHOCIANS; certain sectaries in the third century, who maintained the mortality of the soul, and other errors.—Centur. Magdeb. cent. 13. c. 5; Wilhams.

ATONEMENT, THE DAY OF, was the tenth of Tizri, which nearly answers to our September. The Hebrews call it kippur, or chippur, pardon, or expiation, because the faults of the year were then expiated. The principal ceremonies were the following: The high-priest, after he had washed, not only his hands and his feet, as usual at common sacrifices, but his whole body, dressed himself in plain linen like the other priests, wearing neither his purple robe, nor the ephod, nor the pectoral, because he was to expiate his own sins, together with those of the people. He first offered a bullock and a ram for his own sins, and those of the priests, putting his hands on the heads of the victims, and confessing his own sins, and the sins of his house. Afterwards, he received from the princes of the people two goats for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, to be offered in the name of the whole nation. The lot determined which of the two goats should be sacrificed, and which set at liberty. After this, the high-priest put some of the sacred fire of the altar of burnt-offerings into a censer, threw incense upon it, and entered with it, thus smoking, into the sanctuary. After having perfumed the sanctuary with this incense, he came out, took some of the blood of the young bullock he had sacrificed, carried that also into the sanctuary, and dipping his fingers in it, sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the veil, which separated the holy from the sanctuary, or most holy. Then he came out a second time, and beside the altar of burnt-offerings killed the goat which the lot had determined to be the sacrifice. The blood of this goat he carried into the most holy place, and sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the veil, which separated the holy from the sanctuary: from thence he returned into the court of the tabernacle, and sprinkled both sides of it with the blood of the goat. During this time, none of the priests, or people, were admitted into the tabernacle, or into the court. This being done, the high-priest came to the altar of burnt-offerings, wetted the four horns of it with the blood of the goat, and young bullock, and sprinkled it seven times with the same blood. The sanctuary, the court, and the altar, being thus purified, he directed the goat which was set at liberty by the lot, to be brought to him, which being done, he put his hand on the goat's head, confessed his own sins, and the sins of the people, and then delivered it to a person to carry it to some desert place, and let it loose, or throw it down some precipice. (See SCAPE GOAT.) This being done, the high-priest washed himself all over in the tabernacle, and putting on other clothes, (some think his pontifical dress, his robe of purple, the ephod, and the pectoral,) sacrificed two rams for a burnt-offering, one for himself, and the other for the people. The day was a great solemnity of the Hebrews; a day of rest, and of strict fasting. Leo of Modena, Buxtorf, and others, have collected many particulars relative to the solemnities of this day, from the rabbins, as may be seen in the larger edition of Calmet.—Calmet.

ATONEMENT. The term in the Hebrew language, which we translate atonement, is copher. As a verb, it literally signifies to cover; and, as a noun, a covering. Generally, wherever the word occurs, something that has given serious offence, and produced a permanent state of variance between the parties, is supposed; and then, in relation to the party offended, it signifies to pacify, to appease, or to render him propitious, as Gen. 32: 20. Ezek. 16: 63. When applied to sin, it signifies to cover, or to expiate it; to atone, or make satisfaction for it. Ps. 32: 1. Lev. 16: 30. When the term respects the sinner himself, it implies his being covered or protected from punishment, and is rendered a ransom or atonement for him.

Exod. 21: 30. Ch. 30: 12, 15. This seems to be the plain, unforced meaning of the Hebrew word copher; and when we look into the Greek version of the Old Testament, by the Seventy, we find it translated iltamos, propitiation; and "to make an atonement" they express by the word exilaskomai, which signifies "to render propitious."—Hence, the apostles, who wrote in Greek, when referring to the death of Christ, make use of the very same terms which are applied to the legal sacrifices in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament; representing the former not only as a real and proper sacrifice, but as the truth and substance of all the sacrifices of the Levitical law, and the only true and efficacious atonement for sin. Heb. 9: passim, and ch. 10: 1—19. As, therefore, the Greek word iltamos is expressly applied to Christ, 1 John 2: 2. Ch. 4: 10. and as it gives the true signification of the original word when applied to an atoning sacrifice, we must either admit that the sacrifice of Christ was a real atonement or propitiation for sin, or be reduced to the alternative of denying all that the Scripture says respecting the design and the effect of sacrifices.

The atonement, properly speaking, is a moral and not a commercial transaction. Crimes may be atoned for, but debts cannot be. Debts are transferable, crimes are not; the former may be mere accidents, but the latter enter into the essence of moral character. If debts are assumed and paid by a third person, the first is of right acquitted from farther obligation. But if atonement is offered by a third person for crimes, and the atonement is accepted, the acquittal of the first from punishment is still an act of grace; since the criminal is no less personally deserving of punishment than before. Hence our justification before God, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, is said to be freely, by his grace, and according to the riches of his grace. Rom. 3: 24. Ephes. 1: 7.

In cases where the party offending is unable to render adequate atonement in his own person, and where the punishment could not be endured by him without ruining him—as is the case in all capital offences—if the suffering of another be accepted in his stead, the atonement thus made by a substitute is technically termed a vicarious atonement. This is a case that rarely happens in human governments. Yet this is the case in relation to the atonement made by Christ. He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and by his stripes we are healed. Isa. 53: (See SUBSTITUTION.)

It may be well here to state clearly the Scripture sense of the terms wrath and propitiation, as applied to God, in treating this great subject. Rom. 1: 18. 5: 9. 3: 25. 1 John 4: 10. By the wrath of God, then, is meant, not a turbulent passion, much less a settled implacability; but that moral sentiment of justice, which exists in perfection in the Infinite Mind, and which dictates the punishment of sin. By propitiation is meant that which, in a given case, makes it proper and just for God to exercise his mercy in forgiving sin.

As to the question whether the atonement be general, or limited, "that controversy," as Mr. Malcom observes, "has ever seemed rather the result of misunderstanding between the parties, or of each party looking too exclusively to those aspects of the doctrine, which seemed best to comport with their system of theology. In some respects the atonement is general; in others limited: in respect of sufficiency it is infinite; in respect to its application in the final salvation of men it is limited; but in no respect is it indefinite."

Some writers (as Taylor in Calmet) confound atonement with reconciliation. But the appeal to etymology in defence of this confusion of ideas is but egregious trifling, unworthy of a subject so vast and solemn. And as to Rom. 5: 11. it is well known that the original word there used is not iltamos, but kattallagen, and should have been rendered reconciliation. It is God, and not man, who receives the atonement; but believers, as the whole context shows, receive reconciliation through Christ. The former provides the way, and secures the existence of the latter, in harmony with all the Divine perfections. They differ, therefore, as cause and effect differ; and it is from confounding this distinction, that the most fundamental errors have been paled upon the world with a show of plausibility. In the New Testament, as well as in the Old, the atonement is represented as the ground and basis of reconciliation to God. 2 Cor. 5: 18—21. Heb. 9: 15. Rom. 3: 24—26. 5: 1—21.

Neither is the term atonement to be confounded, as is frequently done, with the term redemption. Between these two terms there are plain differences; and no one without a perception of these differences, can treat this great subject with lucidness or accuracy. They differ in object and design, and of course are of a different nature; so that things may be truly affirmed of one, which cannot be truly affirmed of the other. First, they differ in object. Atonement is offered to God as its object; redemption is purchased or procured for men as its object. Atonement is a sacrifice offered; redemption is a benefit conferred. Secondly, they differ in design. The design of the atonement is to render God propitious, as the Sovereign Ruler; the design of redemption, to make man everlastingly blessed. Hence, thirdly, they differ in nature. Atonement being made to God, and made by a sacrifice of inestimable value, is in its own nature infinite; nor is it possible for us to conceive how its intrinsic worth and glory, or its efficacy and adaptation to its end, could be increased. Its sufficiency is infinite; for who can overrate "the precious blood of Christ," or take exact account of his "unspeakable riches?" Its end was "that God might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." This end was infinitely desirable; for it involves an infinite good, glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, and good-will to men. But this end the atonement has accomplished. GOD IS JUST, AND THE JUSTIFIER OF HIM THAT BELIEVETH IN JESUS. Its efficacy, therefore, is complete. It could not be more so. By one offering of himself, says the apostle, he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified. Heb. 10: 14. Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. Rom. 10: 10. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, rather that is risen again; who is also at the right hand of God, and who maketh intercession for us. Rom. 8: 33, 34. Is not that atonement then in its nature infinite, which is sufficient to satisfy God, the infinite Lawgiver and Judge, in the remission of sin to every one who cordially confides in it; and which so effectually repairs the injury done by sin as to justify Him in the sight of the whole universe for so doing? Can we talk of limits to the value of such a sacrifice? Can we assign bounds to the efficacy of such an expiation? Can we apply terms of measurement to the nature of such an atonement for sin? Is not the covering ample enough to protect a universe from the punishment of sin, were they all in need of its protection, and to resort to it for shelter?

Redemption, on the contrary, is in its very nature definite. It has an inseparable relation to men, as its object; and therefore in its very nature is limited to the number, for whom its price is paid, in whose behalf it is accepted, and on whom the blessing is actually bestowed. Redemption is not expiation for sin, but the deliverance of men from sin, by means of such an expiation. Hence, Christ is said by his own blood to have obtained eternal redemption for us. Heb. 9: 12. Hence, the word redemption is used for pardon, which is our actual deliverance from punishment, Ephes. 1: 7. Col. 1: 14.—for sanctification, which is our actual deliverance from the dominion of sin, 1 Pet. 1: 18. Isa. 59: 20.—and for the resurrection, which is the actual deliverance of our body from the grave at the last day. Rom. 8: 23. Ephes. 1: 14. 4: 30. Hence it is clear that in Scripture usage, atonement and redemption differ in their nature; and that the one is the cause, and the other the effect. Atonement is the ground of redemption. Isa. 53: 4—9. Redemption is the result of the atonement. Isa. 53: 10—12. The atonement takes effect by changing the relations of God towards the guilty. Rom. 3: 21. Redemption takes effect by changing the relations of the guilty towards God. Rev. 14: 4. The former was completely finished on the cross. Dan. 9: 24. John 19: 30. The latter is now in daily progressive operation, and will not be finished till the final consummation of all things. Ephes. 4: 30. The latter is a proper subject of prayer; but not the former. Ps. 26: 11. 130: 8. The atonement is definite only in design; but in nature, value, and sufficiency, is infinite, and in adaptation to the wants of sinners, universal. John 3: 16. Redemption, on the other hand, is personal in its nature, particular in its purpose and application, and, of course, limited in its extent to the number of those who are actually made partakers of its inestimable blessings, by faith in the Redeemer's blood. Acts 20: 28. Ephes. 5: 25—27. Titus 2: 14. Gal. 3: 10—14. In a word, atonement is the price paid for the redemption of the church. By the blood of thy covenant, I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit in which there is no water. Zech. 9: 11. Redemption is the freedom of the church, which was itself purchased by the atonement. For thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation. Rev. 5: 9.

This doctrine of atonement, as thus stated, is the leading truth of Christianity, 1 Cor. 15: 3. and is styled by St. Paul, from its distinguishing fact, the doctrine of the "cross," and the doctrine of "CURIST CRUCIFIEN." 1 Cor. 1: 17—24. Gal. 5: 11. 6: 12—14. This is that grand peculiarity of the Gospel, which was then a stumbling-block to the Jew, and foolishness to the Greek; and which in every age since has had to encounter the strongest opposition from the various prejudices of the human heart. It was indeed imbibed in its humbling and holy simplicity by the primitive believers; and was held fast in its purity and glory by the persecuted Waldenses, that is, by the true church, while the Mother of harlots was revelling in the midnight darkness of a professed, but corrupted Gospel. Its ascendancy was in a measure restored at the Reformation; but only to encounter a fresh similar opposition as at first, and from similar causes. For now, as ever, "the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God."

"Errors on this subject," it has been well observed, "sap the whole structure of religion. All the great outlines of theology become vague and incoherent notions, when deprived of their connection with this central truth. By necessary consequence, erroneous systems of religion originate chiefly in wrong views of the atonement." Papists add human merit to Christ's, and then, as if this were not sufficient, superadd penance and purgatory; thus falsifying the words of him who said on the cross, It is finished. Arminians, regarding redemption as universal, have made it in every sense conditional; and thus denied the doctrine of gratuitous election. Socinians, denying the necessity of an atonement in order to the forgiveness of sin, reduce Christ to a mere man, and his death to that of a martyr, sealing his doctrine with his blood. Swedenborgians consider Christ's sufferings to have been on his own account, not ours; and hence discard the imputation of his righteousness. Restorationists contend that Christ died for all mankind absolutely, and therefore all shall be ultimately saved. Universalists, (at least, modern ones,) affirm that atonement simply means reconciliation, and that Christ died merely to convince mankind of the immutability of God's universal saving love. Unitarians, in like manner, denying any proper atonement, make Christ's death to be merely a powerful means of improving our virtue. While Infidels, regarding circumstances as the sole causes of virtue, and the doctrine, miracles, life, and death of Christ, as altogether unnecessary, reject the Bible altogether, as an imposition on human credulity. Thus, in some form and to some degree, error on this subject is radical in every erroneous system of religion:

It is painful to trace the progress of lax opinions on this vital truth, for a century past. Spencer, Sykes, and Warburton led the way, by their mode of treating the Mosaic sacrifices. The immortal Butler, in his Analogy, while asserting the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice to secure the pardon of sin, had said with his usual modesty, "How, and in what particular way, it had his efficacy, there are not wanting persons who have endeavored to explain; but I do not find that the Scripture has explained it." Dr. Taylor, of Norwich, in his "Scripture Doctrine of the Atonement," undertook this explanation, and in his "Key to the Apostolic Writings," undertook this explanation, and gives the following as his result: "By the blood of Christ, God discharges us from guilt, because the blood of Christ is the most powerful mean of freeing us from the pollution and power of sin."—"We have no sufficient ground to consider its virtue and efficacy in any other light." He then goes on to say, that by the blood of Christ is meant, not the corporeal substance—not the sufferings and death of our Lord—but "the blood of Christ," says Dr. Taylor, "is his perfect obedience and goodness." Thus by that species of sophistry which substitutes an effect for the cause; which tells one half of the truth, and overlooks or denies the other half; together with an artful accommodation of Scripture language to notions of his own; he has succeeded in shutting out from his scheme of atonement all reference to the vindication of the Divine rectitude, and the satisfaction of the Divine law, in which, according to the apostle, the whole nature and value of the atonement, as such, consists. (See ACCOMMODATION.) A writer in the sixth volume of the Christian Observer, at the conclusion of a series of valuable letters upon Dr. Taylor's Key, observes as follows: "The key of this author is not, I am persuaded, the legitimate one. I should rather be tempted to resemble it to some of those false keys, vulgarly called picklocks.—The web of the key, to speak technically, is, in those ingenious instruments, cut to as slender a form as is consistent with the strength necessary for turning the bolt, in order that the chance of the impediment from the wards may be as little as possible. But the lock with which this theological adventurer had to do, was of such a peculiar construction, as to resist every effort to open it, except with the true key. The doctor gave some desperate wrenches, and doubtless imagined that he had effected his purpose, when he found the key turn in his hand. But it has been discovered by others, that he did no more than break it in the lock, and the bolt, for any thing which he has done to remove it, remains where it was before."

On Dr. Taylor's hypothesis, the name of atonement is retained, though the thing itself is excluded. And his theory may be regarded as that of the better sort of modern Unitarians. Yet there have arisen among them bolder spirits, who discard the very name. Dr. Priestley, in his Answer to Paine, had the temerity to affirm, "that the doctrines of atonement, incarnation, and the trinity have no more foundation in the Scriptures, than the doctrines of transubstantiation and transmigration." This statement needs no comment. It must certainly have been designed for those, whose knowledge of the Scriptures was, like Mr. Paine's, somewhat superficial. (See CHRIST CRUCIFIED.)

2. A second hypothesis respecting the doctrine of atonement, and which has even been embraced by some professed Calvinists, differs in many important particulars from that which has been already noticed. It consists in admitting that the death of Christ was a sacrifice, propitiation, or atonement for sin; but then it denies that there was any real, intrinsic value in it abstractedly considered, any thing that was calculated in its own nature to effect the expiation of it, while it also resolves the whole of its saving or atoning influence into Divine appointment. This is Butler's grand defect. And he has been followed in it by Drs. Whitby, Price, Macknight, and others.

Now although among these various writers there may possibly exist some shades of difference, there are, nevertheless, certain leading points in which they all manifestly agree; such as, that the death of Christ was not absolutely necessary to the salvation of sinful men; that God, had it pleased him, might have saved sinners without the intervention of his Son; that other ways of saving the elect were possible, and that there is no necessary connection between the death of Christ and the pardon of sin, except that which results from Divine appointment; for that the efficacy of the atonement does not arise from the dignity of the sufferer, but from its being the will of God, that it should be so; consequently, that the proper divinity of the Son of God is not essentially connected with the value of his sacrifice.

This hypothesis, though at first sight it may appear far more plausible than that of the Socinians, is liable to many and insurmountable objections; of which, in particular, two may be here mentioned. It impeaches the wisdom of God as it appears in the economy of man's redemption; and it has an equal tendency to depreciate in our estimation the atonement which the Savior made. It involves in it a bold reflection on the Divine wisdom, inasmuch as it supposes God to have effected that by great means, which might have been equally well accomplished, as to every important result, by such as were inferior. It is a maxim equally applicable to physics, to morals, and to theology; "Frustra fit per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora." It is needless to effect that by more instruments, which may be done by fewer. This axiom has been formed, from contemplating the works and dispensations of God; in which, whilst there is nothing defective, we never discover any thing that is superfluous or redundant. Admitting, therefore, the divinity of the Son of God, it is not easy to perceive how any can deny it to be essentially connected with the efficacy of his atonement; for if a divine person have suffered, "the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God," and if all this took place by Divine appointment, we may rest satisfied, that it was not only proper it should be so, but that nothing less could have sufficed. The conclusion therefore seems to be, that, had there been any other way by which sin could be atoned for, the curse of a violated law removed, and salvation consequently extended to guilty men, consistent with the honor of the Divine government and the perfections of Deity, Jehovah would certainly have spared his own Son, and not have subjected him to those bitter sufferings, both of soul and body, which we are told he underwent. The force of this argument will equally apply in the refutation of a maxim which has long been current in the religious world, viz. "That one drop of the blood of Christ was sufficient to redeem the whole world," though it pleased God that he should suffer to the utmost. But if that maxim were well founded, the question might be fairly returned, "How shall we perceive the glory of the Divine justice demonstrated, in punishing an innocent person that might have been spared, and yet all the ends that were to be answered by his being so punished have been accomplished without it?" In fact, to affirm that one drop of Christ's blood was sufficient to redeem the world, is at once to impeach the goodness, the wisdom, and the righteousness of the Supreme Governor of the world, in not only causing the whole to be shed, but his soul also to be made an offering for sin, which was altogether unnecessary if that sentiment were true. It scarcely need be added, that if, as the advocates of this hypothesis affirm, the efficacy of the atonement arises solely from its being appointed of God, and not from the dignity of the sufferer, it would follow, that the blood of bulls and of goats must have been as efficacious for putting away sin, as the blood of Christ, for the former was as certainly offered by Divine appointment as the latter; but that doctrine stands opposed to the whole scope of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in which the apostle labors to evince the total inadequacy of the former, and the infinite sufficiency of the latter.

3. How sin may be forgiven, says Mr. Watson, without leading to such misconceptions of the Divine character as would encourage disobedience, and thereby weaken the influence of the Divine government, must be considered as a problem of very difficult solution. A government which admitted no forgiveness, would sink the guilty to despair; a government which never punishes offence, is a contradiction,—it cannot exist. Not to punish the guilty, is to dissolve authority; to punish without mercy, is to destroy, and where all are guilty, to make the destruction universal. That we cannot sin with impunity, is a matter determined. The Ruler of the world is not careless of the conduct of his creatures; for that penal consequences are attached to the offence, is not a subject of argument, but is matter of fact, evident by daily observation of the events and circumstances of the present life. It is a principle, therefore, already laid down, that the authority of God must be preserved; but it ought to be remarked, that in that kind of administration which restrains evil by penalty, and encourages obedience by favor and hope, we and all moral creatures are the interested parties, and not the Divine Governor himself, whom, because of his independent and all-sufficient nature, our transgressions cannot injure. The reasons, therefore, which compel him to maintain his authority, do not terminate in himself. If he treats offenders with severity, it is for our sake, and for the sake of the moral order of the universe, to which sin, if encouraged by a negligent administration, or by entire or frequent impunity, would be the source of endless disorder and misery; and if the granting of pardon to offence be strongly and even severely guarded, so that no less a satisfaction could be accepted than the death of God's own Son, we are to refer this to the moral necessity of the case, as arising out of the general welfare of accountable creatures, liable to the deep evil of sin, and not to any reluctance on the part of our Maker to forgive, much less to any thing vindictive in his nature,—charges which have been most inconsiderately and unfairly said to be implied in the doctrine of Christ's vicarious sufferings. If it then be true, that the release of offending man from future punishment, and his restoration to the Divine favor, ought, for the interests of mankind themselves, and for the instruction and caution of other beings, to be so bestowed, that no license shall be given to offence;—that God himself, whilst he manifests his compassion, should not appear less just, less holy, than he really is;—that his authority should be felt to be as compelling, and that disobedience should as truly, though not unconditionally, subject us to the deserved penalty, as though no hope of forgiveness had been exhibited;—we ask, On what scheme, save that which is developed in the New Testament, are these necessary conditions provided for? Necessary they are, unless we contend for a license and an impunity which shall annul all good government in the universe, a point for which no reasonable man will contend; and if so, then we must allow that there is strong internal evidence of the truth of the doctrine of Scripture, when it makes the offer of pardon consequent only upon the securities we have before mentioned. If it be said, that sin may be pardoned in the exercise of the Divine prerogative, the reply is, that if this prerogative were exercised towards a part of mankind only, the passing by of the rest would be with difficulty reconciled to the Divine character; and if the benefit were extended to all, government would be at an end. This scheme of bringing men within the exercise of a merciful prerogative, does not, therefore, meet the obvious difficulty of the case; nor is it improved by confining the act of grace only to repentant criminals. For if repentance imply a “renewal in the spirit of the mind,” no criminal would of himself thus repent. But if by repentance be meant merely remorse and terror in the immediate view of danger, what offender, surrounded with the wreck of former enjoyments, feeling the vanity of guilty pleasures, now past forever, and beholding the approach of the delayed penal visitation, but would repent? Were the principle of granting pardon to repentance to regulate human governments, every criminal would escape, and judicial forms would become a subject for ridicule. Nor is it recognised by the Divine Being, in his conduct to men in the present state, although in this world punishments are not final and absolute. Repentance does not restore health injured by intemperance; property, wasted by profusion; or character, once stained by dishonorable practices. If repentance alone could secure pardon, then all must be pardoned, and government dissolved, as in the case of forgiveness by the exercise of mere prerogative; but if a merely arbitrary selection be made, then different and discordant principles of government are introduced into the Divine administration, which is a derogatory supposition.

The question proposed abstractedly, How may mercy be extended to offending creatures, the subjects of the Divine government, without encouraging vice, by lowering the righteous and holy character of God, and the authority of his government, in the maintenance of which the whole universe of beings are interested? is, therefore, at once one of the most important and one of the most difficult that can employ the human mind. None of the theories which have been opposed to Christianity affords a satisfactory solution of the problem. They assume principles either destructive of moral government, or which cannot, in the circumstances of man, be acted upon. The only answer is found in the holy Scriptures. They alone show, and, indeed, they alone profess to show, how God may be “just,” and yet the “justifier” of the ungodly. Other schemes show how he may be merciful; but the difficulty does not lie there. The Gospel meets it, by declaring “the righteousness of God,” at the same time that it proclaims his mercy. The voluntary sufferings of the Divine Son of God “for us,” “the just for the unjust,” magnify the justice of God; display his hatred to sin; proclaim “the exceeding sinfulness” of transgression, by the deep and painful manner in which they were inflicted upon the Substitute: warn the persevering offender of the terribleness, as well as the certainty, of his punishment; and open the gates of salvation to every penitent. It is a part of the same Divine plan, also, to engage the influence of the Holy Spirit, to awaken penitence in man, and to lead the wanderer back to Himself; to renew our fallen nature in righteousness, at the moment we are justified through faith, and to place us in circumstances in which we may henceforth “walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.” All the ends of government are here answered,—no license is given to offence,—the moral law is unrepcaled,—a day of judgment is still appointed,—future and eternal punishments still display their awful sanctions,—a new and singular display of the awful purity of the Divine character is afforded,—yet pardon is offered to all who seek it; and the whole world may be saved.

With such evidence of the suitableness to the case of mankind, under such lofty views of connection with the principles and ends of moral government, does the doctrine of the atonement present itself. But other important considerations are not wanting to mark the united wisdom and goodness of that method of extending mercy to the guilty, which Christianity teaches us to have been actually and exclusively adopted. It is rendered, indeed, “worthy of all acceptance,” by the circumstance of its meeting the difficulties we have just dwelt upon,—difficulties which could not otherwise have failed to make a gloomy impression upon every offender awakened to a sense of his spiritual danger; but it must be very inattentively considered, if it does not further commend itself to us, by not only removing the apprehensions we might feel as to the severity of the Divine Lawgiver, but as exalting him in our esteem as “the righteous Lord, who loveth righteousness,” who surrendered his beloved Son to suffering and death, that the influence of moral goodness might not be weakened in the hearts of his creatures; and as a God of love, affording in this instance a view of the tenderness and benignity of his nature, infinitely more impressive and affecting than any abstract description could convey, or than any act of creating and providential power and grace could exhibit, and, therefore, most suitable to subdue that enmity which had unnaturally grown up in the hearts of his creatures, and which, when corrupt, they so easily transfer from a law which restrains their inclination to the Lawgiver himself. If it be important to us to know the extent and reality of our danger, by the death of Christ it is displayed, not in description, but in the most impressive action; if it be important that we should have an assurance of the Divine placability towards us, it here receives a demonstration incapable of being heightened; if gratitude be the most powerful motive of future obedience, and one which renders command on the one part, and active service on the other, “not grievous but joyous,” the recollection of such obligations as those which the “love of Christ” has laid us under, is a perpetual spring to this energetic affection, and will be the means of raising it to higher and more delightful activity forever. All that can most powerfully illustrate the united tenderness and awful majesty of God, and the odiousness of sin; all that can win back the heart of man to his Maker and Lord, and render future obedience a matter of affection and delight, as well as duty; all that can extinguish the angry and malignant passions of man to man; all that can inspire a mutual benevolence, and dispose to a self-denying charity for the benefit of others; all that can arouse by hope, or tranquillize by faith; is to be found in the vicarious death of Christ, and the principles and purposes for which it was endured.

In order to understand the manner wherein Christ becomes an atonement, "we should," says Dr. Watts, "consider the following propositions. 1. The great God having made man, appointed to govern him by a wise and righteous law, wherein glory and honor, life and immortality, are the designed rewards for perfect obedience; but tribulation and wrath, pain and death, are the appointed recompense to those who violate this law. Gen. 3: Rom. 2: 6, 16. 1: 32.—2. All mankind have broken this law. Rom. 3: 23. 5: 12.—3. God, in his infinite wisdom, did not think fit to pardon sinful man, without some compensation for his broken law; for, 1. If the great Ruler of the world had pardoned the sins of men without any satisfaction, then his laws might have seemed not worth the vindicating.—2. Men would have been tempted to persist in the rebellion, and to repeat their old offences.—3. His forms of government among his creatures might have appeared as a matter of small importance.—4. God had a mind to make a very illustrious display both of his justice and of his grace among mankind; on these accounts he would not pardon sin without a satisfaction.—5. Man, sinful man, is not able to make any satisfaction to God for his own sins, neither by his labors, nor by his sufferings. Eph. 2: 1, 8, 9.—6. Though man be incapable to satisfy for his own violation of the law, yet God would not suffer all mankind to perish.—7. Because God intended to make a full display of the terrors of his justice, and his Divine resentment for the violation of his law, therefore he appointed his own Son to satisfy for the breach of it, by becoming a proper sacrifice of expiation or atonement. Gal. 3: 10, 13.—8. The Son of God being immortal, could not sustain all these penalties of the law which man had broken, without taking the mortal nature of man upon him, without assuming flesh and blood. Heb. 2: 13, 14.—9. The Divine Being having received such ample satisfaction for sin by the sufferings of his own Son, can honorably forgive his creature man, who was the transgressor. Rom. 3: 25, 26. Now that this doctrine is true, will appear, if we consider, 1. That an atonement for sin, or an effectual method to answer the demands of an offended God, is the first great blessing guilty man stood in need of. Mic. 6: 6, 7.—2. The very first discoveries of grace which were made to man after his fall implied in them something of an atonement for sin, and pointed to the propitiation Christ has now made. Gen. 3: 15.—3. The train of ceremonies which were appointed by God in the Jewish church are plain significations of such an atonement. 2 Cor. 3: Col. 2: 7, 8, 9. Heb. 10:—4. Some of the prophecies confirm and explain the first promise, and show that Christ was to die as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men. Dan. 9: 24—26. Is. 53:—5. Our Savior himself taught us the doctrine of the atonement for sins by his death. Matt. 20: 28. John 6: 51. Luke 22: 19.—6. The terrors of soul, the consternation and inward agonies which our blessed Lord sustained a little before his death, were a sufficient proof that he endured punishments in his soul which were due to sin. Mark 14: 33. Heb. 5: 7.—7. This doctrine is declared, and confirmed and explained at large, by the apostles in their writings. 1 Cor. 15: 3. Eph. 1: 7. 1 John 2: 2, &c. &c.—8. This was the doctrine that was witnessed to the world by the amazing gifts of the Holy Ghost, which attended the Gospel. See the Acts of the Apostles.

The inferences and uses to be derived from this doctrine are these: 1. How vain are all the labors and pretences of mankind to seek or hope for any better religion than that which is contained in the Gospel of Christ. It is here alone that we can find the solid and rational principle of reconciliation to an offended God. Heb. 4: 14.—2. How strange and unreasonable is the doctrine of the popish church, who, while they profess to believe the religion of Christ, yet introduce many other methods of atonement for sin, besides the sufferings of the Son of God. See above.—3. Here is a solid foundation, on which the greatest of sinners may hope for acceptance with God. 1 Tim. 1: 15.—4. This doctrine should be used as a powerful motive to excite repentance. Acts 5: 31.—5. We should use this atonement of Christ as our constant way of access to God in all our prayers. Heb. 10: 19, 22.—6. Also as a divine guard against sin. Rom. 6: 1, 2. 1 Pet. 1: 13, 19.—7. As an argument of prevailing force to be used in prayer. Rom. 8: 32.—8. As a spring of love to God, and to his Son Jesus Christ. 1 John 4: 10.—9. As a strong persuasive to that love and pity which we should show on all occasions to our fellow creatures. 1 John 4: 11.—10. It should excite patience and holy joy under afflictions and earthly sorrows. Rom. 5: 1—3.—11. We should consider it as an invitation to the Lord's supper, where Christ is set forth to us in the memorials of his propitiations.—12. As a most effectual defence against the terrors of dying, and as our joyful hope of a blessed resurrection. 1 Cor. 15: 50.—13. Lastly, as a divine allurements to the upper world.—*James; Watson; Buck. ATTALIA; a city of Pamphylia, which Paul and Barnabas visited, Acts 14: 25. A. D. 45. It still subsists under the name of Satalie. It was built (or refounded) by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, who gave to it his own name.—Calmet.

ATTENTION; the state of the mind when it is steadily directed for some time, whether longer or shorter, to some particular object of sense or intellect; and this so exclusively that all other objects are for the time being shut out. Joh 37: 2. Prov. 4: 1. In all cases of attention, the act of the mind is a complex one, involving two things. 1. The simple perception or series of perceptions in view of the object. 2. The vivid emotion of interest which accompanies the perception, and prevents that continual change of the object of thought which would otherwise take place. On the strength of this emotion—the desire to know the subject before us, more fully, definitely, systematically, and thoroughly, and in preference to every other—depends the power of attention. Intensity of interest leads to singleness of purpose, and singleness of purpose enables the mind to keep its hold of the subject undivided and unbroken.

Where the subject to be examined is complex, this power of patient and protracted attention is indispensable. For as every complex whole is made up of parts, and as the distinct perception of the whole implies a knowledge of the relative situation of the different parts to each other; so such a perfect comprehension of the object as a whole, is the result of a series of successive acts of attention. Habit, however, immensely facilitates this process; so that the glance of the mind in the highest exercise of a habit of attention is like lightning.

In agreement with this view of the subject, we often speak of attention as great or small; as existing in a very high, or very slight degree. We commonly judge at first of the degree of attention to a subject from the length of time during which the mind is occupied with it. But when we look a little farther, it will be found that the time will generally depend upon the exclusiveness and permanency of the attendant emotion of interest; from whatever cause that interest may arise, competition, pleasure, or the simple sense of duty.

There have been mathematicians, (Archimedes, for example,) who could investigate the most complicated problems amid every variety and character of disturbance. Newton used to ascribe his superiority to other men, simply to his superior power of patient thought. The late Dr. Scott composed one of his very best works in the midst of his family; frequently holding a child on one knee, and with his other foot at the same time rocking an infant in the cradle. President Dwight could at the same time dictate to two amanuenses on different subjects, and bear his part in the current of conversation. And of Julius Cæsar it is said, that while writing a despatch, he could at the same time dictate four others to his secretaries; and if he did not write himself, could dictate seven letters at once. These extraordinary powers of preserving, prolonging, and at last of diversifying the attention, are the results of habitually cultivating the power of attention, in connection with intellectual energy and order. And on the same habits the strength of memory depends.

"Therefore," says the apostle, "we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things that we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip." Heb. 2: 1.

The knowledge derived from a discourse, says Robert Hall, depends entirely upon attention; in exact proportion to which will be the progress made by a mind of a given capacity. Not to listen with attention is the same thing as to have ears which hear not, and eyes which see not. While you are hearing, whatever trains of thought of a foreign and extraneous nature obtrude themselves should be resolutely repelled. In the power of fixing the attention, the most precious of the intellectual habits, mankind differ greatly; but every man possesses some, and it will increase the more it is exerted. He who exercises no discipline over himself in this respect, acquires such a volatility of mind, such a vagrancy of imagination, as dooms him to be the sport of every mental vanity; it is impossible such a man should attain to true wisdom. If we cultivate, on the contrary, a habit of attention, it will become natural, thought will strike its roots deep, and we shall, by degrees, experience no difficulty in following the track of the longest connected discourse. As we find it easy to attend to what interests the heart, and the thoughts naturally follow the course of the affections, the best antidote to habitual inattention to religious instruction, is the love of the truth. Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly, and to hear it attentively will be a pleasure, not a task.

The practice of sleeping in places of worship, a practice, we believe, not prevalent in any other places of public resort, is not only a gross violation of the advice we are giving, but most distressing to ministers, and most disgraceful to those who indulge it. If the apostle indignantly inquires of the Corinthians whether they had not houses to eat and drink in, may we not with equal propriety ask those who indulge in this practice, whether they have not beds to sleep in, that they convert the house of God into a dormitory? A little self-denial, a very gentle restraint on the appetite, would, in most cases, put a stop to this abomination; and with what propriety can he pretend to desire the sincere milk of the Word, who cannot be prevailed upon, one day out of seven, to refrain from the excess which absolutely disqualifies him from receiving it?—Brown's Lectures on the Human Mind; Upham's Elements; Works of Rev. Robert Hall, vol. i. p. 253.

ATTERBURY, (Bp. FRANCIS,) son of Dr. Lewis Atterbury, was born at Milton, in Buckinghamshire, in 1662; educated at Westminster, and thence elected to Christ church, in Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself by his genius. In 1687, he was made master of arts, when he exerted himself in the controversy with the papists, vindicated Luther in the strougest manner, and discovered an uncommon fund of learning, enlivened with great vivacity. In 1690, he married Miss Osborn, a lady of great beauty, but moderate fortune. About 1690, he took orders, and in 1691 was elected lecturer of St. Bride's church in London, and preacher at Bridewell chapel. He was soon after appointed chaplain to king William and queen Mary. After various disputes and promotions, upon the accession of queen Anne, in 1702, Dr. Atterbury was appointed one of her chaplains.

In the beginning of June, 1713, the queen advanced him to the bishopric of Rochester. He was confirmed July 4, and consecrated at Lambeth next day. The death of the queen, in 1714, put an end to all farther hopes of advancement; for the new king treated him with great coolness, doubtless aware of either the report or the fact of his offer, on the death of Anne, to proclaim the pretender in full canonicals, if allowed a sufficient guard. This dislike operated like oil on the inflammable mind of Atterbury, who not only refused to sign the loyal declaration of the bishops, in the rebellion of 1715, but suspended a clergyman for lending his church for the performance of divine service to the Dutch troops brought over to serve against the rebels. Not content with a constitutional opposition, he entered into a correspondence with the pretender's party, in favor of the dispossessed family; for which offence he was apprehended in August, 1722, and committed to the tower; and in the March following, a bill was brought into the house of commons, for the infliction of pains and penalties. This measure, which on constitutional grounds can never be defended, met with considerable opposition in the house of lords, and was resisted with great firmness and eloquence by the bishop, who maintained his innocence with his usual acuteness and dexterity. His guilt, however, has been tolerably well proved by documents since published, and nothing more is necessary to warrant a confirmed moral distaste to his character, than the contemplation of such a scene of smooth dissimulation and hypocrisy. By this bill the bishop was deprived and outlawed, and no British subject was permitted to visit him abroad, without the king's sign manual, which, however, was not refused to his relatives. He went to Paris, where he died, February 15, 1731.

As a composer of sermons, Dr. Atterbury still retains the highest reputation; his periods are easy and elegant, his style flowing and beautiful; but as a critic or disputant, he is rather dexterous than accurate, and rather popular than profound. A century ago, Doddridge called Atterbury the glory of English pulpit orators; in whose writings language appeared in its strictest purity and beauty; nothing dark, nothing redundant, nothing deficient, nothing misplaced. But even in this excellence, he has been surpassed by the late Rev. Robert Hall. His chief sermons are, Acquaintance with God; Religious Retirement; Lady Cole's Character; Propagation of the Gospel; Sufficiency of Revelation; Terrors of Conscience; Curse on the Jews; and Felix Trembling. His works have been published in four volumes.—Jones's Religious Biog.; Ency. Americana; Doddridge on Preaching.

ATTRIBUTE. (See ACCUBATION; EATING.)

ATTRIBUTES OF GOD, are the several qualities or perfections of the Divine nature. Some distinguish them into the negative, and positive or affirmative. The negative are such as remove from him whatever is imperfect in creatures: such are infinity, immutability, immortality, &c. The positive are such as assert some perfection in God which is in and of himself, and which in the creatures, in any measure, is from him. This distinction is now mostly discarded. Some distinguish them into absolute and relative: absolute ones are such as agree with the essence of God; as, Jehovah, Jah, &c.; relative ones are such as agree with him in time, with some respect to his creatures, as, Creator, Governor, Preserver, Redeemer, &c. But the more commonly received distinction of the attributes of God, is into communicable and incommunicable ones. The communicable ones are those of which there is some resemblance in men; as, goodness, holiness, wisdom, &c.; the incommunicable ones are such as there is no appearance or shadow of in men; as, independence, immutability, immensity, and eternity. A later distribution still, for the sake of clearness, is into the natural and moral attributes of God. See those different articles in this work: aod Bates, Charnock, Abernethy, and Saurin on the Divine Perfections; but especially Dwight's Theology, vol. i.

ATTRITION. The casuists of the church of Rome have made a distinction between a perfect and imperfect contrition. The latter they call attrition; which is the lowest degree of repentance, or a sorrow for sin arising from a sense of shame, or any temporal inconvenience attending the commission of it, or merely from fear of the punishment due to it, without any resolution to sin no more: in consequence of which doctrine, they teach that, after a wicked and flagitious course of life, a man may be reconciled to God, and his sins forgiven on his death-bed, by confessing them to the priest with this imperfect degree of sorrow and repentance. This distinction was settled by the council of Trent. It might, however, be easily shown that the mere sorrow for sin because of its consequences, and not on account of its evil nature, is no more acceptable to God than hypocrisy itself can be.

AUDEANS, or AUDIANI, the followers of Audæus, (called, by Mosheim, Ardæus.) by all accounts a man of severe virtue, in the fourth century, who having been "excommunicated in Syria, on account of the freedom and importunity with which he censured the corrupt and licentious manners of the clergy," and banished into Scythia, formed a religious society, of which he was appointed bishop, or pastor, on something like the primitive plan—himself and flock laboring with their own hands. He is charged with being an Anthropomorphite, (which see,) and explaining the Scriptures too literally; which, perhaps, originated in his rejecting the mystical interpretations of some of the orthodox; but his chief heresy was, in keeping Easter at the time of the Jews' passover, contrary to the decree of the council of Nice, which, they say, was made to flatter Constantine, by making the festival of Easter coincident with his birth-day.—Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 430.; Turner's View, p. 146.; Bell's Wanderings, p. 139.

AUDIENCES, [hearers,] a class of catechumens, who were allowed to hear sermons and the Scriptures read in the church, in some of the ages falsely called primitive!—Bingham's Antiquities, b. x. c. 2.

AUGSBURGH, or AUGUSTAN CONFESSION. In 1530, a diet of the German princes was convened by the emperor Charles V., to meet at Augsburg, for the express purpose of composing the religious troubles which then distracted Germany. On this occasion, Melancthon was employed to draw up this famous confession of faith which may be considered as the creed of the German Reformers, especially of the more temperate among them. It consisted of twenty-one articles, including the following points:—The Trinity, original sin, the incarnation, justification by faith, the word and sacraments, necessity of good works, the perpetuity of the church, infant baptism, the Lord's supper, repentance and confession, the proper use of the sacraments, church order, rites and ceremonies, the magistracy, a future judgment, free-will, the worship of saints, &c. It then proceeds to state the abuses of which the reformers chiefly complained, as, the denial of the sacramental cup to the laity, the celibacy of the clergy, the mass, auricular confession, forced abstinence from meats, monastic vows, and the enormous power of the church of Rome. The confession was read at a full meeting of the diet, and signed by the elector of Saxony, and three other princes of the German empire.

John Faber, afterwards archbishop of Vienna, and two other catholic divines, were appointed to draw up an answer to this confession, which was replied to by Melancthon in his "Apology for the Augsburg Confession," in 1531. This confession and defence; the articles of Smalcald, drawn up by Luther; his catechisms, &c., form the symbolical books of the Lutheran church; and it must be owned that they contain concessions in favor of some parts of popery, particularly the real presence, that few Protestants in this country would admit.

AUGUSTINE, (sometimes called in the short style of the middle ages, ST. AUSTIN,) one of the most celebrated fathers of the church, whose writings for many centuries had almost as potent an influence on the religious opinions of Christendom as those of Aristotle exercised over philosophy. He was born, November 13th, A. D. 354, at Tagasta, an episcopal city of Numidia in Africa. His parents, Patricius and Monica, were Christians of respectable rank in life, who afforded their son all the means of instruction which his excellent genius and wonderful aptitude for learning seemed to require. He studied grammar and rhetoric at Madura, until he was sixteen years old; and afterwards removed to Carthage, to complete his studies. In both these cities, in all the fervor of unregenerate youth, he entered eagerly into the seducing scenes of dissipation and folly with which he was surrounded, and became not only depraved but infamous in his conduct. In this respect, he was not improved by his subsequent connection with the Manichees, whose unhallowed principles afforded an excuse for his immorality, and threw a veil over the vilest of his actions. The simplicity and minuteness with which he has narrated the numerous incidents of his childhood, youth, and mature age, in his celebrated book of "Confessions," have afforded abundant matter of ridicule to the profane and infidel wits of this and the last age. The reflections, however, which accompany his narrative, are generally important and judicious, and furnish to the moral philosopher copious materials for a history of the varieties of the human heart, and are of superior value to the humble Christian for the investigation and better knowledge of his own. With a strange though not uncommon inconsistency, few books have been more frequently quoted as authority on matters relating to general literature and philosophy by infidels themselves, than St. Augustine's otherwise despised "Confessions," and his "City of God." But, whatever else is taught in this remarkable piece of auto-biography, every pious reader will be delighted with the additional proofs which it contains of the ultimate prevalence of faithful prayer, especially on the part of Christian parents. Monica's importunate prayers to heaven followed the aberrations of her graceless son,—when he settled at Carthage as a teacher of rhetoric; when he removed to Rome, and lodged with a Manichee;—and when he finally settled at Milan as professor of rhetoric. St. Ambrose was at that time, A. D. 384, bishop of Milan, and to his public discourses Augustine began to pay much attention. His heart became gradually prepared for the reception of divine truth, and for that important change of heart and principles which constitutes "conversion." The circumstances attending this change, show that the mode of the Holy Spirit's operations was in substance the same in those early days as they are now; and time was when some of the soundest divines and most worthy dignitaries of the church of England were in the habit of referring with approbation to this well-attested instance of a change of heart.

In a frame of mind not unfamiliar to those who have themselves had "much forgiven," Augustine wished to retire at once from so wicked a world as that in which he had passed the first thirty-two years of his dissolute life. His secession, however, was only a temporary one; for he and Alipius were, a few months afterwards, received by baptism into the Catholic church. After having composed several religious treatises in his retreat near Tagasta, especially against the errors of the Manichees, from which he had been so recently reclaimed, he was, in the year 392, ordained priest by Valerius, bishop of Hippo, now a part of the Barbary states on the coast of Africa. He there held a public disputation with Fortunatus, a celebrated priest among the Manichees, and acquitted himself with great spirit and success; he also wrote and preached largely and to great effect against the Donatists and Manichees. His reputation as a divine increased; and he was, at the close of the year 395, ordained bishop of Hippo, in which high station he continued with great advantage to wage war against various orders of heretics.

Augustine had hitherto directed his theological artillery principally against the predestinarian errors of the Manichees; but he was soon called upon to change his weapons and his mode of warfare, in attacking a new and not less dangerous class of heretics. In the year 412, he began to write against the injurious doctrines of Pelagius, a native of Britain, who had resided for a considerable time at Rome, and acquired universal esteem by the purity of his manners, his piety, and his erudition. Pelagius was seconded by Celestius, a man equally eminent for his talents and his virtues. Their principles were propagated at first rather by hints and intimations, than by open avowal and plain declarations; but this reserve was laid aside when they perceived the ready reception which their doctrines obtained; and Celestius began zealously to disseminate them in Africa, while Pelagius sowed the same tares in Palestine, whence they were speedily transplanted to almost every corner of Christendom. If the brief notices, which have come down to us respecting their tenets, in the writings of their adversaries, be correct, they affirmed, "It is not free will, if it requires the aid of God; because every one has it within the power of his own will to do anything, or not to do it. Our victory over sin and Satan proceeds not from the help which God affords, but is owing to our own free will. The prayers which the church offers up either for the conversion of unbelievers and other sinners, or for the perseverance of believers, are poured forth in vain. The unrestricted capability of men's own free will is amply sufficient for all these things, and therefore no necessity exists for asking of God those things which we are able of ourselves to obtain; the gifts of grace being only necessary to enable men to do that more easily and completely which yet they could do themselves, though more slowly and with greater difficulty; and that they are perfectly free creatures," in opposition to all the current notions of original sin and predestination. These novel opinions were refuted by St. Augustine and St. Jerome, as well as by Orosius, a Spanish presbyter, and they were condemned as heresies in the council of Carthage and in that of Milevum. The discussions which then arose have been warmly agitated in various subsequent periods of the Christian church, though little new light has been thrown upon them from that age to the present. In his eagerness to confute these opponents, St. Augustine employed language so strong as made it susceptible of an interpretation wholly at variance with the accountability of man. This led to further explanations and modifications of his sentiments, which were multiplied when the Semi-Pelagians arose, who thought that the truth lay between his doctrines and those of the Pelagians.

Plafiere, in his "Appello Evangelium," has given the following as the substance of that opinion of the order of predestination of which "many do say that St. Augustine was the first author: 1. That God from all eternity decreed to create mankind holy and good. 2. That he foresaw man, being tempted by Satan, would fall into sin, if God did not hinder it; he decreed not to hinder. 3. That out of mankind seen fallen into sin and misery, he chose a certain number to raise to righteousness and to eternal life, and rejected the rest, leaving them in their sins. 4. That for these his chosen he decreed to send his Son to redeem them, and his Spirit to call them and sanctify them; the rest he decreed to forsake, leaving them to Satan and themselves, and to punish them for their sins."

Augustine also taught, that baptism brings with it the forgiveness of sins; that it is so essential, that the omission of it will expose us to condemnation; and that it is attended with regeneration. He also affirmed that the virtue of baptism is not in the water; that the ministers of Christ perform the external ceremony, but that Christ accompanies it with invisible grace; that baptism is common to all, whilst grace is not so; and that the same external rite may be death to some, and life to others.

In the various discussions which have arisen concerning predestination and the doctrines with which it is connected, some modern divines have quoted the arguments of St. Augustine against the Manichees, and others those which he employed against the Pelagians, according to the discordant views which the combatants severally entertain on these controverted points. In his "Retractions," he has qualified the harshness of his previous assertions on many subjects.

Many were the theological labors to which he was invited by the most eminent of his contemporaries; and hastily as some of his lucubrations were executed, it is not surprising that among two hundred and seventy-two treatises on different subjects, some are of inferior value and unworthy of the fame which he had acquired in the church. After a life of various changes, and of a mixed character, he died A. D. 430, in the seventy-sixth year of his age; having been harassed at the close of life by seeing his country invaded by the Vandals, and the city of which he was the bishop besieged. Though those barbarians took Hippo and burned it, they saved his library, which contained his voluminous writings.

St. Augustine was a diligent man in the sacred calling; and that the office of a bishop even in that age of the church was no insecure, is evident from several notices in his letters. At the close of one addressed to Marcellinus, he gives the subjoined account: "If I were able to give you a narrative of the manner in which I spend my time, you would be both surprised and distressed on account of the great number of affairs which oppress me without my being able to suspend them. For when some little leisure is allowed me by those who daily attend upon me about business, and who are so urgent with me that I can neither shun them nor ought to despise them, I have always some other writings to compose, which indeed ought to be preferred, [to those which Marcellinus requested,] because the present juncture will not permit them to be postponed. For the rule of charity is, not to consider the greatness of the friendship, but the necessity of the affair. Thus I have continually something or other to compose which diverts me from writing what would be more agreeable to my inclinations, during the little intervals in that multiplicity of business with which I am burdened either through the wants or the passions of others." He frequently complains of this oppressive weight of occupation in which his love of his flock had engaged him, by obeying the apostolical precept, which forbids Christians from going to law before pagan tribunals. In reference to this employment his biographer, Posidonius, says: "At the desire of Christians, or of men belonging to any sect whatever, he would hear causes with patience and attention, sometimes till the usual hour of eating, and sometimes the whole day without eating at all, observing the dispositions of the parties, and how much they advanced or decreased in faith and good works; and when he had opportunity, he instructed them in the law of God, and gave them suitable advice, requiring nothing of them except Christian obedience. He sometimes wrote letters, when desired, on temporal subjects; but looked upon all this as unprofitable occupation, which drew him aside from that which was better and more agreeable to himself."

The character of this eminent father has been much misrepresented both as a man and as a writer. The learning of St. Augustine, and particularly his knowledge of Greek, have been disputed; and hence the importance of his biblical criticisms has been depreciated. Dr. Lardner, however, is of opinion, that he understood that language better than some have supposed. Le Clerc himself allows that he sometimes explains Greek words and phrases in a very felicitous manner. Indeed, the commencement of his correspondence with St. Jerome proves him to have been no contemptible critic. Voltaire and other profane wits have, in the exercise of their buffoonery, impeached his moral conduct; but their charges, when impartially examined, will be seen to be founded in ignorance or in malice. One capital error however must not be denied, his cruel persecution of the Donatists. Mosheim observes that Augustine's high reputation filled the Christian world; and "not without reason, as a variety of great and shining qualities were united in the character of that illustrious man. A sublime genius, an uninterrupted and zealous pursuit of truth, an indefatigable application, an invincible patience, a sincere piety, and a subtle and lively wit, conspired to establish his fame upon the most lasting foundations." Such a testimony as this far outweighs the vituperative remarks and petty sneers of a thousand infidels.—Watson; Encyc. Amer.; Bib. Repos. vol. iii. See PELAGIANS and SEMI-PELAGIANS.

AUGUSTINIANS. A name sometimes given to such as believe in predestination, as taught by the celebrated Augustine, bishop of Hippo.

AUGUSTINS, a religious order founded by pope Alexander IV. in 1256, were to observe the rule of St. Augustine, (the monk,) as prescribed by their founder; namely, to have all things in common, rich and poor—to employ the first part of every morning in labor, the rest in reading, &c.—to go in pairs—to eat only in their monasteries, &c. Soon after its establishment, this order was brought to England, where they had more than thirty houses, at the time of the reformation. Catholic writers carry up their origin to the 8th century, but admit that they greatly degenerated, and were reformed in the 12th or 13th century. In Paris, they are called the religious of St. Genevieve. Mosheim's Ecl. Hist. vol. iii. p. 193. Robinson's Dict. Butler's Confessions, p. 129.—Williams.

AUGUSTUS, emperor of Rome, succeeded Julius Cæsar, nineteen years before A. D. A. M. 3955. Augustus was the emperor who appointed the enrolment (Luke 2: 1.) which obliged Joseph and the Virgin to go to Bethlehem, the place where the Messiah was to be born.

Augustus procured the crown of Judea for Herod, whom he loaded with honors and riches; and was pleased also to undertake the education of Alexander and Aristobulus, his sons, to whom he gave apartments in his palace. When he came into Syria, Zenodorus and the Gadarenes waited on him with complaints against Herod; but he cleared himself of the accusations, and Augustus added to his honors and kingdom the tetrarchy of Zenodorus. He also examined into the quarrels between Herod and his sons, and reconciled them. (Joseph. Ant. lib. xv. cap. 13.)

Syllæus, minister to Obodas, king of the Nabatheans, having accused Herod of invading Arabia, and destroying many people there, Augustus, in anger, wrote to Herod about it; but he so well justified his conduct, that the emperor restored him to favor, and continued it ever after. He disapproved, however, of the rigor exercised by Herod toward his sons, Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater; and when they were executed he is said to have observed, "that it were better a great deal to be Herod's hog than his son." (Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii. cap. 4.) After the death of Lepidus, Augustus assumed the office of high-priest; a dignity which gave him the inspection over ceremonies and religious concerns. One of his first proceedings was an examination of the sybils' books, many of which he burnt, and placed the others in two gold boxes, under the pedestal of Apollo's statue, whose temple was within the enclosure of the palace. (See SYBIL.) This is worthy of note, if these prophecies had excited a general expectation of some great person about that time to be born, as there is reason to suppose was the fact. It should be remembered, also, that Augustus had the honor to shut the temple of Janus, in token of universal peace, at the time when the Prince of Peace was born. This is remarkable, because that temple was shut but a very few times. Augustus died, A. D. 14.—Calmet.

• AURICULAR; what is spoken into the ear or privately—a term commonly applied to the private confession made to a priest, as among the papists. See CONFESSION.

AUSTIN, (ST.) called by the Romanists the apostle of the English, a monk who at the close of the sixth century (A. D. 597) was sent with forty monks by Gregory I. bishop of Rome, to introduce Christianity into the Saxon kingdoms. Ethelbert, king of Kent, kindly received him, and professed his faith in the gospel, with many of his subjects. It is said that Austin baptized ten thousand Saxons in one day in the river Swale, near York. Thus was England subjected to the see of Rome, and Austin became the first archbishop of Canterbury. But with the British bishops in Wales, successors of the British converts to Christianity in the first century (A. D. 94) Austin was not so successful. They utterly refused subjection to the jurisdiction of Rome, though in order to it Austin demanded but three things; and it is remarkable that one of these was, that they should give christendom, that is, baptism, to their children. The disappointed prelate in revenge sent the Saxon armies upon these unoffending Christians, and shed the blood of multitudes. He died a few years after, A. D. 604 or 614.—Ency. Amer.; Davenport; Benedict's History of the Baptists.

AUSTIN (SAMUEL), D. D. president of the university of Vermont, was graduated at Yale college in 1783, and ordained, as the successor of Allen Mather, at Fairhaven, Conn., Nov. 9, 1786, but was dismissed Jan. 19, 1790. He was afterwards for many years pastor of a church in Worcester, Mass. He was but a few years at the head of the college in Burlington. After his resignation of that place, he was not resettled in the ministry. He died at Glastonbury, Conn., Dec. 4, 1830, aged 70 years. He was eminently pious and distinguished as a minister.

He published letters on baptism, examining Merrill's seven sermons, 1805; reply to Merrill's twelve letters, 1806; and the following sermons,—on disinterested love, 1790; on the death of Mrs. Blair, 1792; Massachusetts missionary, 1803; dedication at Hadley; ordination of W. Fay, and of J. M. Whiton, 1808; at a fast, 1811; at two fasts, 1812.

AUTHENTICITY. A term which is used to denote the genuineness and credibility of any literary work. It is frequently employed in relation to the Scriptures. No question, it is evident, can be more important than this, whether those books which compose the sacred Scriptures are truly authentic documents; that is, that they were actually written by the persons whose names they bear, and especially, (if the author be unknown,) about the time which is assigned to them, or at which they profess to have been written; and further, that they relate matters of fact as they really happened, and in consequence possess credibility and authority. All men, but especially Christian ministers, it has been well observed, should examine this matter to the foundation. See GENUINENESS; CREDIBILITY; INSPIRATION; AUTHORITY.

AUTHOR; one who originates; the first inventor or maker of any thing. God is the author of peace; he requires it by his law; directs how to attain or maintain it: he promises it in his word; and bestows it by his Spirit. 1 Cor. 14:33. Christ is the author of faith, life, and salvation; he devised, he purchased, promises, offers, effects, maintains, and perfects our faith, life, and salvation. Heb. 12: 2. 5: 9. Acts 3:15.—Brown.

AUTHORITY; 1. POWER, RULE, DIGNITY, such as gives one a right to command and enforce obedience. Prov. 29: 2. 2. A WARRANT, ORDER, OF PERMISSION, from a superior. Matt. 21: 23. Acts 9: 14.

Matt. 7: 29. He spake as one having authority, and not as the scribes. The authority here spoken of has been very generally understood as meaning merely an awakening efficacy, fitted to strike the conscience and the heart. But this is not the proper meaning of the word. Dr. Paley has far better illustrated it in the following remarks:

"Next to what our Savior taught, may be considered the manner of his teaching, which was extremely peculiar, yet I think precisely adapted to the peculiarity of his character and situation. He produced himself as a messenger from God. He put the truth of what he taught upon authority. In the choice, therefore, of his mode of teaching, the purpose by him to be consulted was impression; because conviction, which forms the principal end of our discourses, was in the minds of his followers to arise from a different source than argument, from their respect to his person and authority," as the Son of God, appointed of the Father to be the Savior, Lawgiver, and final Judge of the human race. All this was comprehended in his MESSIAHSHIP; and to authenticate his claim to this high dignity, no less than to benefit mankind, all his instructions were given, and all his miracles were wrought. Hence his appeal, "If I do NOT THE WORKS OF MY FATHER, BELIEVE ME NOT," &c. John 10: 37, 38.—Brown; Paley's Evidences of Christianity.

AUTHORITY, HUMAN; in matters religious and ecclesiastical, an assumed right of dictation, attributed to certain fathers, councils, or church courts. On this subject bishop Hoadley writes—"Authority is the greatest and most irreconcilable enemy to truth and argument that this world ever furnished. All the sophistry—all the color of plausibility—all the artifice and cunning of the subtlest disputer in the world may be laid open and turned to the advantage of that very truth which they are designed to hide; but against authority there is no defence." He shows that it was authority which crushed the noble sentiments of Socrates and others; and that by authority, the Jews and heathens combated the truth of the Gospel; and that, when Christians increased into a majority, and came to think the same method to be the only proper one for the advantage of their cause which had been the enemy and destroyer of it—then it was the authority of Christians, which, by degrees, not only laid waste the honor of Christianity, but well nigh extinguished it amongst men. It was authority which would have prevented all reformation where it is, and which has put a barrier against it wherever it is not.

The remark of Charles II. is worthy of notice—that those of the established faith make much of the authority of the church in their disputes with dissenters; but that they take it all away when they deal with papists.—Buck.

AUTOCEPHALI BISHOPS, (Greek); persons who have no superior, or acknowledge no head. It is derived from autos and kephale, sui ipsius caput, his own head or chief. This denomination was given by the primitive church to such bishops as were exempted from the jurisdiction of others. Before the setting up of patriarchs, all metropolitans were autocephali, being accountable to no superior but a synod; and, even after the advancement of patriarchs, several metropolitans continued thus independent—as the archbishop of Cyprus, who, by a general decree of the council of Ephesus, was freed from the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Antioch; as also the metropolitans of Iberia and Armenia. This was likewise a privilege of the ancient British church, before the coming of Austin the monk, when the seven British bishops, which were all that then remained, paid obedience to the archbishop of Caer-Leon, and acknowledged no superior in spirituals above him. And Dinotus, the learned abbot of Bangor, told Austin, in the name of all the Britannic churches, that they owed no other obedience to the pope than they did to every godly Christian.

Besides these, there was another sort of Autocephali, namely, such bishops as were subject to no metropolitan, but only to the patriarch of the diocese. There were thirty-nine such bishops in the large patriarchate of Constantinople, twenty-five in that of Jerusalem, and sixteen in that of Antioch; but at what time this sort of independent bishoprics was first set up is uncertain. Valesius mentions another sort of Autocephali, which were such bishops as were wholly independent of all others, having neither suffragans under them, nor metropolitans over them. Of these, the bishop of Tomis in Scythia is an instance, who was the only bishop of all the cities of that province; but instances of this sort are very uncommon. Valesius, by mistake, and, in contradiction to Jerome, reckons the bishops of Jerusalem before they were advanced to the patriarchal dignity, among this sort of Autocephali.—Henderson's Buck.

AUTO DE FE. (See ACT OF FAITH. INQUISITION.)

AUTOGRAPH, (from auto and graphie.) The original handwriting of a person, in distinction from a copy. This word occurs very frequently in discussions on the genuineness of the Scriptures, and the state of existing manuscripts in the original languages. It is here explained for the sake of those to whom the word is not familiar, or to whom its precise signification is not known.

AUTOGRAPHS of the prophecies, gospels, &c. are the identical or original documents written by the respective authors of the books of Scripture. Copies taken from these are termed apographs. None of these original MSS. are now remaining, nor could their preservation be expected, without the intervention of a miracle, during the space of nearly eighteen centuries. It seems exceedingly probable that Divine Providence permitted them to be early withdrawn from public inspection, lest, like other relics, they should become objects of idolatrous veneration. It is even asserted by Peter, bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century, that an original of John's gospel was not only preserved, but worshipped, at Ephesus.—Michaelis' Introd. i. p. 250.—Henderson's Buck.

AVARICE, is an immoderate love to and desire after riches, attended with extreme diffidence of future events, making a person rob himself of the necessary comforts of life, for fear of diminishing his riches. (See COVERTNESS and MISER.)

AVATAR, in Indian mythology; an incarnation of the Deity. According to the Hindoos, innumerable incarnations have taken place; but ten are particularly distinguished, and four of them are the subjects of Puranas, or sacred poems: these ten are the incarnations of Vishnu, the supreme god. The first was in the form of a fish; the second in that of a tortoise; the third in that of a boar; the fourth in that of a monster—half man, half lion; the fifth in that of a dwarf; the sixth as the son of Iarnadagni. All these took place in the salga yuga, or golden age: the others are more recent. The seventh is the descent of Vishnu, to destroy a giant; the eighth was to chastise other giants; the ninth had a similar object; and the tenth, which is yet to come, will take place at the end of the kali yuga, or the iron age of the world.

AVE-MARY, or AVE-MARIA, (Hail, Mary!) the angel Gabriel's salutation of the Virgin Mary, when he brought her tidings of the incarnation. It is become a prayer, or form of devotion, in the Romish church. Their chaplets and rosaries are divided into so many Ave-Maries, and so many Pater-nosters. The papists ascribe a wonderful efficacy to their Ave-Maries.

Dr. Bingham observes, that, among all the short prayers used by the ancients before their sermons, there is not the least mention of an Ave-Mary; and that its original can be carried no higher than the beginning of the fifteenth century. Vincentius Ferrerius was the first ecclesiastical writer that ever used it before his sermons; from whose example (he being a celebrated preacher in that age) it gained such authority, as not only to be prefixed to all their sermons, but to be joined with the Lord's prayer, in the Roman breviary.—Henderson's Buck.

AVEN; a plain in Syria; the same, probably, as the plain of Baal-beck, or valley of Baal, where there was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun. It is situate between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and hence called the valley of Lebanon. Josh. 11: 17. Amos 1: 5.

AVENGE; to vindicate the rights, or redress the wrongs, of those who have been injured. Gen. 2: 24. Lev. 19: 18. Luke 18: 3, 7, 8. Acts 7: 24. Rom. 12: 19. 18: 20. God has a sovereign, and magistrates a subordinate power, to avenge injuries. Private individuals are forbidden to exercise this power. (See RETRIBUTION, and REVENGE.)

AVENGER OF BLOOD. The children of Israel were commanded to appoint cities of refuge, that any one who killed a person unawares, might fly thither from the avenger of blood; but if the act was committed with design, the murderer was to be given up to the avenger, even though he had fled to the altar of God. Exod. 21: 14. Numb. 35. 1 Kings 2: 29—34. There is no mention of any officer appointed for this purpose. But from the fact that the sons of Saul were given up to the Gibeonites, whose kinsmen Saul had slain, it appears that those nearly connected with the person who had been killed were appointed the avengers of his blood; a custom, of which traces appear in almost all nations.—Sherwood; Brown.

AVERSION; hatred, or dislike. Dr. Watts and others oppose aversion to desire. When we look, say they, upon an object as good, it excites desire: but when we look upon an object as evil, it awakens what we call aversion or avoidance. But Lord Kaimes observes that aversion is opposed to affection, and not to desire. We have an affection to one person; we have an aversion to another: the former disposes us to do good, the latter to do ill.—Buck.

AVERY, (JOHN,) a minister, who came to this country in 1635. While sailing from Newbury towards Marblehead, where he proposed to settle, he was shipwrecked in a violent storm, August 14, 1635, on a rocky island, called Thacher's Woe and Avery's Fall, and died, with his wife and six children. Mr. Thacher escaped. Avery's last words were, "I can lay no claim to deliverance from this danger; but through the satisfaction of Christ I can lay claim to heaven: this, Lord, I entreat of thee."—Magnal. iii. 77; Savage, i. 165; Eliot.

AVIM, a city of Benjamin. Josh. 18: 3. Also, a people descended from Heveus, son of Canaan, who dwelt originally in the country afterwards possessed by the Caphtorim, or Philistines. Deut. 2: 23. Josh. 13: 3. There were also Avim, or Hivites, at Shechem, or Gibeon. Josh. 9: 7. Gen. 34: 2. There were some also beyond Jordan, at the foot of mount Hermon. Josh. 11: 3. Bochart thinks that Cadmus, who conducted a colony of Phœnicians into Greece, was a Hivite: his name, Cadmus, deriving from the Hebrew, Kedem, the East, because he came from the eastern parts to Canaan; and the name of his wife, Hermione, from mount Hermon, at the foot of which the Hivites dwelt. In this case, the metamorphosis of Cadmus's companions into serpents, is founded on the signification of the name Hivites; which, in the Phœnician language, signifies serpents. But if Cadmus were of southern Egypt, or of Ethiopia, his name might also signify serpent; as here was a powerful monarchy of kings, whose family name was Serpent. Nor was the name uncommon elsewhere. The country of the Avim was also called Ezzerim, (Deut. 2: 23.) in the Eastern interpreters and Pliny, Raphia. Their territory ended at Gaza, beginning at the river of Egypt; and thus extending forty-four miles. Sometimes this country appears to be called Shur; which the Arabic renders Gerarim. Gen. 20: 1. (See GERAR.)—Calmet.

AVIGNONISTS; certain fanatics of Avignon, in the last century, who adopted the errors of the Collyridians, (which see,) who, in the fourth century, distinguished themselves by an extraordinary devotion to the holy Virgin. The Avignonists were founded by Grabanca, a Polish nobleman; and Pernety, a Benedictine, (abbé of Bursal,) a learned but most eccentric writer.—A work published in 1790, entitled "The Virtues, Power, Clemency, and Glory of Mary, Mother of God," is attributed to his pen.—Grégoire's Hist. des Sects Rel. vol. ii. p. 17.—Williams.

AWAKE. 1. To rouse one's self or another from natural sleep. Gen. 28: 16. 1 Kings 18: 27. 2. To bestir one's self. Judg 5: 12. 3. To raise or arise from death natural or spiritual. John 11: 14. 12. God awakes to the judgment he has commanded, when he openly and eminently displays his power and other perfections, in punishing his enemies and rescuing his people. Ps. 7: 6. His sword of justice awaked, when terribly displayed, in full execution of the vengeance due to our sin, or Christ. Zech. 13: 7. Christ is awaked before he please, when any thing is done to disturb or interrupt his sensible fellowship with his people. Songs 2: 7. 3: 5. 8: 4. The north wind awakes and blows on our garden, when the Holy Ghost powerfully convinces our conscience, and that of others in the church; (Song 4: 16.) but some understand it of the ceasing of trouble. We awake out of the snare of the devil, awake because our salvation is near, awake that Christ may give us light, awake to righteousness, when, conscious of our danger, and an approaching eternity, we shake off our spiritual sloth and unconcern, and with great earnestness study to know and to receive Jesus Christ and his righteousness, and in his strength to follow holiness in all manner of conversation. 2 Tim. 2: 26. Rom. 13: 11. Eph. 5: 14. 1 Cor. 15: 34.—Brown.

AWE; a strong sentiment of respect, mingled with emotions of fear; a reverence so deep as almost to amount to dread. Ps. 33: 8. Sublime, sacred and solemn objects awaken awe, they fill at once the senses, the understanding and the imagination, they make the beholder pause to consider whether he is worthy to approach them any nearer: they rivet his mind and body to the spot, and render him cautious lest by his presence he should contaminate that which is hallowed. So Jacob felt at Bethel, Gen. 28: 16, 17. and Peter when prostrate at the feet of Jesus, he uttered that striking exclamation, (Luke 5: 8.) "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord." When the creature places himself in the presence of the Creator; when he contemplates the immeasurable distance which separates himself, a frail, finite, and guilty mortal, from his infinitely perfect Maker, he stands in awe before Him; his pride is humbled, his self conceit is abashed, his petulance hushed, and his whole soul is subdued and softened by the very contemplations which most expand and ennoble it. Ps. 4: 4.

The general sentiment of mankind associates this state of mind, with all just ideas of the Divinity, and unites with the divine law in condemning the spirit of irreverence, levity and profaneness. Deut. 5: 11. 28: 58. "If the voice of universal nature, the experience of all ages, the light of reason, and the immediate evidence of my senses," says Cumberland, "cannot awake me to a dependence upon my God, a reverence for his religion, and a humane opinion of myself, what a lost creature am I!"—Brown; Crabbe's Synonymes.

AXE; a well-known instrument. Deut. 19: 15. And now also the axe is laid at the root of the tree. Matt. 3: 10. "It was customary with the Jewish prophets," says Adam Clarke, "to represent the kingdoms, nations and individuals whose ruin they predicted, under the figure of forests and trees doomed to be cut down. See Jer. 46: 22, 23. Ezek. 31: 3, 11, 12.—It has been well observed that there is an allusion here to a woodman, who, having marked a tree for excision, lays his axe at its root, and strips off his outer garment, that he may wield his blows more powerfully, and that his work may be quickly performed." The learned author then proceeds, as do many others, to apply this text to the Jews, nationally. But this is a radical mistake. John the Baptist is addressing individuals, and speaks of individual repentance, as indispensable to escape individual ruin; hence he used the plural form trees; and not the singular tree, which might much more naturally represent them, had he referred to them only as a political body.

Great mischief has been done by transferring the language of the New Testament, without ground, from individuals to nations. God does not save men by the Gospel nationally, but individually; and those interpreters miserably err, who divert the reader of the Gospels or Epistles, from the feeling of personal interest and responsibility. How different the views of St. Paul, "TRIBULATION AND ANGUISH UPON EVERY SOUL OF MAN THAT DOETH EVIL; OF THE JEW FIRST, AND ALSO OF THE GENTILE; BUT GLORY, HONOR, AND PEACE, TO EVERY MAN THAT WORKETH GOOD; TO THE JEW FIRST, AND ALSO TO THE GENTILE; FOR THERE IS NO RESPECT OF PERSONS WITH GOD." Rom. 2: 9—11.

Such interpreters, (though perhaps unintentionally,) make the labors and sufferings and instructions of our Savior and his apostles of no real value. For what did they exert themselves on this interpretation? To save a few Jews only from the destruction of Jerusalem! Credat Judæus, Apella.

AXTELL, (HENRY,) D. D., minister of Geneva, New York, was born at Mendham, N. J. in 1773, and graduated at Princeton in 1796. He went to Geneva soon after the settlement of that part of the state, and was very useful. At the time of his ordination in 1812, his church consisted of 70 members: at the time of his death of about 400. In two revivals his labors had been particularly blessed. He died Feb. 11, 1829, aged 55. His eldest daughter was placed in the same grave.

AYLMER, (JOHN,) D. D. bishop of London, and tutor of the celebrated and virtuous lady Jane Grey, was born at Aylmer Hall, Norfolk, towards the latter end of the year 1521. Grey, marquis of Dorset, when Aylmer was a child, took a great fancy to him, attended to his education, and afterwards gave him an exhibition at the university of Cambridge, where he took his degree of bachelor of arts; after which he became tutor to the children of the marquis. At a very early age he preferred the Protestant to the Catholic faith, and was for some time the only preacher in Leicestershire, where he was eminently useful in converting the people to the Protestant religion. In the reign of queen Mary, his warmth against the principles of popery obliged him (owing to the violence of her ministry) to leave England, and retire to Strasburg, and afterwards to Zurich, in Switzerland, where he instructed several gentlemen's sons in the classics and religion. During his exile, he was offered the Hebrew professorship of the university of Jena, in Saxony; but he declined it. After the death of the tyrannical Mary, he returned to England; and, at the commencement of Elizabeth's reign, was one of the eight divines appointed to dispute at Westminster, before many persons of distinction, against an equal number of Popish bishops. In 1573, he was made one of queen Elizabeth's justices of the peace, and one of her ecclesiastical commissioners. In the same year, he also obtained the degrees of bachelor of arts and doctor of divinity, in the university of Oxford; and in 1576, was made bishop of London, where he preached regularly and frequently in his cathedral; and so anxious was he for the attention and spiritual welfare of his hearers, that on one occasion, when he saw they were wandering while he was preaching, he took a Hebrew Bible out of his pocket, and began to read it; and on finding them roused to astonishment, he reproved them by making a few remarks on their being attracted more by novelty than by the truths that were spoken; truths which were of lasting importance. During the plague in 1578, he was very active in making provision that the sick might be visited, and have proper assistance with regard to religion; and ordered books to be published, with directions for the prevention of the dreadful disease. In 1581, he endeavored to establish lectures, to be delivered to large assemblies in London, on the truth of the doctrines of the church of England; but that measure was opposed, and the design was not carried into execution. Infirm and aged, he conscientiously offered to resign his bishopric to Dr. Bancroft; but he refused to accept it. At length, on the 3d of June, 1594, aged 73, he expired. Aylmer was a man of great learning, profound knowledge, and sincere piety. He was economical, yet generous; bold and daring, yet kind and forgiving; and his chief vice was that of cherishing a persecuting disposition towards those who did not believe what he considered to be the truth.—Jones's Relig. Biog.; Strype's Memoirs of Bishop Aylmer; Wood's Fasti Oxon.; Pearce's Vindication of Dissenters.

AYMOND, (DE SAVOY;) a French martyr of the thirteenth century. He was minister of Bourdeaux. A complaint being lodged against him by the clergy of that city, his friends advised him to abscond. This he absolutely refused, saying, "That should he absent himself, the people might well imagine that what he had preached consisted only of dreams and fables, and not extracted from the pure word of God; but to prevent them from entertaining such a notion, he determined to seal his testimony of the truth with his blood." When he was seized upon, the people would have rescued him; but he desired them to forbear, saying, "since it is the will of God that I should suffer for him, I will not resist his will." He remained nine months in prison on the information only, and patiently suffered all the inclemencies of a jail. Being brought to trial, he was ordered to be racked; when in the extremity of the torture, he comforted himself with this expression; "This body must once die, but the soul shall live; for the kingdom of God endureth forever." At length he swooned away, but on recovering prayed for his persecutors. The question was then put to him, "Whether he would embrace the Roman Catholic persuasion;" which positively refusing, he was condemned to be burnt. At the place of execution he said, "O Lord, make haste to help me; tarry not; despise not the work of thy hands." And perceiving some who used to attend his sermons, he addressed them thus, "My friends, I exhort you to study and learn the Gospel; for the Word of God abideth forever. Labor to know the will of God, and fear not them that kill the body, but have no power over the soul." The executioner then strangled him, and afterwards burned his body.—Fox.

AZA. Gaza and Azoth are sometimes so called. Josephus notices a mountain of this name, near to which Judas Maccabeus fought against Bacchides, in his last encounter. In the Maccabees, it is called mount Azotus.

AZARIAH; the name of several high-priests among the Jews. 1 Chron. 6: 9, 10. It was also a name given to Uzziah, king of Judah. 2 Kings 15. (See UZZIAH.) Also the Chaldean name given to Abednego. Dan. 1: 7, 3: 19. (See ABEDNEGO.)

AZAZEL; the Hebrew name of the scape-goat led to the wilderness on the great day of FAST of EXPIATION. Lev. 16: 10.

AZEKAH; the name of a city in the tribe of Judah. Josh. 15: 35. It lay to the south of Jerusalem, and east of Bethlehem, distant about four leagues from the former, and five from the latter. The army of the Philistines, in which was the giant Goliath, encamped at Shocoh and Azekah. 1 Sam. 17: 1.

AZOTUS, is the Greek name of the same city as is called in the Hebrew, Ashdod. It was not taken by Joshua, and being surrounded with a wall of great strength, it became a place of great importance, and one of the five governments of the Philistines. Hither was sent the ark of God, when taken from the Israelites; and here was Dagon cast down before it, 1 Sam. 5: 2, 3. Uzziah, king of Judah, broke down its wall, and built cities or watch-towers about it, 2 Chron. 26: 6. It was taken by Tartan, general of the king of Assyria, (2 Kings 18: 17.) when it appears to have been very severely treated; as Jeremiah (chap. 25: 20.) gives the cup of desolation to be drunk by "the remnant of Ashdod." It was not wholly destroyed, however, for Amos (chap. 1: 8.) mentions "the inhabitant of Ashdod," Zephaniah (chap. 2: 4.) says, "Ashdod shall be driven out at noon-day;" and Zechariah (9: 6.) says, "a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod." From these notices, it appears, that Ashdod was a place of great strength and consequence. Its New Testament name is Azotus and here Philip was found, after his conversion of the eunuch, at old Gaza, distant about thirty miles, Acts 8: 40.

Azotus was a port on the Mediterranean, between Askelon and Ekron, or between Jamnia and Askelon, (Judith 3: 2. Gr.) or between Gaza and Jamnia, (Josephus, Antiq. 13: 23.) i. e. it lay between these cities, but not directly, nor in the same sense. The present state of the town is thus described by Dr. Witman: (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 285.) "Pursuing our route through a delightful country, we came to Ashdod, called by the Greeks, Azotus, and under that name mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles; a town of great antiquity, provided with two small entrance gates. In passing through this place, we saw several fragments of columns, capitals, cornices, &c. of marble. Towards the centre is a handsome mosque, with a minaret. By the Arab inhabitants, Ashdod is called Mezdel. Two miles to the south, on a hill, is a ruin, having in its centre a lofty column still standing entire. The delightful verdure of the surrounding plains, together with a great abundance of fine old olive trees, rendered the scene charmingly picturesque. In the villages, tobacco, fruits, and vegetables are cultivated abundantly by the inhabitants; and the fertile and extensive plains yield an ample produce of corn. Ashdod may be seen from the 'sloping hill of easy ascent,' near Jaffa or Joppa." This extract is thought by Mr. Taylor to confirm the conjecture above formed, that the "cities" built by Uzziah, near Azotus, were towers which commanded a considerable prospect; and very probably, he remarks, one of these towers was placed on the hill where the Doctor observed a lofty column standing. It appears that signals from hence might speedily be communicated to Joppa, and, no doubt, to various other surrounding signal-stations. Thus is the confusion of "cities" around a city, removed by a better acquaintance with the actual geography of this district; for which we are indebted to an observant and intelligent traveller.—Calmet.

AZYMITES; Christians who administer the eucharist, or holy communion, with unleavened bread. The word is derived from the Greek azymos, sine fermento, which is compounded of the privative a, and zyme, fermentum. This practice occasioned great disputes, and at length a rupture, between the Latin and Greek churches.

The learned Dr. Bingham is of opinion that the use of wafers and unleavened bread was not known in the church till the eleventh or twelfth centuries, when the oblations of common bread began to be left off by the people; for so long as the people continued to offer bread and wine, the elements for the use of the eucharist were usually taken out of them; and, consequently, so long the bread was the common leavened bread, made use of upon other occasions. And he tells the following story in confirmation of this:—As Gregory the Great was administering the bread to a certain woman, in the usual form, The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. she fell a laughing, and, being asked the reason, said it was because he called that the body of Jesus Christ which she knew to be bread that she had made with her own hands. Besides, the ancients say expressly, that their bread was common bread, such as they made for their own use upon other occasions; and it is further observable, that neither Photinus nor any other Greek writer, before Michael Cerularius, A. D. 1051, ever objected to the use of unleavened bread in the Romish church; which they would, no doubt, have done, had that practice prevailed at the time they wrote.

But the schoolmen, who maintain, that, during the first ages of the church, none but unleavened bread was used in the eucharist, say the primitive church did it in imitation of our Savior himself, who celebrated the last supper with unleavened bread; but that, when the Ebionites arose, who held that all the observances prescribed by the Mosaic law were still in force, both the eastern and western churches took up the use of leavened bread, and, after the extinction of that heresy, the western church returned to the azymus, the eastern obstinately adhering to the former usage.—Henderson's Buck.

B.

I. BAAL, or BEL, (governor, ruler, lord), a god of the Phœnicians and Canaanites. Baal and Astaroth are commonly mentioned together; and as it is believed, that Astaroth denotes the moon, Calmet concludes that Baal represents the sun. Bishop Munster, as quoted by Professor Robinson, supposes that this was the case, originally; and that the fundamental idea of all oriental idolatry—which also may be traced from India to the north of Europe—is the primeval power of nature, which divides itself into the generative, and the conceptive or productive power. He supposes the sun and moon to have been worshipped as the representatives of these powers, under the names of Baal and Astarte. But Cyrenius supposes these appellations to signify the planets Jupiter and Venus. Be this as it may, it is certain that the name Baal is used in a generic sense, for the superior god of the Phœnicians, Chaldeans, Moabites, and other people, and is often compounded with the name of some other god; as Baal-Peor, Baal-Zebub, Baal-Gad, Baal-Zephon, Baal-Berith. Baal is the most ancient god of the Canaanites, and, perhaps, of the East; and the Hebrews too often imitated the idolatry of the Canaanites, in adoring him. They offered human sacrifices to him, and erected altars to him, in groves, on high places, and on the terraces of houses. Baal had priests and prophets consecrated to his service; and many infamous actions were committed in his festivals. Some learned men have maintained, that the Baal of Phœnicia was the Saturn of Greece and Rome; and certainly there was great conformity between their services and sacrifices. Others are of opinion, that Baal was the Phœnician (or Tyrian) Hercules, (an opinion not inconsistent with the other,) but it is generally concluded, that Baal was the sun; and on this admission, all the characters which he assumes in Scripture may be easily explained. The great luminary was adored over all the East, and is the most ancient deity acknowledged among the heathen. See IDOLATRY.

The Hebrews sometimes called the sun Baal-Shemesh;—Baal the sun. Manasseh adored Baal, planted groves, and worshipped all the host of heaven; but Josiah, desirous to repair the evil introduced by Manasseh, put to death “the idolatrous priests that burnt incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets, and to all the host of heaven. He commanded all the vessels that were made for Baal, and for the grove, (Ashreh, or Astaroth,) and for all the host of heaven, to be brought forth out of the temple. He took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, and burnt the chariots of the sun with fire.” Here the worship of the sun is particularly described; and the sun itself is clearly expressed by the name of Baal, 2 Kings 23: 11. The temples and altars of the sun, or Baal, were generally on eminences. Manasseh placed in the two courts of the temple at Jerusalem, altars to all the host of heaven, and, in particular, to Astarte, or the moon, 2 Kings 21: 5, 7. Jeremiah threatens those of Judah, who had sacrificed to Baal on the house-top, (chap. 32: 29.) and Josiah destroyed the altars which Ahaz had erected on the terrace of his palace, 2 Kings 23: 12.

Human victims were offered to Baal, as they were to the sun. The Persian Mithra (who is also the sun) was honored with like sacrifices, as was also Apollo. Jeremiah reproaches the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem with “building the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal,” (chap. 19: 5.)—an expression which appears to be decisive, for the actual slaying by fire of the unhappy victims to Baal.

The Scripture calls temples consecrated to Baal, 1. e. to the sun, chananim. Lev. 26: 30. Isa. 17: 8. 27: 9. and 2 Chron. 34: 4. They were places inclosed with walls, in which a perpetual fire was maintained: they were frequent in the East, particularly among the Persians; and the Greeks called them pyreia, or pyrathœia, from the Greek pyr, fire; or pyra, a funeral pile. There was in them, says Strabo, (lib. xv.) an altar, abundance of ashes, and a fire never suffered to go out. Maundrel, in his journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, observed some remains of them in Syria. See FIRE, PLACES OF.

Some critics have thought, that the god Belus of the Chaldeans and Babylonians was Nimrod, their first king; others, that he was Belus the Assyrian, father of Ninus; and others, a son of Semiramis. Many have supposed Belus to be the same with Jupiter; but Calmet concludes, that Baal was worshipped as the sun among the Phœnicians and Canaanites; and that he was often taken in general for the great god of the eastern people.

As much of the heathen idolatry, alluded to in the Old Testament, is derived from the rites of Baal, which rites are not yet extinct, even among ourselves, and as it appears by the number of names of places in Scripture, into which this title is compounded, that his worship was extremely popular, we subjoin the following particulars, furnished by Mr. Taylor.

The Chaldeans say, that their metropolis derived its origin from Bel, who first of all built a great tower, or castle, called by their Bar. All these authorities attribute the origin of Babylon to Bel, and Bel was undoubtedly worshipped as the peculiar deity of the place. But the real character of Bel the infant is known from other quarters. He is the Jupiter infans of classical mythology; and we need not wonder that the second father of the human race, in his re-vivification after his preservation, should be considered as a newly-born child, and become the great and general object of worship; since he was the first seed of all mankind, and all mankind are his seed. Perhaps the name Bel or Baal originally implied as much. But the worship of the great patriarch was eventually transferred to the sun as his symbol, or representative; and this luminary, as is well known, was universally adored. We are not then to be surprised at the dedicatory title Apolini Beleno; for Herodian says (lib. viii.) that some call the same deity Apollo, which others call Belin. This latter was his name in Britain, also, as appears from that ancient memorial of it retained in the name of Belin's-gate, at London.

The worship of Bel, Belus, Belenus, or Belinus, was general throughout the British islands; and certain of its rites and observances are still maintained in England, notwithstanding the spread and the establishment of Christianity during so many ages. It might have been thought, that the pompous rituals of popery would have superseded the druidical superstitions; or that the reformation to protestantism would have banished them; or that the prevalence of various sects would have reduced them to oblivion: but the fact is otherwise. Surely the roots of druidism were struck extremely deep! What charm could render them so prevalent and permanent?—“A town in Perthshire, on the borders of the Highlands, is called Tillie (or Tullie) beltaue, i. e. the eminence, or rising-ground, of the fire of Baal. In the neighborhood is a druidical temple of eight upright stones, where it is supposed the fire was kindled. At some distance from this is another temple of the same kind, but smaller, and near it is a well, still held in great veneration. On Beltaue morning, superstitious people go to this well, and drink of it; then they make a procession round it, as we are informed, nine times. After this, they in like manner go round the temple. So deep rooted is this heathenish superstition in the minds of many who reckon themselves good Protestants, that they will not neglect these rites, even when Beltane falls on Sabbath." (Statist. Accounts of Scotland, vol. iii. p. 105.) "On the first day of May, which is called Beltan, or Bal-tein, day, all the boys in a township, or hamlet, meet in the moors. They cut a table in the green sod, of a round figure, by casting a trench in the ground, of such circumference as to hold the whole company. They kindle a fire, and dress a repast of eggs and milk in the consistence of a custard. They knead a cake of oatmeal, which is toasted at the embers against a stone. After the custard is eaten up, they divide the cake into so many portions, as similar as possible to one another in size and shape, as there are persons in the company. They daub one of these portions all over with charcoal, until it be perfectly black. They put all the bits of cake into a bonnet. Every one, blindfold, draws out a portion. He who holds the bonnet is entitled to the last bit. Whoever draws the black bit, is the devoted person who is to be sacrificed to Baal, whose favor they mean to implore, in rendering the year productive of the sustenance of man and beast. There is little doubt of these inhuman sacrifices having been once offered in this country, as well as in the East, although they now pass from the act of sacrificing, and only compel the devoted person to leap three times through the flames; with which the ceremonies of this festival are closed." (Id. vol. xi. p. 621.) "In Ireland, Bal-tein is celebrated on the 21st June, at the time of the solstice. There, as they make fires on the tops of hills, every member of the family is made to pass through the fire; as they reckon this ceremony necessary to insure good fortune through the succeeding year. This resembles the rite used by the Romans in the Palilia. Bal-tein is also observed in Lancashire." (Dr. Macpherson's Critical Dissert. xvii. p. 286.)

This pagan ceremony of lighting fires in honor of the Asiatic god Belus, gave its name to the entire month of May, which is to this day called mi na Beal-time, in the Irish language.

The Bal-tein was certainly derived from the East: it is practised at this day in the ceremonies of the Derma Rajah, wherein the devotees walk barefoot over about forty feet of burning coals. It was, we may presume, into a Bal-tein that the three Hebrew youths were cast, bound hand and foot, Dan. 3: 15. The Bal-tein, anciently, at Jerusalem, was held in the valley of Tophet; and the burning of children in honor of Moloch, was the same ceremony under an idol of another name. So general was this custom. Our bonfires are, possibly, remains of the Bal-tein; and the tricks of our lads in leaping over the rising flame, might be proved to have antiquity in their favor, if it were worth while. The bon-fire is, perhaps, derived from the Saxon bone, bone, a favor, a boon, an occurrence which gives pleasure: in this sense we may understand it in Chaucer, "he bade them all a bone;"—he invited them to an enjoyment:—or it may be taken in the sense of a boom, a gift; a fire to which contributions are made gratis, by all.

This custom maintains itself not only in the extreme north, but also throughout Germany: in short, we see that it involves all Europe. It can, therefore, occasion no surprise that we find it so inveterately established in the countries mentioned in Scripture, where the sun had infinitely more power and influence, and which are much nearer to the original observances. The world was then plunged in idolatry, and we cannot wonder that this branch of it prevailed, since many of its ceremonies and superstitious rites still exist, notwithstanding the influence of the Gospel. This article affords matter for serious reflection.

II. BAAL. There were many cities in Palestine, into whose name the word Baal entered by composition; either, because the god Baal was adored in them; or, because these places were considered as the capital cities,—lords, superiors, of their respective provinces.—Calmet.

BAALAH, otherwise Kirjath-jearim; (Josh. 15: 9.) or Kirjath-Baal, or Baalim of Judah; (1 Chron. 13: 6.) a city of Judah, not far from Gibeah and Gibeon, nine or ten miles north-west of Jerusalem, where the ark was stationed after the Philistines returned it, 1 Sam. 6: 21.—Calmet.

BAAL-BERITH, (lord of the covenant;) a deity of the Shechemites, (Judg. 8: 33. 9: 4.) which the Israelites made their god after the death of Gideon. There was at Shechem a temple of Baal-Berith, in whose treasury they accumulated that money which they afterwards gave to Abimelech, son of Gideon. The most simple explanation of the name Baal-Berith, is to take it generally, i. e. for the god who presides over alliances and oaths. In this sense, the true God may be termed the God of covenants; and if Scripture had not added the name Baal to Berith, it might have been so understood. The most barbarous nations, as well as the most superstitious, the most religious, and the most intelligent, have always invoked the deity to witness oaths and covenants. The Greeks had their Zeus Horkios, Jupiter the witness and arbitrator of oaths; and the Latins had their Deus Fidius, or Jupiter Pistorius, whom they regarded as the god of honesty and integrity, and who presided over treaties and alliances. (See BERTH.) The name of this idol, however, might, as Mr. Taylor thinks, refer to the god of the city Berytus. We know, that the Israelites borrowed many deities from their neighbors; and the medals of Berytus show that the objects of worship were much the same as at Tyre, Sidon, &c., namely Astarte, or Good Fortune; Neptune, &c.

BAAL-GAD, a city at the foot of mount Hermon, which derived its name from the deity, Baal, there adored, Josh. 11: 17. It was afterwards named Panias, and then Cæsarea Philippi. See GAD, and CÆSAREA PHILIPPI.—Calmet.

BAAL-MEON, a city of Reuben, (Numb. 32: 38. 1 Chron. 5: 8.) sometimes called Beth-Baal-Meon, the house, or temple, of Baal-Meon. The Moabites took it from the Reubenites, and were masters of it in the time of Ezekiel, Ezek. 25: 9. Eusebius and Jerome place it nine miles from Esbus, or Esehon, at the foot of mount Baaru, or Abarim.

BAAL-PEOR. The import of this name is uncertain. Simon takes it to denote "the lord of mount Peor," where this deity was worshipped; as the heathen had their Jupiter Olympius, Apollo Clarius, Mercurius Cyllenius, &c. It has been taken in an obscene sense, and with too much truth; for it is certain that the deities of the heathen were, and still are, often of the grossest kind; not that we know their worshippers to have thought them scandalous, or to have connected them with any offence against decency, or with that sense of shame and indignation which they excite in us. They may have considered them as commemorative memorials of distant persons and times, or as employed to bring to recollection truths, in themselves perfectly innocuous; although such means of recording historical facts, of whatever nature, are in our opinion criminally indecorous, and utterly unfit for public exposure. Of this, the compound of the Lingam and Yoni among the Hindoos, affords open and popular proof; but there are other observances in some of their festivals, usually postponed till after all Europeans are departed, which too obscenely justify the most offensive derivation of the name.

This false god is, by some, supposed to be the Adonis, or Orus, adored by the Egyptians and other Eastern people. Scripture informs us, (Numb. 25: 1—3.) that the Israelites being encamped in the wilderness of Sin, were seduced to worship Baal-Peor, to partake of his sacrifices, and to sin with the daughters of Moab; and the psalmist, (Psalm 106: 28.) adverting to the same event, says, "they ate the offerings of the dead." Peor is Or, or Orus, if we cut off the article Pe, which is of no signification. Orus is Adonis, or Osiris. The feasts of Adonis were celebrated after the manner of funerals; and the worshippers at that time committed a thousand dissolute actions, particularly after they were told that Adonis, whom they had mourned for as dead, was alive again. (See ADONIS.) Origen believed Baal-Peor to be Priapus, or the idol of turpitude, adored principally by women, and that Moses did not think proper to express more clearly what kind of turpitude he meant; and Jerome says, this idol was represented and worshipped in the same obscene manner as Priapus. His opinion is, that effeminate men and women, who prostituted themselves in honor of idols, as frequently mentioned in Scripture, were consecrated to Baal-Peor, or Priapus. Maimonides asserts, that Baal-Peor was adored by the most immodest actions; and there is no doubt that he was the god of impurity. We know with what impudence the daughters of Moab engaged the Israelites to sin; (Numb. 25: 3.) and the prophet Hosea, (chap. 9: 10.) speaking of this crime, says, "They went unto Baal-Peor, and separated themselves unto that shame." The psalmist expresses himself in the plural number; "they ate the sacrifices,"—for the sacrifices of Baal-Peor were repasts, such as were used at funerals; with this difference, that the latter were often accompanied with real and sincere sorrow; whereas, in those of Adonis, the tears were feigned, and the debauchery afterwards indulged, real. See CRUEN.—Calmet.

BAAL-PERASIM; a place in the valley of Rephaim, not very far distant from Jerusalem, 2 Sam. 5: 23. The reason of this appellation is given in 1 Chron. 14: 11.—Calmet.

BAAL-SHALISHA, (2 Kings 4: 42. 1 Sam. 9: 4.) a district placed by Jerome and Eusebius fifteen miles from Diospolis north.—Calmet.

BAAL-TAMAR, (lord of the palm tree;) a village near Gibeah, where the children of Israel engaged the tribe of Benjamin, Judg. 20: 33.

The palm tree occurs on many coins as a symbol attending Astarte; a branch of palm is held by the goddess sitting on the rock; and often by Jupiter, who, most probably, answers to the character of the lord of the palm tree. It may be supposed that this symbol was chiefly adopted where the palm was best known; nevertheless, we find it applied where it cannot be restrained to the idea of a production of the country, merely, and therefore, most probably, it was introduced from where this symbol was locally applicable.—Calmet.

BAALTIS; the same as Astarte, or the moon; next to Baal, the god most honored by the Phœnicians. See ASTARTE, and ASTAROTH.—Calmet.

BAAL-ZEBUB. See BEEL-ZEBUB.

BAAL-ZEPHON; a station of the Hebrews, (Ex. 14: 2, 9. Numb. 33: 7.) near Clysma, or Colsoum. Baal-Zephon was, probably, a temple to Baal at the northern point of the Red sea; and, most likely, in or near an establishment, or town, like the present Suez. The learned J. M. Hasius understands the temple of Jupiter Cassius; but it was more probably at the head of the Red sea; not on the coast of the Mediterranean, as Ezion Gaber, at the head of the gulf of Eloth, answered to Beth-Gaber, on the coast of the Mediterranean. Some describe this deity, as in shape, a dog; (see ANUBIS;) signifying his vigilant eye over this place, and his office by barking, to give notice of an enemy's arrival; and to guard the coast of the Red sea, on that side. It is said, he was placed there, principally, to stop slaves that fled from their masters.—Calmet.

BAASHA; son of Ahijah, and commander of the armies of Nadab, king of Israel. He killed his master treacherously at the siege of Gibbethon, and usurped the kingdom, which he possessed twenty-four years. He exterminated the whole race of Jeroboam, as God had commanded; but by his bad conduct, and his idolatry, incurred God's indignation, 1 Kings 15: 27. 16: 7. A. M. 3051. Baasha, instead of making good use of admonition, transported with rage against a prophet, the messenger of it, killed him.—Calmet.

BABBLE; to utter a vast deal of useless and unprofitable talk. Prov. 23: 29. Acts 17: 18. A babbler is no better than a serpent that bites, except it be enchanted. Unless restrained by fear or favor, he will do mischief to men's characters or interests with the multitude of his unadvised words. Eccl. 10: 11. The vain babbling which ministers ought to shun, is all empty noise about words, sentiments, and customs, not allowed by Christ, nor calculated for the edification of men. 1 Tim. 6: 20.

BABE; a young infant. Luke 1: 41. Weak and insignificant persons are called babes, because of their ignorance, folly, frowardness, rashness, stupidity. Matt. 11: 25. Isa. 3: 4. Rom. 2: 20. In commendation, believers are called babes, because they live on the pure milk of gospel truth, and for their innocence, meekness, and humble sincerity in faith, love, profession, obedience. 1 Pet. 2: 2. In dispraise, some saints are called babes, because of their weakness in spiritual knowledge, power, and experience; and for their stupidity, unteachableness, and readiness to be seduced by Satan. 1 Cor. 3: Heb. 5: 13.—Brown.

BABEL, TOWER OF. It received this name, because, when the tower was building, God confounded the languages of those who were employed in the undertaking, (Gen. 10: 10.) about A. M. 1775, one hundred and twenty years after the deluge. Very different conceptions have been formed on the nature and figure of the tower of Babel. Some have delineated it as being round in shape, with a spiral pathway leading up to the top; but it appears more credible that it was square; and that certain buildings, yet remaining in various parts of the world, may be considered as transcripts, or imitations of it. Strabo calls it a square pyramid. Mr. Taylor copied several instances apparently nearly related to it in form and destination, from which we select the following.

This pyramid, rising in several steps or stages, is at Tanjore in the East Indies; and affords, it is presumed, a just idea of the tower of Babel. It is, indeed, wholly constructed of stone, in which it differs from that more ancient edifice, which, being situated in a country destitute of stone, was, of necessity, constructed of brick. On the top of this pyramid is a chapel or temple; affording a specimen of the general nature of this kind of sacred edifices in India. These amazing structures are commonly erected on, or near, the banks of great rivers, for the advantage of ablation. In the courts that surround them, innumerable multitudes assemble at the rising of the sun, after having bathed in the stream below. The gate of the pagoda uniformly fronts the east. The internal chamber commonly receives light only from the door. An external pathway for the purpose of visiting the chapel at the top merits observation.

This is an ancient pyramid, built by the Mexicans in America; it agrees in figure with the former; and has, on the outside, an ascent of stairs leading up one side to the upper story, proceeding to the chapels on its summit. This ascent implies that the chapels were used, from time to time; and, no doubt, it marks the shortest track for that purpose, as it occupies one side only. That the tower of Belus had a chapel near the top, appears from Herodotus, who, after mentioning the ascent, which was to the height of a stadium, or three hundred and twenty feet, through eight stages or stories, says, "In the last tower is a large chapel, but no statue," &c. Diodorus implies the same, when he says, there were statues of gold, of which one was forty feet high: it must have been a large chapel that could be supposed to contain such a figure. Above this chapel was an upper story, containing a chamber with a bed, before which stood a golden table. In this chamber, Herodotus says, no one slept at night except a female, whom the god Belus (according to the Chaldeans, the priests of the temple) had selected from the females of the city. Diodorus says, this chamber served also for astronomical observations. Let us now examine the narration of Moses. (Gen. 11: 9.) Here it should be observed, (1.) that all mankind was not concerned in building this tower; for the writer tells us plainly, those who attempted it were travellers from the East; those, therefore, who continued in the East, were no parties to it. (2.) The language of all mankind could not be affected by any occurrence which did not involve the main body, or the original stem, but only a part consisting of emigrants settled far from the primitive abode. (3.) It is at least as rational to suppose that idolatry, intended or perpetrated, was the immediate cause of the Divine anger, as any other crime hitherto imagined. (4.) It will be seen in the article MELCHIZEDEK, that the posterity of Ham were kings of Babylon. We infer, therefore, that Shem had no share in this undertaking; consequently his language—lip—sentiments, &c. were preserved pure. The mode adopted by Providence in this miraculous dispersion forms no part of our present inquiry; but if we suppose some to be clamorous for this idolatry, others against it; some for this kind of work, others for another; together with the unavoidable necessity of new terms, to express new materials, &c. we shall perceive rudiments for occasion of great dissensions among this portion of mankind. Historical traces of this primitive idolatry may be discerned in the Hindoo narrations; for they report that "the origin of the Linga or Phallus, and of its worship, is said to have happened on the banks of Cunood-wati, or Euphrates, and the first Phallus was erected on its banks, under the name of Baleswarâ-Linga (or the Linga of Isvara the Infant, who seems to answer the Jupiter Puer of the western mythologists.) Balesa is perfectly synonymous to Baleswarâ, both denominations being indifferently used in the Purans." (Asiatic Researches, vol. iv. p. 593.) Here, then, we have the origin of an idolatrous worship, with clear references to the name of the Babylonian deity, Bel or Belus. If the origin of that idolatry, which in the time of Moses had overspread the countries around, be connected with the Mosaic history of the tower of Babel, then much of what has been said respecting the number of persons engaged in the building this tower, or the number of languages into which the families of the earth were divided, (whether seventy, seventy-two, or seventy-five, see LANGUAGE,) might have been spared. On the other hand, if such idolatry were about this time publicly instituted, then the history of Abraham's removal from it, to preserve the ancient religion, properly follows this narration.

There are certain points of comparison between the pyramids of Egypt (see PYRAMIDS) and the tower of Babel to which our attention may be directed. (1.) A river runs before the pyramids, which agrees with the notion of their being sacred structures, since the stream was suitable to purposes of ablution; in like manner, a river ran before the tower of Babel. (2.) The general form of these structures was alike, that is, broad at bottom, rising very high, tapering at top. (3.) The internal construction was of less costly materials than the external; being of sun-baked bricks, at best; while the external was furnace-baked bricks at Babel, but immense stones in Egypt, which insured the durability of the Egyptian edifices. (4.) A city extended on each side of the river in both instances. (5.) The royal palace was separated from the temple by a considerable width of water. (6.) There were apartments, or chapels, in each. (7.) There were sacred cloisters or courts around. (8.) There was (or was intended to be) at the top a great image: there are indications of such an intention on the top of the open pyramid. This thought is not new; the Jerusalem targum asserts it of Babel, and says that the image was to have held a sword in its hand, as a kind of protector against men and demons—Faciamus nobis IMAGINEM ADORATIONIS in ejus fastigio, et po- namus Gladium in manu ejus, ut conferat contra acies praelium, prius quam dispergamur de superficie terra. These obvious agreements sufficiently evince that the structures were alike in form and in destination, so that we may judge pretty accurately on what we do not know of the one by what we do know of the other. They contribute also to establish the inference, that the same people (though not the same branch of that people) were the builders of both.

The men engaged at Babel had two objects in view; (1.) to build a city, and (2.) a tower. There could be no impiety in proposing to build a city; yet it is expressly stated, that in consequence of the Divine interposition, the continuation of the city was relinquished. On the other hand, the tower was certainly intended as a place for worship, but not of the true God; yet, it is no where said in Scripture that it was destroyed, or its works suspended. This is not easily explained; and the circumstance is rendered the more obscure, by the accounts of its overthrow which have been preserved in heathen writers. Eusebius, quoted by Eusebius, (Præp. lib. ix.) says, "The city Babel was first founded, and afterwards the celebrated tower; both which were built by some of the people who had escaped the deluge.—The tower was eventually ruined by the power of God." Abydenus, in his Assyrian Annals, also mentions the tower; which he says was carried up to heaven; but that the gods ruined it by storms and whirlwinds, frustrated the purpose for which it was designed, and overthrew it on the heads of those who were engaged in the work. The ruins of it were called Babylon. (Euseb. Chron. p. 13.) The reader will bear this in mind, as it will assist in determining our judgment on the character of the ruins still extant.

The following particulars of the tower of Belus are from Dr. Prideaux:—"Till the time of Nebuchadnezzar, the temple of Belus contained no more than the [central] tower only, and the rooms in it served all the occasions of that idolatrous worship. But he enlarged it by vast buildings erected round it, in a square of two furlongs on every side, and a mile in circumference, which was one thousand eight hundred feet more than the square at the temple of Jerusalem, for that was but three thousand feet round; whereas this was, according to this account, four thousand eight hundred; and on the outside of all these buildings, was a wall inclosing the whole, which may be supposed to have been of equal extent with the square in which it stood, that is, two miles and a half in compass, in which were several gates leading into the temple, all of solid brass; and the brazen sea, the brazen pillars, and the other brazen vessels, which were carried to Babylon from the temple of Jerusalem, seem to have been employed in the making of them; for it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar did put all the sacred vessels, which he carried from Jerusalem, into the house of his god at Babylon, that is, into this house or temple of Bel. This temple stood till the time of Xerxes; but on his return from the Grecian expedition, he demolished the whole of it, and laid it all in rubbish, having first plundered it of its immense riches, among which were several images or statues of massy gold, and one of them is said by Diodorus Siculus to have been forty feet high, which might perchance have been that which Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the plains of Dura."

It is highly probable, that the remains of towers, shown in Babylonia, are only ruins of old Babylon, built by Nebuchadnezzar. See BABYLON, CITY OF.—Calmet.

BABINGTON, (GERVASE), bishop of Llandaff and Exeter, was born at Nottingham, in the year 1551. He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and soon afterwards took his degrees of master of arts, and doctor of divinity. He was then made domestic chaplain to Henry, earl of Pembroke, president of the council in the marches of Wales, and assisted the lady of that earl in her version of the Psalms of David, into English metre. He applied himself closely to the study of divinity, and became one of the most impressive and useful preachers of his day. In 1588, he was installed into the prebend of Wellington, in the cathedral of Hereford, and through the interest of his sincere and active friend, the earl of Pembroke, was advanced to the bishopric of Llandaff. He was consecrated on the 29th of August, 1591; and in February, 1594, was translated to the see of Exeter, and confirmed on the 9th of March; from whence, in 1597, he was translated to Worcester, to which he was nominated August 30, elected September 15, and confirmed October 4. Bishop Babington was a man eminently endowed with every Christian ornament, as well as mental qualification. His character admitted of no derogation; for it was pure, unsullied, and, in a great measure, devoid of those failings which have attended the characters of even the best of men. He possessed piety without fanaticism, learning without ostentation, and generosity without prodigality. His time was spent in the cultivation of his mind, and in the exercise of every virtue. This good and great man expired on the 17th of May, 1610, in the fifty-ninth year of his age; beloved and regretted by all who were blessed with his friendship, or honored with his affection; and was buried in the cathedral of Worcester, without a tablet to mark the spot which contained the ashes of a man so excellent. His works were published in 1637, under this title:—"The Works of the Right Reverend Father in God, Gervase Babington, late Bishop of Worcester, containing comfortable Notes on the Five Books of Moses." As also, "An Exposition upon the Creed, the Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer; with a Conference between Man's Frailty and Faith;" and three sermons, one of which was preached at Paul's Cross, the second Sunday in Michaelmas term, being upon Election; the second was preached at the court at Greenwich, on the 24th of May, 1590; and the third is a funeral sermon, on the death of T. L——, Esq., preached by the author while he was bishop of Llandaff.—Life of Bishop Babington, and Works; Jones's Chr. Biog.

BABYLON, COUNTRY OF, is generally called Babylonia, from the name of its first city, Babel; or Chaldea, from the name of its inhabitants, the Chaldeans or Chasdim. When Babylon, instead of Nineveh, was the seat of the supreme power, the words Babylonia and Chaldea were equivalent with Assyria, and comprehended two large tracts of territory on opposite sides of the Euphrates. These were called in Scripture, Aram beyond the river, and Aram on this side of the river. To the former, by way of distinction, the Greeks gave the name of Assyria, and to the latter that of Syria. The portion named Assyria, comprehended a space of seven hundred miles in length, between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, from the Armenian mountains, in which they rise, to the Persian gulf, into which they then flowed into separate channels. This was divided into three parts, 1. Mesopotamia, an appellation, indeed, which, in its literal meaning, was applicable to the whole extent, but which was limited to the northern region, where the rivers diverge, in general, a hundred, and in some places two hundred miles asunder, until, in their course towards the sea, they approach within twenty miles of each other, in the vicinity of Bagdad. 2. Babylonia, extending from this narrow isthmus about three hundred miles towards the Persian gulf, and never exceeding fourscore miles in its breadth between the rivers. And, 3. The eastern district, properly named Atur, but frequently called Mesené and Adiabéné, lying beyond the Tigris, and reaching to the foot of the Carduchian hills. It is to the second of these that the present article refers, and it is called indiscriminately Babylonia or Chaldea; but, in general, the latter name is used by sacred writers, and the former by profane. Sometimes, indeed, these appellations are appropriated severally to a particular district; the former denoting the country more immediately in the neighborhood of Babylon, and the latter that which stretches southward to the Persian gulf.

The climate of this country is temperate and salubrious; but at certain seasons the heat is so intense, that the inhabitants were accustomed to sleep with their bodies partly immersed in water; and the same practice, according to the testimony of modern travellers, is continued to this day. It seldom rains there above three or four times in the course of a year; and the lands were watered by means of canals, trenches, and various sorts of engines, provided in great abundance for the purpose. The soil, naturally rich, and thus carefully supplied with moisture in the driest seasons, surpassed even that of Egypt in fertility, and is said to have generally yielded from one hundred to three hundred-fold. Its vegetable productions grow to so extraordinary a size, that Herodotus declines giving a particular description of them, lest he should incur the charge of exaggeration; but he mentions, as one instance, that the leaves of the wheat and barley were four fingers in breadth. It afforded every where a viscous clay, easily formed by the furnace, or even by the sun, into the hardest bricks; and the naphtha, or bitumen, which was extremely abundant, furnished the firmest of all cements.

The government of this country was of the most despotic description, and the sovereignty was considered as hereditary. Every thing depended upon the will of the prince; and, hence, the laws were undefined, and the punishments arbitrary in the highest degree. Dan. 1: 10. 2: 5. 3: 19. Three separate tribunals, however, were appointed to administer justice; the first of which took cognizance of adultery, and similar offences; the second, of thefts; and the third, of all other crimes. The principal officers of state seem to have been, the captain of the guard, in whom the executive power resided; the prince of the eunuchs, who took charge of the education and subsistence of the youth of the palace; the prime minister, or vizier, who was at the head of the police, and acted as chief justice in the empire; and the master of the magi, whose business it was to interpret prognostications, and divine the events of futurity to the king. The immediate household of the prince appears to have been extremely numerous; and particular districts were appointed to supply the different articles of food which were requisite for the maintenance of the many thousands who daily fed at his tables.

The religious system of the Babylonians bore a near resemblance to that of the Egyptians, and has been very ingeniously ascribed to the following source. The sudden inundations of the Euphrates and Tigris, like those of the Nile, occasioning, alternately, the most rapid, beneficial, or destructive changes in the face of nature, attracted the attention, and alarmed the anxiety of the unenlightened people, who witnessed and experienced their momentous effects. These important changes were observed to have an evident connection with the vicissitudes of the seasons, and the revolutions of the heavenly bodies; and hence, these luminaries, whose influence was understood to be so powerful and extensive, were considered, at first, as the ministers or vicegerents of the Supreme Being, were gradually worshipped as mediators or intercessors for man, and were at length exalted to the rank of separate, but subordinate divinities. The sacerdotal families, devoted to the service of these deities, and thus led by their office to be continually observing the motions of the celestial bodies, gradually acquired such a degree of astronomical skill, as had the appearance of supernatural communications, and gave them a complete ascendancy over the minds of the multitude. This power they employed, as their fancy or interest suggested, in prescribing an immense variety of idolatrous rites and modes of worship; the most remarkable of which was the adoration of fire, and the offering of human victims in sacrifice. These sacerdotal tribes, who have been called by way of distinction, Chaldeans or Chaldees, were the philosophers as well as the priests of their country. They pretended to have derived their learning from the first instructor, Oannes, who sprung from the primoginal egg; who was half man or god, and half fish; who appeared in the Red sea, and taught the knowledge of letters and civilization in general. This learning, as far as it went, they studied very minutely, and handed it down by tradition from father and son, with any little addition and improvement. It consisted chiefly of some absurd opinions about the formation and shape of the earth, a few astronomical observations, and a confused mass of astrological rules and prognostications of the weather.—See Anc. Univ. Hist. vol. iv. p. 332, &c.; Gillies's Hist. of the World, vol. i. p. 60, 72, 168, 195; Jones.

BABYLON, EMPIRE OF, may be considered as the first great monarchy of which any records are to be found in history. It appears to have been founded a short time after the flood; and, according to the astronomical tables sent by Alexander to Aristotle, about 2234 years B. C. Of this first Babylonian kingdom, there is very little to be known, except what is related in sacred Scripture; that, about 2000 years B. C. it consisted, under Nimrod, of four cities, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh; that, about one hundred years afterwards, it was enlarged by Ashur, who built several other cities, and particularly the first Nineveh, on the eastern bank of the Tigris, three hundred miles above Babylon; and that it continued till the year B. C. 1230, when Ninus, having overrun the greater part of Asia, founded a second Nineveh, between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, about fifty miles from Babylon, and thus established what is called the Assyrian monarchy. But what is generally understood by the Babylonian empire, began about 606 years B. C. when Belesis, or Nebopolassar, hereditary satrap of Babylon, revolted against the Assyrian monarch, Sardanapalus; and having destroyed that prince and his capital Nineveh, transferred the seat of power to his own city. Thus there may be said to have been two distinct kingdoms in Babylon; one preceding, and the other following, the Assyrian empire. Or, rather, more properly speaking, there were three great eras of the same monarchy in the country of Assyria. The first of these commences with Nimrod, in the year B. C. 2000, when Babylon was the seat of power; the second with Ninus, in the year 1230, when Nineveh became the metropolis of the empire; and the third with Belesis, in the year 606, when Babylon once more beheld the sovereigns of the East residing in her palaces. This subject, indeed, is beset with inextricable difficulties, and involved in impenetrable darkness; but the above statement, which is founded upon the observations of the learned and ingenious Dr. Gillies, in his History of the World, vol. i. p. 50—130, seems much more simple in itself, as well as more consistent with history, than either the common account, which makes the Assyrian monarchy almost coeval, but altogether unconnected, with the first kingdom in Babylon; or that of Sir Isaac Newton, who dates its origin so late as the year B. C. 770.

Leaving our readers to decide this point for themselves, we proceed to the proper subject of this article, namely, to give a short sketch of the second Babylonian empire, established by Belesis, or Nebopolassar, upon the ruins of the Assyrian monarchy, about 606 years B. C.

Nebopolassar, or, as he is also called, Nebuchadnezzar, continued in close alliance with Cyaxares the Mede, by whose assistance he had acquired the sovereignty, and by whose friendship he became so powerful as to excite the apprehensions of the neighboring princes. While he was employed in resisting the Scythians, who had made themselves masters of Upper Asia, Necho, king of Egypt, invaded his dominions in the south, reduced the city Carchemish, or Circesium, and encouraged the Syrians in that quarter to revolt. Nebopolassar being now well advanced in years, sent his son Nebuchadnezzar, whom he had associated with himself in the empire, to reduce those countries to their former subjection. The young prince defeated the army of Necho near the Euphrates, retook the city of Carchemish, and quelled the insurgents in Syria; entered Judea, and took possession of Jerusalem; restored Jehoiaakim to his throne, but carried to Babylon great numbers of the principal Jews, with the treasures of the palace, and part of the sacred vessels in the temple. In the mean time, Nebopolassar died, and was succeeded by his son, upon his return from his expedition.

Nebuchadnezzar II., called also Labynetus, occupied himself, during the first years of his reign, in enlarging and embellishing his capital; and during this period occurred those events which are related in the book of Daniel, ch. 2. His tranquillity was interrupted by the revolt of Jehoiachim in Judea, who was soon reduced by the Babylonian generals; but Jechonias, his son, having also attempted to shake off the Assyrian yoke, Nebuchadnezzar went in person to the siege of Jerusalem; and having made himself master of the city, he carried to Babylon all its treasures and sacred utensils, leaving the government to Zedekiah, the uncle of Jechonias. Recalled in a short time to Judea by the revolt of Zedekiah, he defeated the Egyptians, who had come to the assistance of the Jews, took Jerusalem by storm, after a twelve-month's siege, gave it up to pillage and slaughter, put out the eyes of the king, and carried him away captive. Upon his return to Babylon, he erected a golden statue in the plain of Dura, sixty cubits in height, and commanded all his subjects to worship it as a divinity. Dan. ch. 3. About three years after this event, he again led his forces against the western nations, made himself master of Tyre, after a siege of thirteen years, overran the whole country of Egypt, returned to adorn his capital with the booty which he had acquired; and, having suffered the punishment of his pride, as related in Daniel, ch. 4: he died, in the forty-fourth year of his reign.

Evil-Merodach, who succeeded his father Nebuchadnezzar, is described as a weak and licentious prince, and was murdered by his relatives, after having reigned little more than two years.

Neriglissar, the husband of Evil-Merodach's sister, and one of the chief conspirators, reigned in his stead. Immediately after his accession, he began to make preparations for resisting the growing power of the Medes and Persians. After spending three years in forming alliances, and collecting troops, he marched to meet his opponents, Cyaxares and Cyrus; and, in a bloody engagement with the latter, was defeated and slain.

Laborosoarchod, his son, succeeded to the throne. By his cruelty and oppression, he provoked several of his governors to raise the standard of rebellion, and to call in the aid of Cyrus. Marching to suppress these commotions, he was met by the Persian prince, defeated with great loss, and pursued to the very walls of his metropolis. After Cyrus had retired with his army, the Babylonian monarch indulged his vicious propensities to such excess, that his own subjects, unable any longer to endure his tyrannical conduct, conspired against his life, and put him to death, in the ninth month of his reign. He was succeeded by Belshazzar, the son of Evil-Merodach, and grandson of the great Nebuchadnezzar. His mother, Nitocris, who was a woman of extraordinary talents, took upon herself the management of public affairs; and while her son was pursuing his pleasures, she made every exertion to preserve the tottering empire. She completed many of the works which Nebuchadnezzar had begun; and, when Cyrus renewed his attacks upon the frontier towns, she employed the utmost activity in constructing new fortifications for the defence of the capital. Belshazzar, at length, in the fifth year of his reign, repaired in person to the court of Croesus, king of Lydia, carrying with him an immense treasure; and with the aid of that prince, as well as by the influence of his wealth, framed a very formidable confederacy against Cyrus. Having hired a numerous army of Egyptians, Greeks, and other nations in Lesser Asia, he appointed Croesus to the command, and directed him to make an incursion into Media. These auxiliaries having been completely routed, Croesus taken and dethroned, and Cyrus again advancing to Babylon, Belshazzar attempted to make head against him in the field, but was soon put to flight, and closely blockaded in his capital. After a siege of two years, the city was taken, as is related in the following article; Belshazzar was slain in the assault upon his palace; and with him terminated the empire of the Babylonians, about 538 years B. C.—See Rollin's Anc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 31, &c.; Prideaux's Connections, vol. i. p. 51, &c.; Anc. Univ. History, vol. iv. p. 394, &c.; Gillies's History of the World, vol. i. p. 130, &c.; Jones.

BABYLON, City of, the capital of the ancient kingdom of Babylonia, is supposed to have been situated in north-latitude thirty-two degrees and thirty-four minutes, and in east longitude forty-four degrees, twelve minutes and thirty seconds. It was founded by the first descendants of Noah, 2234 years B. C., enlarged by Nimrod, the great grandson of Noah, 2000 years B. C., and, in a manner, completely rebuilt about 1200 years B. C., by the Assyrian queen Semiramis. It was greatly strengthened and beautified by various succeeding sovereigns; but it was by Nebuchadnezzar and his daughter Nitocris, that it was brought to such a degree of magnificence and splendor, as rendered it one of the wonders of the world.

The antithesis between Babylon and Jerusalem, enters largely into the prophetic language of Scripture. Hence the importance of an accurate knowledge of the real history of both.

Babylon stood in the midst of a large plain, in a very deep and fruitful soil. It was divided into two parts by the river Euphrates, which flowed through the city from north to south. The old city was on the east, and the new city, built by Nebuchadnezzar, on the west side of the river. Both these divisions were inclosed by one wall, and the whole formed a complete square, four hundred and eighty furlongs in compass. Each of the four sides of this square had twenty-five gates of solid brass, at equal distances; and at every corner was a strong tower, ten feet higher than the wall. In those quarters where the city had least natural defence, there were also three of these towers between every two of the gates; and the same number between each corner and the nearest gate on its two sides. The city was composed of fifty streets, each fifteen miles long, and one hundred and fifty feet broad, proceeding from the twenty-five gates on each side, and crossing each other at right angles, besides four half streets, two hundred feet in breadth, surrounding the whole, and fronting towards the outer wall. It was thus intersected into six hundred and seventy-six squares, which extended four furlongs and a half on each of their sides, and along which the houses were built, at some distance from each other. These intermediate spaces, as well as the inner parts of the squares, were employed as gardens, pleasure grounds, &c.; so that not above one half of the immense extent which the walls inclosed, was occupied by buildings.

The walls of Babylon were of extraordinary strength, being eighty-seven feet broad, and three hundred and fifty feet high. They were built of brick, and cemented by a kind of glutinous earth called bitumen, which had the quality of soon becoming as hard as stone. These walls were surrounded on the outside by an immense ditch, from which the earth had been dug to make the bricks; and which, being always filled with water, added very much to the defence of the city.

On each side of the river Euphrates was built a quay, or high wall, of the same thickness with the walls around the city. There were gates of brass in these walls, opposite to every street which led to the river, and from them were formed descents, or landing places, by means of steps, so that the inhabitants could easily pass in boats, from one side of the city to the other. There was also a remarkable bridge thrown over the river, near the middle of the city, built with wonderful art, of huge stones, fastened together by means of iron chains and melted lead; and is said to have been a whole furlong in length, and thirty feet in breadth.

In order to prevent any inconvenience from the swells of the Euphrates, two canals were cut from that river, at a considerable distance above the town, which carried off the superabundant waters into the Tigris. From the place where these canals commenced, down the sides of the river, both above and below the city, immense banks were constructed, to confine the stream still more effectually within its channel, and to prevent still more completely all danger of an inundation. In order to facilitate the construction of these works, an immense lake was dug on the west side of Babylon, about forty miles square, and thirty-five feet deep, into which the river was turned by a canal, till the banks were completed; and it was then restored to its former course. This lake continued afterwards to receive annually a fresh supply of water from the Euphrates, and was rendered very serviceable, by means of sluices, for watering the lands which were situated below it.

At the two ends of the bridge over the Euphrates, were two magnificent palaces, which had a subterraneous communication with each other, by means of a vault or tunnel, under the bed of the river. The old palace, on the east side, was about thirty furlongs in compass, and was surrounded by three separate walls, one within the other, with considerable spaces between them. The new palace, on the opposite side, was about four times as large as the other, and is said to have been eight miles in circumference. The walls of both these edifices were embellished with an infinite variety of pieces of sculpture; and, among the rest, was a curious hunting-scene, in which Semiramis was represented on horseback, throwing her javlin at a leopard, while her husband Ninus was piercing a lion.

The most remarkable structure in the new palace was the hanging gardens, which Nebuchadnezzar is said to have raised, in order to give his wife Amytis, (daughter of Astyages, king of Media,) some representation of the beautiful mountainous and woody views which abounded in her native country. These gardens occupied a square piece of ground, four hundred feet on every side, and consisted of large terraces, raised one above the other, till they equalled in height the walls of the city. The ascent from terrace to terrace was by means of steps ten feet wide; and the whole pile was sustained by vast arches, built upon other arches, and strengthened on each side by a solid wall, twenty-two feet in thickness. Within these arches were very spacious and splendid apartments, which are described as having commanded a very extensive and delightful prospect. In order to form a proper pavement for supporting the stones, and confining the moisture of the garden, large flat stones, sixteen feet in length, and four in breadth, were, first of all, laid upon the top of the upper arches; over these was spread a layer of reeds, mixed with bitumen; upon this, two rows of brick, closely cemented; and the whole covered with sheets of lead, upon which the earth or mould was laid to a sufficient depth for the largest trees to take firm root. In the upper terrace was a large reservoir, into which water was drawn from the river by some species of engine, and kept there ready to be distributed to any part of the gardens.

Scripture nowhere notices these celebrated gardens; but it speaks of willows planted on the banks of the rivers of Babylon: "We hanged our harps on the willows in the midst thereof," says Psal. 137: 2. Isaiah, describing in a prophetic style the captivity of the Moabites by Nebuchadnezzar, says, "They shall be carried away to the valley of willows." 15: 7. The same prophet, (ch. 21: 1.) describing the calamities of Babylon by Cyrus, calls this city the desert of the sea. Jeremiah, to the same purport, says, (51: 36, 42.) "I will dry up the sea of Babylon, and make her springs dry. The sea is come up upon her: she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof." Megasthenes (ap. Euseb. Præp. ix. 41.) assures us, that Babylon was built in a place which had before abounded so greatly with water, that it was called the sea. But the language of the psalmist above quoted, suggests the idea that the city of Babylon was refreshed by a considerable number of streams; "By the rivers [streams, flowing currents] of Babylon we sat down."—"On the willows (plural) in the midst thereof, we hanged our harps" (plural). There must, then, have been gardens visited by these streams, easily accessible to the captive Israelites; not the royal gardens, exclusively, but others less reserved; and the phrase, "in the midst thereof;" that is, of Babylon, seems to denote—not gardens above or below the city, but strictly in its interior. We know, also, that there was but one river at Babylon then, as there is but one now, the Euphrates, so that when these captives represent themselves as "sitting by the rivers of Babylon," in the plural, they inform us, that this river was divided into several branches, or canals; and these were, doubtless, works of art. Moreover, from Jeremiah's threat of drying up the sea of Babylon, we learn, that there was a considerable lake or reservoir, in the interior of the city; for to such large receptacles of water the appellation sea was, and still is, applied in the East. Undoubtedly, the water of this lake, and of these canals, being furnished by the Euphrates, the name of that river might be continued to them, in a general sense: and if this be admitted, a great proportion of those difficulties which the learned have hitherto found insuperable, are reduced to trifles, if they do not vanish. Nor ought we to forget, that the Egyptian Memphis, which we suppose to be a copy from Babylon, was, in like manner, surrounded and visited by streams, by canals, &c. all of them drawn from one river, the Nile, and bearing its name.

Near to the old palace stood the temple of Belus; and in the middle of the temple was an immense tower, about six hundred feet in height, and the same number square at the foundation. This huge pile of building consisted of eight towers, each seventy-five feet high, placed one above the other, and gradually decreasing towards the top like a pyramid. What has been described is understood to have been the old tower of Babel; but it was greatly enlarged by Nebuchadnezzar, who built around its base a number of other sacred edifices, forming a square nearly three miles in compass. The whole was inclosed by a strong wall, and the various entrances secured by solid gates of brass, which are conjectured to have been formed out of the spoils of the temple at Jerusalem. Dan. 1: 2. 2 Chron. 36: 7. In this temple of Belus, or, as some say, on its summit, was a golden image forty feet in height, and equal in value to three and a half millions sterling. There was, besides, such a multitude of other statues and sacred utensils, that the whole of the treasures contained in this single edifice has been estimated at forty-two millions.

Many of the above statements, recorded in ancient authors, respecting the wonders of Babylon, are unquestionably greatly exaggerated; but, after every abatement that can fairly be made, this city is understood to have comprehended a regular square, forty-eight miles in circuit, and to have been eight times larger than London and its appendages. See Gilkie's Hist. of the World, vol. i. p. 166, and Rennel's Geog. of Herodotus, p. 341. The city of Babylon seems to have excelled in rich and ingenious manufactures, at a very early period in the history of the world; and its "goodly garments" are mentioned 1450 years B. C. Josh. 7: 21. and 2 Sam. 13: 18.

Great boastings have been made of the antiquity of the astronomical observations taken by the Babylonians. Josephus tells us, that Berosus, the Babylonian historian and astronomer, agreed with Moses concerning the corruption of mankind, and the deluge; and Aristotle, who was curious in examining the truth of what was reported relating to these observations, desired Calisthenes to send him the most certain accounts that he could find of this particular, among the Babylonians. Calisthenes sent him observations of the heavens, which had been made during one thousand nine hundred and three years, computing from the origin of the Babylonish monarchy, to the time of Alexander. This carries up the account as high as the one hundred and fifteenth year after the flood, which was within fifteen years after the tower of Babel was built. For the confusion of tongues, which followed immediately after the building of that tower, happened in the year in which Peleg was born, one hundred and one years after the flood; and fourteen years before that in which these observations begin.

In ancient authors, much confusion is occasioned by a too general application of the name of Babel: it has denoted the original tower, the original city, the subsequent tower, the palace, the later city, and we shall find it expressing the province of Babylonia; in fact, it stands connected in that sense with the plain of Dura, which is said to be in the province of Babylon, and which might be placed at a distance from the city, were it not for considerations already recited. Ancient authors have raised the wonder of their readers, by allowing to the walls of Babylon dimensions and extent which confound the imagination, and rather belong to a province than to a city. But, that they really were of extraordinary dimensions, would appear from references made to them by the prophet, who threatens them with destruction. Jeremiah (50: 15.) says, "Her foundations are fallen, her walls are thrown down;" and again, (51: 41.) "The very wall of Babylon shall fall;" and (verse 58.) "the broad wall of Babylon shall be utterly broken;"—observe the broad wall; and in verse 53. we read, "Though Babylon should mount up to heaven, [that is, her defences,] and though she should fortify the height of her strength," [that is, her wall.] Thus we find allusions to the height, the breadth, and the strength of the walls of Babylon.

The downfall and destruction of this proud metropolis of the ancient world, is a subject so much dwelt upon by the prophets, that before taking leave of the article, it may not be improper to take a cursory glance at some of the more important particulars concerning it.

Enriched with the spoils of the East, and exulting in the day of her prosperity, Babylon seemed born to command the world. She said in her heart, according to the language of the prophet, (Isa. 47: 7, 8, &c.) "I am the queen of nations, and my reign is forever. I am; and there is none else beside me. I am exempted from that vicissitude and decline which are incident to other nations. My destiny shall survive coeval with those stars in which the observers of the heavens have read the records of my perpetual duration." But her pride and luxury, her cruelty to the Jews during their captivity at Babylon, and the sacrilegious impiety of her monarch, wrought her downfall. She had been the instrument of the Divine vengeance to punish guilty kingdoms; and the time was approaching when "the Lord was to break the staff wherewith he had smote so many nations," and destroy the weapon of war which had been drunk with the blood of the people. More than a hundred years before the accomplishment of this prediction, Isaiah foretold the doom that was pronounced against Babylon, named the prince who was to fulfil this prophecy before he was born, described the minutest circumstances relating to the siege and the taking of the city, and painted the perpetual desolation of this once flourishing capital in every succeeding age. Isa. 13: Jer. 45:

Isaiah has composed an ode on the occasion, which for elegance of disposition, sublimity of sentiment, boldness of coloring, beauty and force of expression, stands unrivalled among all the monuments of genius which antiquity has transmitted to modern times. A chorus of Jews is first introduced, expressing their astonishment at the sudden downfall of Babylon, and their exultation at the unexpected revolution in their affairs, by the destruction of their tyrants.

"How hath the oppressor ceased! the golden city ceased! Jehovah hath broken the rod of the wicked, and the sceptre of the rulers. He who smote the people in wrath with a continual stroke, he that ruled the nations in vengeance, is persecuted, and none hindereth."

The oppressed kingdoms and their rulers, denoted in the prophetic style by "the fir trees and cedars of Lebanon," are now next represented as shouting with joy, and the earth with its inhabitants triumphing over the fall of the tyrant.

"The whole earth is at rest, is quiet, they break forth into a joyful shout: even the fir trees rejoice over thee, the cedars of Lebanon: since thou art fallen, no feller is come up against us."

The scene is then changed, and a new set of personages introduced. The regions of the dead are laid open, and Hades represented as rousing up the shades of the departed monarchs. They rise up from their thrones to meet the king of Babylon, and insult him on his being reduced to the same humble and calamitous condition with themselves. This is the boldest figure that has ever been attempted in poetical composition, and is executed with astonishing conciseness and sublimity. Conceive the idea of an immense subterraneous vault, a vast gloomy cavern, all around the sides of which there are cells, in the manner of the Jewish sepulchres, to receive the dead bodies: here the deceased monarchs lie in distinguished state, suitable to their former rank, each on his couch, with his arms beside him, and his chiefs around him. These illustrious shades rise at once from their couches, and advance from the entrance of the cavern to meet the king of Babylon, and to deride him on his fall.

"Hades from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming: it rouseth up the departed shades, the mighty of the earth: it raiseth from their thrones all the kings of the nations: they triumph over thee. Art thou, even thou too, become weak as we? Art thou made like unto us? Is thy pride brought down to the grave, the sound of thy sprightly instruments? Is the vermin become thy couch, and the earth-worm thy covering?"

The Jewish people are again brought forward, uttering an exclamation in the form of a funeral dirge over the fallen tyrant.

"How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut off from the earth, thou who didst subdue the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God, I will be like the Most High. Yet thou art brought down to the mansions of the dead, and to the sides of the pit."

Strangers are next introduced, who discover the corpse of the king of Babylon, cast out and disfigured among the common slain. They bitterly reproach him for his desolating ambition, which brought him to such an ignominious end, and denounce vengeance on his race and posterity.

"Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that shook the kingdoms? that made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities? All the kings of the nations lie in glory, every one in his own house. But thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch; as a carcass trodden under foot. Thou shalt not be joined with them in burial, because thou hast destroyed the land, and slain the people. Prepare slaughter for his children, for the iniquity of their fathers, that they do not rise nor possess the land, nor fill the face of the world with cities."

At last, God himself is introduced, denouncing the doom of Babylon, the extirpation of the royal family, the utter destruction of the city, its total desolation from age to age; and confirming the irreversible decree by the awful solemnity of an oath.

"I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will cut off from Babylon the name and remnant, the son and the nephew. It shall become a heap of ruins, a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment and a hissing, without an inhabitant. Isa. 14: 4—25. And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation: neither shall the Arabian pitch his tent there, nor the shepherds make their folds there. But the wild beasts of the desert shall lurk in its ruins; the houses shall be full of doleful creatures; there shall the owls dwell and the satyrs dance. And the wild beasts of the island shall cry in their desolate domes, and dragons in their pleasant palaces. I will make it a possession for the bittern and pools of water: and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the Lord of hosts. Jehovah hath sworn, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand." Isa. 13: 19. Ch. 14: 23, 24.

At the precise period appointed, this prediction was fulfilled. This great city, the glory of kingdoms, whose beauty, strength, and magnificence made it the wonder of the world, has shared the ruin of Sodom and Gomorrah.

For the space of twenty-six years after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, it continued to retain its glory, and was at once the seat of an imperial court, the station of a numerous garrison, and the scene of a most extensive commerce. It was at length invested, about 540 years B. C. by the victorious armies of Cyrus the Great. Crowded with troops for their defence, surrounded with such lofty walls, and furnished with provisions for twenty years, the citizens of Babylon derided the efforts of their besieger, and boasted of their impregnable situation. On the other hand, the conqueror of Asia, determined to subdue his only remaining rival in the empire of the eastern world, left no expedient untried for the reduction of the city: By means of the palm trees, which abounded in that country, he erected a number of towers higher than the walls, and made many desperate attempts to carry the place by assault. He next drew a line of circumvallation around the city; divided his army into twelve parts; appointed each of these to guard the trenches for a month, and resolved to starve his enemy to a surrender. After spending two years in this blockade, he was presented with an opportunity of effecting his purpose by stratagem. Having learned that a great festival was to be celebrated in the city, and that it was customary with the Babylonians, on that occasion, to spend the night in drunkenness and debauchery, he posted a part of his troops close by the spot where the river Euphrates entered the city, and another at the place where it went out, with orders to march along the channel, whenever they should find it fordable. He then detached a third party to open the head of the canal, which led to the great lake already described; and, at the same time, to admit the river into the trenches, which he had drawn around the city. By these means, the river was so completely drained by midnight, that his troops easily found their way along its bed; and the gates, which used to shut up the passages from its banks, having been left open in consequence of the general disorder, they encountered no obstacle whatever in their progress. Having thus penetrated into the heart of the city, and met, according to agreement, at the gates of the palace, they easily overpowered the guards; cut to pieces all who opposed them; slew the king Belshazzar, while attempting to make resistance; and received the submission of the whole city within a few hours.

From this period, Babylon ceased to be the metropolis of a kingdom, and its grandeur very rapidly decayed. Its citizens were very impatient under the Persian yoke; and their pride was particularly provoked by the removal of the imperial seat to Susa. Taking advantage of the disorders in Persia, in consequence of the sudden death of Cambyses, and of the massacre of the Magians, they continued, during the space of four years, to make secret preparations for a revolt. At length, in the fifth year of Darius Hystaspes, about 518 years B. C., they openly raised the standard of rebellion; and thus drew upon themselves the whole force of the Persian empire. Determined upon a desperate defence, and desirous to make their provisions last as long as possible, they adopted the barbarous resolution of destroying all such persons in the city as could be of no service during the siege. Having sacrificed the lives of their friends, and resolutely regardless of their own, they successfully resisted all the strength and stratagems of the Persians, for the space of eighteen months, and fell at length into the hands of Darius, by the following extraordinary instance of fortitude in one of his officers. Zopyrus, one of the principal noblemen in the Persian court, appeared in the presence of his prince, covered with blood, deprived of his nose and ears, torn with stripes, and wounded in various parts of his body; unfolded to the astonished monarch his design of deserting to the enemy, and arranged his future plan of operations. Approaching the walls of the city, he was carried before the governor, detailed the cruel treatment which he professed to have received from Darius; offered his services to the Babylonians, who were well acquainted with his rank and abilities; acquired their confidence by several successful sallies; obtained, at length, the chief command of their forces, and thus easily found means to betray the city to his master. As soon as Darius was in possession of Babylon, he ordered its hundred gates and its impregnable walls to be demolished; put to death three thousand of those who had been principally concerned in the revolt; and sent fifty thousand women from different parts of his empire, to supply the place of those who had been so cruelly destroyed at the commencement of the siege. In the year B. C. 478, Xerxes, the successor of Darius, returning from his inglorious invasion of Greece, passed through the city of Babylon; and, partly from hatred to the Sabian worship, partly with a view to recruit his treasures, plundered the temple of Belus of its immense wealth, and then laid its lofty tower in ruins.

In this state it continued till the year B. C. 324, when Alexander the Great made an attempt to rebuild this sacred edifice, and to restore its former magnificence. But, though he employed about ten thousand men in this work for the space of two months, his sudden death put an end to the undertaking before the ground was cleared of its rubbish. This mighty city declined very rapidly under the successors of Alexander; and, in the year 294 B. C. was almost exhausted of its inhabitants by Seleucus Nicator, who built in its neighborhood the city of Seleuci, or New Babylon. It suffered greatly from the neglect and violence of the Parthian princes before the Christian era; and every succeeding writer bears testimony to its increasing desolation. Diodorus Siculus, B. C. 44; Strabo, B. C. 30; Pliny, A. D. 66; Pausanias, A. D. 150; Maximus Tyrius, and Constantine the Great, as recorded by Eusebius,—all concur in describing its ruined condition; and Jerome at length informs us, that, about the end of the fourth century, its walls were employed by the Persian princes as an inclosure for wild beasts, preserved there for the pleasures of the chase. It was visited about the end of the twelfth century by Benjamin of Tulela in Navarre, who observed only a few ruins of Nebuchadnezzar's palace remaining, but so full of serpents and other venomous reptiles, that it was dangerous to inspect them nearly. A similar account is given by other travellers; by Teixeira, a Portuguese; by Rauwolf, a German traveller in 1574; by Petrus Valensis in 1616; by Tavernier, and by Hanway.

We shall now direct our attention to the remains of those once magnificent structures which distinguished Babylon as the wonder of the world: of their elegance we cannot judge, as that has ceased to exist; of their magnitude we can form some estimate, though not of their connection, or mutual dependence: we shall, nevertheless, find, on examination, sufficient particulars attached to these monuments of persevering labor to justify the predictions of the prophets, to clear them from the charge of inconsistency or prevarication, which is our principal object.

The first traveller who communicated an intelligible account of these antiquities was Della Valle, who, in 1616, examined them more minutely and leisurely than some who went before him. His account of the more northerly of these ruins, which he calls the tower of Belus, is instructive, notwithstanding later information.

To Mr. Rich, resident at Bagdad for the East India Company, we are indebted for a still more particular account of these monuments of antiquity; his tracts have greatly engaged the attention of the public, and have given occasion to much investigation. The following are extracts from his first work: (Lond. 1815.) "The ruins of Babylon may in fact be said almost to commence from Mohawil, a very indifferent khan, close to which is a large canal, with a bridge over it, the whole country between it and Hellah exhibiting at intervals traces of building, in which are discoverable burnt and unburnt bricks and bitumen. Three mounds in particular attract attention from their magnitude. The district called by the natives El-Aredh Babel, extends on both sides of the Euphrates. The ruins of the eastern quarter of Babylon commence about two miles above Hellah, and consist of two large masses or mounds connected with, and lying north and south of, each other; and several smaller ones which cross the plain at different intervals. At the northern termination of the plain is Pietro Della Valle's ruin; from the south-east, (to which it evidently once joined, being only obliterated there by two canals,) proceeds a narrow ridge or mound of earth, wearing the appearance of having been a boundary wall. This ridge forms a kind of circular inclosure, and joins the south-eastern point of the most southerly of the two grand masses. The whole area, inclosed by the boundary on the east and south, and the river on the west, is two miles and six hundred yards from east to west,—as much from Pietro Della Valle's ruin to the southern part of the boundary, or two miles and one thousand yards to the most southerly mound of all. The first grand mass of ruins [south] is one thousand one hundred yards in length, and eight hundred in the greatest breadth. . . . The most elevated part may be about fifty or sixty feet above the level of the plain, and it has been dug into for the purpose of procuring bricks. On the north is a valley of five hundred and fifty yards in length, the area of which is covered with tussocks of rank grass, is longest from east to west, and crossed from south to north, by a line of ruins of very little elevation. To this succeeds, going north, the second grand heap of ruins, the shape of which is nearly a square of seven hundred yards length and breadth. . . . This is the place where Beauchamp made his observations; and it certainly is the most interesting part of the ruins of Babylon: every vestige discoverable in it declares it to have been composed of buildings far superior to all the rest which have left traces in the eastern quarter: the bricks are of the finest description, and notwithstanding this is the grand storehouse of them, and that the greatest supplies have been and are now constantly drawn from it, they appear still to be abundant. In all these excavations, walls of burnt brick laid in lime mortar of a very good quality, are seen; and in addition to the substances generally strewn on the surfaces of all these mounds, we here find fragments of alabaster vessels, fine earthen ware, marble and great quantities of varnished tiles, the glazing and coloring of which is surprisingly fresh. In a hollow, near the southern part. I found a sepulchral urn of earthen ware, which had been broken in digging, and near it lay some human bones, which pulverized with the touch."

We add a few remarks on these descriptions, with a view to the appropriation of the mounds, before we close the subject. Speculations have been indulged as well by Mr. Rich as by Major Rennell, on the character of each of these mounds of ruins. Leaving to those truly respectable authorities the task of establishing their theories, we shall content ourselves with following the voice of current, and apparently unbroken, tradition. We say, therefore, that the Makloube, the Mujelibé, the pyramid of Haroot and Maroot, (in other words, Della Valle's Ruin,) or by whatever other appellation the signification of overturned, or topsy-turvy, be preserved—this ruin marks the original tower of Babel: and, so far as may be judged by comparison of its present shape with the neighboring mounds, it never was finished. It is all but impossible, that the ruins of a building raised to that central elevation which might give it the appearance, or entitle it to the appellation of a pyramid, should form an outline of surface on its top, so nearly equable as this object presents in Mr. Rich's delineation of it. That it was raised to unequal heights in different parts, or on its different faces, is every way likely; that it might answer, more or less, the purpose of a cemetery, in after-ages, is credible; and that it might even receive some additions from its votaries, for such it had, no doubt, may be admitted:—yet, without impeaching the proposition that it never reached that height, or that complete form and condition, which its founders contemplated. Mr. Rich himself remarks "that there does not remain in the irregularities on the top a sufficient quantity of rubbish to account for an elevation equal to that of the tower, the whole height being now only one hundred and forty feet." This testimony is decisive. There is no need to expatiate on the confirmation this affords to Scripture history. Except the deluge, the tower of Babel, with the circumstances attending it, is the most ancient fact recorded, or that could be recorded; it was followed by consequences of the most interesting nature to the human race, is attested by profane authority, as well as sacred, and these ruins, to this day, afford effective evidence, that the writer of the Mosaic narration was equally faithful and well informed. To enlarge would be to intrude on the reader's own reflections.

There would be something extremely melancholy in the fate of Babylon, its desolation, its disappearance, its eternal annihilation, after so vigorous and so long continued exertion to raise it to pre-eminence, did we not know that its pride was excessive, and its power was cruel. The fierceness of war was the delight of its kings. Nebuchadnezzar himself had been a warrior of no limited ambition; the Chaldeans were bitter, hasty, sanguinary, ferocious; and to read the accounts of their inhumanity prepares us for a reverse, which we await, but do not regret. There is something in the idea of retaliation from which the human mind is not averse—"As she hath done, so do to her," is the language not of prophecy or of poetry only, but of "even-handed justice," in the common acceptance of mankind. It is not only because we are better acquainted with the miseries inflicted on Jerusalem and the sanctuary that we admit these feelings in respect to Babylon: there can be no doubt, but what other nations had equally suffered under her oppression: the people who are emphatically called on to execute the vengeance determined against her, had certainly been galled under her yoke. Cyrus and Xerxes, who captured her city and destroyed her temple, were but the avengers of their country. Alexander considered himself in the same light. It is rather from a deficiency of historical accounts, than from the facts of the case, that Babylon has been supposed to have been reduced by a gradual decay only. Already have more symptoms of violence been discovered than were formerly supposed, and it is more than possible, that our intercourse with Eastern writers may bring us acquainted with events which will enable us to account for appearances, that now present nothing but uncertainties. Kouartay took its rise at Babylon, was fostered and protected there, and from thence was diffused throughout (at least) the western world: the liberal arts, the more recondite sciences, with every power of the human mind, were rendered subservient to systematic idolatry. Its doom, therefore, must correspond with its crimes. It is enough for us, that we know its punishment to be just; and that we are happily enabled to trace, in its ruins, the unequivocal and even the verbal accomplishment of those predictions which denounced its calamities—the monuments of misery long deserved, but not remitted though postponed.

The following are the comparative dimensions of the principal ruins of ancient Babylon:

Mujelibé, circumference two thousand one hundred and eleven feet; height remaining on the south-east, one hundred and forty-one feet.

Kasr, or palace, square seven hundred yards.

Sea, or lake, by the plain, length eight hundred yards; breadth five hundred and fifty yards, by measurement.

Bridge, (supposed,) length six hundred yards; breadth nearly one hundred yards, ruins.

Temple of Belus, (Herodotus,) square five hundred feet.

Temple of Belus, (supposed,) with the buildings near it, ruins, length one thousand one hundred yards; breadth eight hundred yards; height remaining fifty or sixty feet.

Birs Nimrood, circumference two thousand two hundred and eighty-six feet; height remaining, east fifty or sixty feet; west one hundred and ninety-eight feet; tower, two hundred and thirty-five feet.

Extent of the whole inclosure, above two miles and a half, north and south—the same east and west.—Jones & Calmet.

BABYLON THE GREAT; an appellation given to the false church, or antichristian apostasy, by the writer of the Apocalypse. Rev. 14: and 18: To perceive the force and propriety of denominating the apostate church of Rome, by the name of this renowned city, it is only necessary to consider that the kings of Babylon were in former times the most formidable enemies which God's ancient people, the Jews, had; and that in various respects. For not only as a nation did they suffer more from the Babylonians, by the invasion of their country, and their being carried into captivity, but much also of that corruption of their worship, which brought down the judgments of heaven upon them, seems to have been derived from that country. Hence the prophet Jeremiah, describing ancient Babylon, says, "It is the land of graven images, and they are mad upon their idols," ch. 50: 30. And again, "Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand, that made all the earth drunken: the nations have drunken of her wine; therefore the nations are mad." 51: 7. Thus, "as Babylon of old was the first of all idolatrous cities, she is taken as the fittest emblem to set forth the enormous guilt, and to exhibit in full light the extensive influence of idolatrous Rome; each in its turn being the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth; the former corrupting the heathen world with her fornication, and the latter the Christian."—Hurd's Sermons, Introduction to Prophecy, ser. 11. (See the article ANTICHRIST.)

BABYLON OF PETER. There have been many and long-continued controversies among the learned on the subject of the Babylon mentioned in his first Epistle, 5: 13.

The Babylon of Peter has been thought to be Rome; but in disproof of this notion it is only necessary to recall attention to the order of the provinces saluted by the apostle. He places Pontus and Cappadocia first, certainly, because they were nearest to him; and Bithynia last, because it was the most distant from him. This is utterly inconsistent with his being at this time resident in Rome, which would have prescribed a contrary order. "The Syrian and Chaldee writers," says Mr. Yeates, "in the Lives of the Apostles and Martyrs, record of the apostle Peter, that 'he preached in Syria, and Antioch, and in Asia, Bithynia, Galatia, and other regions.'" They say nothing of Babylon. "Elias, bishop of Damascus, writes, that . . . the country of Babylon . . . was called to the faith by Addeus and Marus, of the seventy disciples, which followed Bartholomew." And in the Epitome of the Syrian Canons they write, "The fifth sect is Babylon, in honor of the three constituted apostles; Thomas, the apostle of the Hindoos and Chinese; Bartholomew, who also is the Nathaniel of the Syrians; and Addeus, one of the seventy, who was master to Aghens and Marus, the apostle of Mesopotamia and Persia." Here they say nothing of Peter, who, most assuredly, could not have been omitted in this enumeration, had there been any reason for inserting him.—Calmet.

BABYLONIA; the province of which Babylon was the capital, and which is now called Irac. (See BABYLON, COUNTRY OF, and IMAGE OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR.)

BACA, THE VALLEY OF, OR OF TEARS, (Ps. 84: 6.) probably the same as the valley of tears, or weepers, or Bochim. Judg. 2: 1. 2 Sam. 5: 23. The psalmist says, "Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee, in whose heart are the ways of them, who, passing through the valley of Baca, or tears, makes it a well, the rain also filleth the pools;" from which it has been generally inferred that the valley of Baca was a dreary, thirsty, undesirable place—the very reverse of what appears to be the fact. The following is from De la Roque, (Voy. de Syrie, p. 116.) "I was extremely satisfied with our walk; which, besides, gave me an opportunity of admiring the most agreeable territory, and the best cultivated, perhaps, in all Syria, lying the length of the plain from north to south, to the mountains which separate it from that of Damascus. This plain, or more properly speaking, the whole territory of Baalbec, to the mountains, is named in Arabic, AL-BEKA, which we express by Bekaa. It is watered by the river Letanus, and by many other streams; it is a delicious, I might say an enchanting, country, and is nothing inferior to the country of Damascus, which is so renowned among the Orientals. Bekaa produces, among other things, those beautiful and excellent grapes which are sent to various parts, under the name of grapes of Damascus." This seems to be the very same place meant by the psalmist, and to have retained (or recovered, as many places have, under the present Arab government) its ancient appellation. It is among the mountains of Lebanon, north of Judea.

In a moral sense, the vale of tears signifies this world, which, to good men, presents only an occasion of grief and tears, because of the disorders that prevail, of the continual dangers to which we are exposed, and the absence of those eternal good things, which we ought to long after.—Calmet.

BACCHUS; the name of a pagan deity, or the god of wine, whose statue was set up, in the reign of Julian the Apostate, in the great church of Emessa in Palestine, and in that of Epiphania; and the Chronicle of Alexandria relates that Eustathius, bishop of the church in that city, hearing the sound of instruments employed in the worship of Bacchus, and being told that they were played in his church, instantly expired, after having prayed that he might rather die than witness such abomination.—Henderson's Buck.

BACHUTH-ALLOH, (the oak of weeping;) probably thus denominated, because here Deborah, Rebekah's nurse; died and was buried. Gen. 35: 8. Here also Deborah the prophetess judged Israel. Judg. 4: 5.

BACK; the opposite of the face. God casts our sins behind his back when he fully forgives them, so as to place them no more in the light of his countenance to punish them. Isa. 38: 17. Ps. 90: 8. Jer. 16: 17. He shows men the back, and not the face, when he disregards them, and refuses to smile on or show favor to them. Jer. 18: 17. Christ's giving his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, imports his ready and cheerful exposure of himself to suffering for our sake. Isa. 1: 6. Men's turning their back on God, or his temple; their looking back, going back, drawing back, turning back, from him, import their contempt of him; their gradual revolt from the knowledge, love, profession, and practice of his truth. Jer. 2: 27. 32: 33. Their casting him or his laws behind their back, imports their utmost contempt and abhorrence of both. Ezek. 23: 35. Neh. 9: 26. The church has her back ploughed on, when her members are cruelly oppressed and persecuted. Ps. 129: 3. The Jews, since the crucifixion of Christ, have their back bowed down alway. The strength of their nation, their government, and great men, are gone; and they are laden and grievously oppressed with slavery, oppression, and sorrow. Ps. 69: 23. Rom: 11: 10.

BACK, or BACKWARD. In the metaphorical language, to go, or turn back or backward, denotes wilful rebellion, and active apostasy from God. Isa. 1: 4. Jer. 7: 24. and 15: 6. To be driven, turn, or fall backwards, imports disappointment, and sudden, unexpected, and fearful destruction. Ps. 40: 14. and 70: 2. Isa. 28: 13. and 44: 25. To turn judgment backwards, is violently to pervert good laws and their sanctions, in order to promote and maintain wickedness. Isa. 59: 14.

BACKBITE; to speak evil of an absent person. Paul classes this sin with several others of a heinous nature. Rom. 1: 30. (See DETRACTION, and SLANDER.)—Calmet.

BACKSLIDING; the act of turning from the path of duty. It may be considered as partial, when applied to true believers, who do not backslide with the whole bent of their will; as voluntary, when applied to those who, after professing to know the truth, wilfully turn from it, and live in the practice of sin; as final, when the mind is given up to judicial hardness, as in the case of Judas. Partial backsliding must be distinguished from hypocrisy, as the former may exist where there are gracious intentions on the whole; but the latter is a studied profession of appearing to be what we are not.

The causes of backsliding are—the cares of the world; improper connections; inattention to secret or closet duties; self-conceit and dependence; indulgence; listening to and parleying with temptations. A backsliding state is manifested by indifference to prayer and self-examination; trifling or unprofitable conversation; neglect of public ordinances; shunning the people of God; associating with the world; thinking lightly of sin; neglect of the Bible; and often by gross immorality. The consequences of this awful state are—loss of character; loss of comfort; loss of usefulness; and, as long as any remain in this state, a loss of a well-grounded hope of future happiness. To avoid this state, or recover from it, we should beware of the first appearance of sin; be much in prayer; attend the ordinances; and unite with the people of God. We should consider the awful instances of apostasy, as Saul, Judas, Demas, &c.; the many warnings we have of it; (Matt. 24: 13. Heb. 10: 38. Luke 9: 62.) how it grieves the Holy Spirit; and how wretched it makes us; above all things, our dependence should be on God, that we may always be directed by his Spirit, and kept by his power. (See APOSTASY.)—Henderson's Buck.

BACKUS, (ISAAC, A. M.) a distinguished Baptist minister of Massachusetts, was born at Norwich in Connecticut, in 1724. In 1741, a year memorable for the revival of religion through this country, his attention was first arrested by the concerns of another world, and he was brought, as he believed, to the knowledge of the truth, as it is in Jesus. In 1746, he commenced preaching the gospel; and, April 13, 1748, he was ordained first minister of a congregational church in Titicut precinct, in the town of Middleborough, Massachusetts.

In 1749, a number of the members of Mr. Backus's church altered their sentiments with regard to baptism, and he at length united with them in opinion. He was baptized by immersion in August, 1751. For some years afterwards, he held communion with those who were baptized in infancy; but he afterwards discontinued this from conviction of its impropriety. A Baptist church was formed, January 16, 1756, and he was installed its pastor, June 23d of the same year, by ministers from Boston and Rehoboth. In this relation he continued through the remainder of his life. He died November 20, 1806, aged eighty-two years. He had been enabled to preach nearly sixty years, until the spring before his death, when he experienced a paralytic stroke, which deprived him of speech, and of the use of his limbs.

Mr. Backus was a plain, evangelical preacher, without any pretensions to eloquence. It may be ascribed to his natural diffidence that, when preaching or conversing on important subjects, he was in the habit of shutting his eyes. To his exertions the Baptist churches in America owe not a little of their present flourishing condition. He was ever a zealous friend to the equal rights of Christians. When the Congress met at Philadelphia in 1774, he was sent as an agent from the Baptist churches of the Warren association, to support their claims to the same equal liberties, which ought to be given to every denomination. In October, he had a conference with the Massachusetts delegation and others, at which he contended only for the same privileges which were given to the churches in Boston; and he received the promise, that the rights of the Baptists should be regarded. On his return, as a report had preceded him, that he had been attempting to break up the union of the colonies, he addressed himself to the convention of Massachusetts, December 9, and a vote was passed, declaring his conduct to have been correct. When the convention in 1779 took into consideration the constitution of the state, the subject of the extent of the civil power in regard to religion naturally presented itself, and in the course of debate the perfect correctness of the Baptist memorial, which was read at Philadelphia, was called in question. In consequence of which, Mr. Backus published in the Chronicle of December 2d, a narrative of his proceedings as Baptist agent, and brought arguments against an article in the bill of rights of the constitution of Massachusetts. He believed, that the civil authority had no right to require men to support a teacher of piety, morality, and religion, or to attend public worship; that the Church ought to have no connection with the State; that the kingdom of the Lord Jesus was not of this world, and was not dependent on the kingdoms of this world; and that the subject of religion should be left entirely to the consciences of men.

The publications of Mr. Backus were more numerous than those of any other Baptist writer in America. Of his three volumes of the History of the Baptists, he published an abridgement, brought down to 1804. It contains many facts, for which the public is indebted to the patient industry of the writer, and it must be a very valuable work to Baptists, as it presents a minute account of almost every church of that denomination in New England. But these facts are combined without much attention to the connection, and Benedict's more recent History of the Baptists has in a great measure taken its place.—Mass. Bapt. Miss. Mag. i. 287, 288; Backus's Church Hist. iii. 139—141; Backus's Abridg. 209, 214; Benedict, ii. 267—274; Allen.

BACKUS, (CHARLES, D. D.,) an eminent minister, was born in Norwich, Connecticut, in 1749. He lost his parents in his childhood, but, as he early discovered a love of science, his friends assisted him to a liberal education. He was graduated at Yale college in 1769. His theological education was directed by Dr. Hart of Preston. In 1774, he was ordained to the pastoral charge of the church in Somers, in which town he remained till his death, December 30, 1803, after a faithful ministry of more than twenty-nine years. In the last year of his residence at college, the mind of Dr. Backus was impressed by divine truth, and although his conduct had not been immoral, he was deeply convinced of his sinfulness in the sight of God. He was for a time opposed to the doctrines of the gospel, particularly to the doctrine of the atonement, and of the dependence of man upon the special influences of the Holy Spirit to renew his heart. But at last his pride was humbled, and he was brought to an acquaintance with the way of salvation by a crucified Redeemer. From this time he indulged the hope, that he was reconciled unto God. An humble and an exemplary Christian, under the afflictions of life he quietly submitted to the will of his Father in heaven. He was a plain, evangelical, impressive preacher. Knowing the worth of immortal souls, he taught with the greatest clearness the way of salvation through faith in the Redeemer, and enforced upon his hearers that holiness, without which no man can see the Lord. During his ministry, there were four seasons of peculiar attention to religion among his people. Dr. Backus was eminent as a theologian. His retired situation and his eminence as an instructor, drew around him many who were designed for the Christian ministry. Nearly fifty young men were members of his theological school. In his last sickness he had much of the divine presence. The last words which he was heard to whisper, were "glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to towards men."

He published the following sermons; at the ordination of Freegrace Reynolds, 1795; of Tim. M. Cooley and Joseph Russell, 1796; of Thomas Snell, 1798; five discourses on the Truth of the Bible, 1797; a century sermon, 1801; a volume on Regeneration.—Conn. Mag. iv.; Allen's Biog. Dict.

BACKUS, (AZEL, D. D.), president of Hamilton college, state of New York, was the son of Jabez Backus of Norwich, Conn. His father bequeathed to him a farm in Franklin, which, he says, "I wisely exchanged for an education in college." He was graduated at Yale in 1787. While in college he was a deist; but his uncle and friend, Rev. Charles Backus of Somers, won him from infidelity through the divine blessing, and reared him up for the ministry. From the time that he believed the gospel, he gloried in the cross. In early life he was ordained as the successor of Dr. Bellamy at Bethlehem, where he not only labored faithfully in the ministry, but also instituted and conducted a school of considerable celebrity. After the establishment of Hamilton college, near Utica, he was chosen the first president. He died of the typhus fever, December 28, 1816, aged fifty-one, and was succeeded by president Davis of Middlebury college. He was a man of an original cast of thought, distinguished by susceptibility and ardor of feeling, and by vigorous and active piety. Of his benevolence and goodness no one could doubt. In his sermons, though familiar and not, perhaps, sufficiently correct and elevated in style, he was earnest, affectionate, and faithful. He published a sermon on the death of governor Wolcott, 1797; at the election, 1798; at the ordination of John Frost, Whitesborough, 1813.—Allen's Biog. Dict.; Relig. Intel. i. 527, 592; Panopt. 13: 43.

BACON, (ROGER,) a learned monk of the Franciscan order, was descended of an ancient family, and born near Ilchester, in Somersetshire, in the year 1214. He received the first tincture of learning at Oxford, from whence he proceeded to the university of Paris, at that time much frequented by the English. Having been admitted to the degree of doctor, he returned to England, and took the habit of the Franciscan order in 1240, when he was about twenty-six years of age. He was now regarded as a most able and indefatigable inquirer after knowledge by the greatest men of the age; and a fund was raised for the purpose of defraying the expenses of advancing science by experiments, the method which Bacon had determined to follow. His discoveries were little understood, by the generality of his contemporaries; and because, by the help of mathematical knowledge, he performed things above the comprehension of the vulgar, he was suspected of magic. He was particularly persecuted by his own fraternity, so that they would not receive his books into their library, and eventually got him imprisoned; so that, as he confesses himself, he had reason enough to repent of his having taken such pains with the arts and sciences! At the particular desire of pope Clement IV., Bacon collected together, and enlarged his several treatises, and sent them to him in 1267. This collection, which is the same that the author himself entitled "Opus Majus," or his Great Work, is still extant. It has been affirmed, and not without reason, that though his application to the occult sciences was the pretended, yet the true cause of the ill usage which Bacon experienced, was the freedom with which he treated the clergy of his day, in his writings, wherein he spared neither their ignorance nor their want of morals. He went so far as to reprove pope Innocent IV. by letter, and is said to have made no scruple of declaring to those with whom he was intimate, that, in his judgment, the pope was Antichrist. Dr. Jebb, the learned editor of Bacon's works, tells us, that he appears to have proposed to himself two things, either by laying down a good scheme of philosophy to excite the pope to reform the errors that had crept into the church; or, if he could not effect this, to propose such expedients as would break the power of Antichrist, and retard his progress; for he appears to have been firmly persuaded that the church would ere long be reformed, either by the pope himself, or because the exorbitant dominion of Antichrist would become obnoxious to mankind, and so fall to destruction.

When Bacon had been ten years in prison, a new pope had been elected to the pontificate, and he resolved to apply to him for his discharge. With a view to convince his holiness of both the innocence and usefulness of his studies, he addressed to him a treatise, "On the Means of avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age," written in Latin. This book has been translated into English, by Dr. Richard Prowne, who esteemed it one of the best performances that ever was written. What effect it had upon the pope does not appear: but towards the latter end of his reign, Bacon, by the interposition of some noblemen, obtained his release, and returned to Oxford, where he spent the remainder of his days in peace, and died in the college of his order, on the 11th of June, 1294. His last work was a Compendium of Theology. "He was," says Dr. Shaw, "beyond all comparison the greatest man of his time, and might, perhaps, stand in competition with the greatest that have appeared since. It is wonderful, considering the ignorance of the age in which he lived, how he came by such a depth of knowledge on all subjects. His writings are composed with that elegance, conciseness, and strength, and adorned with such just and exquisite observations on nature, that, among all the chemists, we do not know his equal." Dr. Freind ascribes the honor of introducing chemistry into Europe to Bacon, who, he observes, speaks, in some part or other of his works, of almost every operation now used in chemistry. "He was the miracle," says Freind, "of the age he lived in; and the greatest genius, perhaps, for mechanical knowledge, that ever appeared in the world since Archimedes. He appears, likewise, to have been master of the whole science of optics." The telescope was not unknown to him. His skill in astronomy was amazing: he discovered that error which occasioned the reformation of the calendar, and which has been regarded as one of the greatest efforts of human industry. Even in moral philosophy he left excellent precepts, and is entitled to the remembrance of posterity as a great philosopher, an admirable linguist, a sound theologian, a wonderful man, and a sincere Christian.—*Jones's Chris. BACON, (SIR FRANCIS,) Lord Vernham, Viscount of St. Albans, the eminent statesman and illustrious philosopher, was the son of Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper of the great seal. He was born at York house, in the Strand, on the 22d of January, 1561. At an early age, he gave promise of those talents which distinguished him in his more mature years, so that he attracted the notice of queen Elizabeth, who familiarly called him her young lord keeper. He entered Trinity college when he was in his twelfth year, where he studied under Dr. Whitgift, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, and by the time he was sixteen years old, he had made great proficiency in the learning of those times; so that he already began to project those improvements in science, which paved the way for its complete reformation from the Aristotelian subtleties, which had so long obscured it. About this period, he accompanied Sir Amias Pawlet on his embassy to France, and so great an opinion was entertained of his discretion and ability, that he was entrusted with a commission to the queen, of which he acquitted himself with great credit. Here at the age of nineteen, he wrote a work entitled, Of the State of Europe, in which he gave the most astonishing proofs of the early maturity of his judgment. Soon after his father's death, in consequence of the strictness of his circumstances, he betook himself to the study of the common law; it was, however, impossible that a genius that could range through the whole circle of the sciences, should confine itself to so dry a study. In his moments of leisure, therefore, we find him taking a view of the state of learning, and devising means for supplying the defects, and correcting the errors he had detected. A treatise which he published about this period, entitled, "The greatest Birth of Time," but which is now lost, appears to have exhibited the ground-work of that splendid design, which was afterwards disclosed more fully in his "Grand Instauration of the Sciences." In the year 1592, we find him engaged in defending the queen and the government against the libellous attacks of the famous father Parsons. Being chosen a member of parliament for Middlesex, in 1403 he frequently distinguished himself by the eloquence of his speeches, and though he generally appeared on the side of the court, he was regarded as not unfriendly to the interests of the people. He had frequent access to the queen, who sometimes advised with him on state affairs; but his opposition to the payment of three subsidies in the course of less than six years, gave such offence to Elizabeth, that he was for some time forbidden her presence, and all the influence of the earl of Essex, who was his warm friend, could not reinstate him in her favor. The patronage of this nobleman seems indeed to have raised a prejudice against him in the family of lord Burleigh, his relative, to whom, on several occasions, he applied for some office in the state; he did, however, procure for him, notwithstanding the greatest opposition, the reversion of the situation of register to the star chamber, worth sixteen hundred pounds a year; but he did not come into the possession of it for nearly twenty years afterwards, nor did he obtain any other preferment during the whole of this reign, though his extensive learning and eloquence excited the admiration of those in power. His patron, the earl of Essex, however, still endeavored to serve him, and warmly urged his being appointed attorney-general, against all the remonstrances of Bacon's cousin, Sir Robert Cecil. The earl frequently took his advice on business of importance; but in the reverse of his fortunes that advice, however salutary, did not always please him, and a shyness ensued; yet though there is some reason to suppose that Bacon privately endeavored to serve the earl in his troubles, his public appearance against him on his trial has justly exposed him to the censure of posterity. On the death of the queen, Mr. Bacon lost no time in paying his court to the new sovereign, who, on the twenty-third of July, 1603, bestowed on him the honor of knighthood; and in the month of August, the following year, he was made one of his majesty's council, with a fee of forty pounds per annum, to which was added, by another patent, a pension of sixty pounds, for the special services of his brother Anthony and himself. In 1605, he published a work on "The Proficiency and Advancement of Learning," first in English, and afterwards in Latin, which gained him much celebrity, and drew upon him the notice of the king, to whom he dedicated it. His cousin, Sir Robert, now earl of Salisbury, having obtained the confidence of James, so as to feel himself beyond all fear of a rival, began to show him some favor; but Sir Francis found a powerful opponent in the renowned Sir Edward Coke, who had recently been made attorney-general. There appears to have been a mutual jealousy between these two great men, Coke envying Bacon for the extent of his learning, and Bacon emulating Coke for his profound knowledge in the law. In 1607, Sir Francis was appointed solicitor-general, after which his practice increased so much, that he was retained in almost all great causes; he argued on the subject of the union between England and Scotland before the house of commons; he was employed by that house to represent to the king the grievances of the nation, in which he excited the applauses of both parties, and afterwards rendered important services in a conference with the lords on the question of abolishing the ancient tenures, and granting a sufficient revenue instead of them, in which he carried the point by setting the business in so clear a light as convinced all his hearers. In 1610, appeared his book "On the Wisdom of the Ancients," in which, launching out into a new track, he endeavors to develop the physical, moral, and political meanings conched under the fables of antiquity; and, however doubtful some of his hypotheses may appear, we cannot but admire the profundity and variety of his knowledge. In 1611, he was made a judge of the marshal's court, and two years after, he succeeded Sir Henry Hobart, as attorney-general; when, it having been objected that this office was incompatible with a seat in the house of commons, that house, from particular regard for him, overruled the objection, and allowed him to take his seat as usual. While in this office, he exerted himself much to put a stop to the pernicious practice of duelling, and his eloquent and learned charge on this subject, in the star chamber, so pleased the lords of the council, who were present, that they ordered it to be printed and published, with the decree of the court. Sir Francis Bacon's circumstances were now in a more prosperous situation than they had ever been; his practice was extensive and profitable, he had taken possession of his registership already mentioned, and became possessed of several good estates by the death of his brother, Mr. Anthony Bacon. But his generosity, which often bordered on profusion, prevented him from amassing a fortune. When Sir George Villiers came into favor with king James, Sir Francis endeavored to obtain his good will, and the favorite, conscious of his own inexperience, frequently advised with him on public affairs. A letter still extant shows such superiority of judgment, and so great a freedom of manner, as reflects the highest credit on his head and his heart. He was now rising rapidly, and about this time was sworn a member of his majesty's privy council, a promotion altogether unusual for a man in his station; it is, however, much to be regretted, that he sometimes exhibited too much severity in flattering the king and the court. On the 7th of March, 1617, the aged chancellor Egerton having voluntarily resigned the seals, Sir Francis Bacon succeeded him, with the title of lord keeper, and soon after, the king going on a progress to Scotland, he was entrusted with the conduct of public affairs in his absence, and presided at the council. In the beginning of 1619, he was made lord high chancellor of England, had the title of baron Verulam conferred upon him, and shortly after, the dignity of viscount St. Albans. This accumulation of honors added little to the fame of so great a man; but they tended to excite much jealousy, and probably contributed to his subsequent misfortunes.

Amidst the multiplicity and variety of engagements, in which his high station involved him, he still found time for his favorite study of philosophy. In 1620, he published his most finished performance, under the title of Novum Organum Scientiarum, which formed the sequel to his grand Instauration of the Sciences. In this work he illustrates the true mode of interpreting nature by sound inductions, far remote from those puerile sophistries which had so long disgraced the schools. He dedicated it to the king, who favorably received it, and wrote him a letter of approval with his own hand. It was highly appreciated by the learned men of his time, who regarded it as a standard of true philosophical inquiry, and later times have not been unjust to his memory, in styling him "The Father of the inductive Philosophy."

While, however, he was thus acquiring the greatest credit as a philosopher, a storm was rising, which soon overwhelmed him with dishonor. Being of an easy temper, and naturally generous and profuse in his domestic economy, his household had been guilty of great impositions, at which he had inconsiderately connived; so that in March, 1621, he was accused by the house of commons of having taken bribes, in causes that had come before him as chancellor. At first, he attempted to defend himself from the charges, but more accusations being brought against him, he was impeached before the lords, on which he threw himself on the mercy of his judges, and received sentence to pay a fine of fifty thousand pounds, to be imprisoned in the tower during the king's pleasure, to be incapable of holding any place of trust in the state, and never to sit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court. He was soon released from his confinement, and obtained access to his majesty, who granted him several favors, and at last remitted the whole sentence; but he never recovered himself from this disgrace.

Being now freed from the hurry of public business, lord Bacon found full leisure for more pleasing and congenial studies, and he frequently lamented that he had been so long diverted from them by the pursuits of ambition and false glory. During the five years which intervened between his misfortunes and his death, he published a number of interesting and important works, in addition to the revision and arrangement of several of his former treatises, and we cannot too much admire the compass of mind that, under so many discouragements, could accomplish, in so short a period, what would have constituted, in ordinary men, the labor of a long life. At this time he wrote his "History of Henry VII," "Essays; or, Counsels Civil and Moral," and the "Third, Fourth, and Fifth Parts of the Grand Instauration of the Sciences," by which last work in particular he enlarged the boundaries of science beyond all who had gone before him, as both individuals and learned societies of all the most civilized nations of Europe have freely acknowledged.

And as his philosophy dealt not in metaphysical subtleties, but in the sober results of experimental deduction; there was little tendency in his mind to doubt or oppose the great truths of religion. From many parts of his writings, he appears to have been a firm believer, and experimentally acquainted with the power of these sacred principles; and his retirement seems to have been much spent in this study, and his strongest consolations in adversity to have been drawn from this divine source. His sentiments on these subjects appear to have been what is called moderate Calvinism, that is to say, while he firmly believed the doctrine of the divine decrees, and their influence on the future character of the elect, he maintained the absolute accountableness of man, the full and free invitations of the gospel, and the infinite value of the death of Christ to save all; though, through unbelief, many fall short of the blessing. This will be better illustrated by a short quotation from his confession of faith: "I believe that the sufferings of Christ, as they are sufficient to take away the sins of the whole world, so they are only effectual to those who are regenerate by the Holy Ghost, who breatheth where he will of his free grace, which grace, as the seed incorruptible quickeneth the spirit of man, and conceiveth him anew a son of God, and a member of Christ."

In these pursuits he spent the years of his retirement, gradually becoming more infirm, but frequently exerting his faculties with an application beyond his strength; till he at last fell a sacrifice to his zeal, in making some experiments with regard to the preservation of bodies. He was suddenly affected in his head and stomach, so that, not being able to reach his home, he was obliged to retire to the house of the earl of Arundel, at Highgate, where he sickened of a fever and delirium on his breast; and, after a week's illness, expired in the sixty-sixth year of his age, on the ninth of April, 1626. He was buried privately at St. Albans; and his tomb remained for some time undistinguished, until Sir Thomas Meantys, who had formerly been his servant, raised a monument to his memory. Thus died lord Bacon, of whom it is little to say, that he was one of the greatest philosophers of modern times. To him belongs the praise of striking out a new path to science, and rescuing it from that load of metaphysical jargon which had overwhelmed and nearly extinguished it. Goethe says, "He drew a sponge over the table of human knowledge." His contemporaries could not fully appreciate the extent of his genius, and the value of his labors. Sensible of this himself, he says in his will, "My name and memory I bequeath to foreign nations and to my own countrymen, after some time be passed over!" With regard to physics, if he learned of our times have made more brilliant discoveries, few will deny that it was Bacon who led the way to those discoveries, and laid the foundation of the sciences in the most solid and decisive experiments.

In his person, lord Bacon was about the middle stature, with a broad and open front, a lively and piercing eye, and pleasing and venerable in his appearance, so as insensibly to excite the esteem of all who saw him. He was an eloquent and convincing speaker, an eminent lawyer, and a great statesman; and though the latter part of his public career was sullied by charges highly dishonorable to the exalted station that he filled as a judge, it has been shown that these arose rather out of his too easy temper with the underlings of his office, than by any desire to participate in their exactions; it is also worthy of remark, that, notwithstanding he fell under this grievous charge, not one of the many decisions which he passed (and he is said to have made no less than two thousand orders and decrees in a year) was ever reversed as unjust. At the age of forty, lord Bacon was married to a daughter of Mr. Barnham, an alderman of the city of London, with whom he received a good fortune, and she outlived him upwards of twenty years. He had no children. It is remarked of him, that he was so sensibly affected at every eclipse of the moon, whether he observed it or not, that he was seized with a fainting fit, from which he did not recover till the eclipse was over; but it left no remaining weakness. His diet was rather plentiful, and in the latter part of his life he preferred the stronger and more nourishing meats, as most conducive to the strength of the constitution. He made frequent use of nitre, the virtues of which he has much extolled in his writings, taking about three grains of it in some warm broth, every morning, for nearly thirty years.

His works, which are numerous, were first collected together and published in London in four volumes, folio, in 1740; and Dr. Birch afterwards edited a correct and valuable edition of them, in 1765, consisting of five volumes, quarto. Of late years, they have repeatedly been reprinted in ten volumes, octavo.—Jones's Chris. Biog; Ency. Amer.

BACON, (JOHN,) the celebrated English sculptor, was born in Southwark, in Surry, November 24, 1740. His father, Thomas Bacon, was a cloth-worker. At an early age, he removed with his father to London, and worked with him for the maintenance of the family. Even while a boy, his aspiring and philosophic genius was working in him so strongly, that he left his old trade, and, at the age of fourteen, apprenticed himself to one Crispe, a maker of porcelain, who taught him the art of modelling. All his early experiments in the severe school of sculpture, were privately made, during his hours of remission from labor. The first of his works which caught the public attention, was a colossal head of Ossian. He entered the royal academy in 1768 as a student, and in 1769 received the first gold medal, for sculpture, ever given by the royal academy. The society of arts, to whom he presented his Mars and Venus, became the personal friends of the artist. The king also became his patron. From this time his employment, skill, reputation, and fortune went on in a steady career of improvement till his death, in 1799, at the age of fifty-nine years.

Bacon was an enlightened and decided Christian. His genius and fame were softened by humility, and consecrated to high and useful ends. It was his constant study to embody in all his works some religious sentiment or judicious moral. The school in which he was educated, namely the pottery and artificial stone manufactory, had made him acquainted with public feeling, and he addressed it. "He infused more English good sense into his sculpture," says Mr. Cunningham, "than any preceding artist. In all that he did, there was a plain meaning, a sentiment which lay on the surface; which ignorance had not to call on learning to explain, and which could be felt without any reference to the antique. In sixteen competitions with rival artists, it was his boast that he was fifteen times successful." His monument to lord Chatham, and his statues of judge Blackstone, and of lords Rodney and Cornwallis are splendid efforts; but his statues of Johnson and Howard are superior still, and "rival all similar works save the sublime Newton, of Roubillac. They stand, one on the right, and the other on the left, of the entrance to the choir of St. Paul's; and the severe dignity of the philosopher with his scroll, and the philanthropist with his prison key, countenance the mistake of a distinguished foreigner, who paid his respects to them as St. Peter and St. Paul."

Bacon's merits have been widely acknowledged. But a plain tablet over his grave has the following inscription, written by himself: "WHAT I WAS AS AN ARTIST, SEEMED TO ME OF SOME IMPORTANCE WHILE I LIVED; BUT WHAT I REALLY WAS AS A BELIEVER IN CHRIST JESUS, IS THE ONLY THING OF IMPORTANCE TO ME NOW."—Memoirs, by Rev. Richard Cecil; Lives of Eminent Painters and Sculptors, by Allan Cunningham, Esq.

BACON, (MISS ANN,) daughter of the celebrated sculptor, John Bacon, Esq. distinguished alike for his learning and piety, and of a mother, who exhibited all that was lovely in the Christian character, was born on the 10th of May, 1768. Miss Bacon received from her mother her earliest instructions, and was taught by that excellent woman to seek for her happiness in the paths of virtue and the ways of religion. At the age of thirteen, death deprived her of her parent, and she was then consigned to the care of a lady of eminent piety, who kept a boarding-school, and who endeavored to improve this mournful event to the spiritual advantage of her pupil. During her continuance at school, she sedulously employed her time in the cultivation of her mind, and became as distinguished for her knowledge as she was celebrated for her piety. At the age of twenty-three, her mind became enlightened to discern, and her heart to feel its own sinfulness; and after much inward conflict, searching of the Scriptures, and prayer to God, she was brought to rest in Christ, as the anchor of her hope. On her return home, she communicated to her father the state of her feelings; and from his conversation and advice, derived great encouragement and assistance.

Whilst to the concerns of religion she paid particular attention, she was not indifferent to the attainment of general literature. Her diary presented an exact portrait of her lovely and pious heart. She corresponded with persons of great learning and excellence, and her letters were very superior, both in matter and composition. To the study of the holy Scriptures she devoted much attention and time. About four years previous to her death, she had an attack of the pleurisy, which was only introductory to the consummation of that ill health, with which she had been visited for several years, and which terminated in a decline. During her long and subsequent illness, in which she suffered greatly from the disorder, she never exhibited any indications of impatience, but with gratitude received the attentions of her friends, and with cheerfulness submitted to the determination of Providence. Though greatly reduced by continued pain, she felt little apprehension at the approach of death; but looking at her wasted and almost fleshless arms, she said:—"The sight of these withered limbs affords me solid pleasure; for as I discern the outward man decay, so, through the mercy of my Redeemer, I believe the inward man is renewing day by day." And at night, when first laid in bed, she frequently said,—“Blessed be God, I have another day less! I am another day nearer my journey's end.”

Miss Bacon was never married, though she lived to the age of forty-one; and for visits of mercy and deeds of benevolence, she had therefore much time which she could so devote, and which she did not fail thus usefully to apply. At length, after a life of piety, benevolence, and intellectual application, she expired the 24th of December, 1809, with a sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

BACON, (SAMUEL,) agent of the American government for establishing a colony in Africa, was an episcopal clergyman. He proceeded in the Elizabeth to Sierra Leone, with eighty-two colored people, accompanied by Mr. Bankson, also agent, and Dr. Croser; and arrived March 9, 1820. The Augusta schooner was purchased, and the people and stores were transhipped, and carried to Campellar in Sherbro river, March 20th. Dr. Croser and Mr. Bankson died in a few weeks, and Mr. Bacon being taken ill on the 17th of April, proceeded to Kent, at cape Shilling, but died two days after his arrival, on the third of May. Many others died. The circular of the Colonization society, signed by E. B. Caldwell, October 26, describes this disastrous expedition.—Allen; Memoirs by Ashmun.

BADCOCK, (SAMUEL,) was the son of a respectable butcher at South Molton, in Devonshire, where he was born, February 23, 1747. His family and connections were dissenters, and he was himself designed by them for the ministerial function among the Nonconformists. The compiler of Mr. Badcock's Memoir, in the General Biographical Dictionary, 1798, is pleased to tell us, that “from habitual intercourse with some of the students at Mr. Pooker's academy, he contracted some of those tenets which compose the gloomy fanaticism of the Methodists;” and immediately proceeds to instance the topics of free-grace, election, justification by imputed righteousness, final perseverance, &c., as though these were the doctrines contended for by the fanatical Methodists; whereas they are all, without exception, fundamental articles of the church of England, and stillly opposed by the Wesleyan Methodists! How long Mr. B. continued at this academy we know not; but on leaving it, he accepted a call to be pastor to a dissenting congregation at Winbourne, in Dorsetshire, where he was ordained, but did not continue long with them, the salary being inadequate to his support. From Winbourne he was invited to Barnstaple, in Devonshire, which was a much more eligible place for him, as the income was adequate to his wants, and the distance but a few miles from his native town. He accordingly removed thither in 1769, and continued there nine or ten years.

It would appear that, during Mr. Badcock's residence at Barnstaple, he became somewhat latitudinarian in his creed; and this is resolved into his falling in with the writings of Dr. Priestley, to whom he paid a visit at Calne, in Wiltshire, and established an intimacy and correspondence with the doctor. About the year 1780, he engaged as a writer in the Monthly Review, which was then one of the most popular literary journals of the day; and the talents which Mr. Badcock displayed in his department, during the few years that he continued to write for it, tended greatly to raise its fame and establish its reputation. On the publication of Dr. Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity, Mr. Badcock undertook the reply to that part which was the most labored and important of the whole, viz. the “History of Early Opinions concerning Jesus Christ;” it appeared in the Monthly Review for June, 1783. His critique extended to thirty-three pages in the whole, and was afterwards reprinted; but no one, except Dr. Priestley, wished it shorter. It discovered not merely acuteness, but an uncommon extent of reading in the primitive fathers, and ecclesiastical history in general. The doctor felt this attack so severely, and more especially as proceeding from a quarter so unexpected as the Monthly Review, that, with his usual celerity, in less than a month he brought out a reply to the animadversions, though the reviewer had then discharged himself of only half his task. At the moment of publishing his reply, Dr. Priestley was ignorant who his antagonist was; and, therefore, unbiassed by prejudice or resentment, he bestowed this eulogium on him: “The knowledge and ability of the present reviewer make him a much more formidable, and, therefore, a more respectable antagonist.” The late Dr. Johnson, speaking of Mr. Badcock's review, at an interview which he had with him a little before his death, said, “You have proved him as deficient in probitas as he is in learning: he borrowed from those who had been borrowers themselves, and did not know that the mistakes he adopted had been answered by others.”

He was for several years troubled with dreadful head aches, and so violent were they at times, that they threw him into a state of delirium. This made him frequently express his apprehension of some time or other losing his reason: an event which he justly considered as far more to be dreaded than death itself. In 1787, he lost his mother, a very excellent woman and most affectionate parent. His behavior to her was an example of filial piety, and his grief at her death exquisitely tender. At the Lent assizes, 1788, he preached in the cathedral of Exeter, having previously taken orders; and his sermon before the judges was greatly admired by those who heard it. On the 19th of May following, he died of a bilious complaint, at the house of his affectionate friend, Sir John Chichester, Bart. in Queen street, May Fair, London. In his person, Mr. Badcock was short, but well made, active, lively, and agreeable. His eye was peculiarly vivacious, and his whole countenance indicated strong intellectual powers, far above the general run of mankind, and a disposition replete with sensibility, tenderness, and generosity. As a pulpit orator he was much admired. Though all his writings discover the hand of a master, and exhibit abundant traces of laborious research and profound learning, it may be questioned if, in any of them, he has done more essential service to the cause of Christianity, than by his masterly statement of the evidence of its truth, arising from miracles and prophecy, in the Pampton lectures.—Jones's Chris. Biog.; Davenport; Ency. Amer.

BAG; a sack, pouch, or purse. The money collected in the treasuries of eastern princes was reckoned up in certain equal sums, put into bags, and sealed. God is said to seal and sew up men's iniquity in a bag; a striking image, to denote that he remembers every act and circumstance thereof, in order to charge it on them, and punish them for it, at a future time. Job 14: 17. Riches blasted by the curse of God, are styled wages put into a bag with holes; that is, they profit not the owner, but are secretly and unexpectedly consumed. Hag. 1: 6. On the contrary, treasures of spiritual good, blessings promised in the heavens, to such as liberally expend their property, in doing good on Christian principles, are said to be deposited in bags, or purses, that wax not old. Luke 12: 33. Of course, these riches of the soul are permanent, and can neither be tarnished, scattered, or lost. How few comparatively provide, according to the precept of the Savior, these safe and indestructible depositories for their wealth, beyond the grave!

BAHURIM, a town of Benjamin, (2 Sam. 3: 16. 17: 5. 16: 18.) probably built by the young men who escaped the destruction of their tribe. It is thought to have been also named Almon, (Josh. 21: 15.) and Alemath. 1 Chron. 6: 60.

BAILEY, (JOHN,) an excellent minister in Boston, was born in Lancashire, England. From his earliest years, his mind seems to have been impressed by the truths of religion. While he was yet very young, his mother one day persuaded him to lead the devotions of the family. When his father, who was a very dissolute man, heard of it, his heart was touched with a sense of his sin in the neglect of this duty, and he became afterwards an eminent Christian. After having been carefully instructed in classical learning, he commenced preaching the gospel, about the age of twenty-two. He soon went to Ireland, where, by frequent labors, he much injured his health, which was never perfectly restored. He spent about fourteen years of his life at Limerick, and was exceedingly blessed in his exertions to turn men from darkness to light. While at Limerick, a deanery was offered him, if he would conform, with the promise of a bishopric upon the first vacancy. But disdaining worldly things, when they came in competition with duty to his Savior and the purity of divine worship, he rejected the offer in true disinterestedness and elevation of spirit. But neither this proof, that he was intent on higher objects than this world presents, nor the blamelessness of his life, nor the strong hold which he had in the affections of his acquaintance, could preserve him from again suffering the hardships of imprisonment, while the papists in the neighborhood enjoyed liberty and countenance. When he was before the judges, he said to them, "if I had been drinking, and gaming, and carousing at a tavern with my company, my lords, I presume that would not have procured my being thus treated as an offender. Must praying to God, and preaching of Christ with a company of Christians, who are peaceable and inoffensive, and as serviceable to his majesty and the government as any of his subjects; must this be a greater crime?" The recorder answered, "We will have you to know it is a greater crime." His flock often fasted and prayed for his release; and he was discharged on this condition only, that he should depart from the country within a limited time.

He came to New England in 1684, and was ordained the minister of Watertown, October 6, 1686, with his brother, Thomas Bailey, as his assistant; he removed to Boston in 1692, and became assistant minister of the first church, July 17, 1693, succeeding Mr. Moody. Here he continued till his death, December 12, 1697, aged fifty-three. He was a man eminent for piety, of great sensibility of conscience, and very exemplary in his life.

In his last sickness, he suffered under a complication of disorders; but he did not complain. His mind was soothed in dwelling upon the sufferings of his Savior. At times he was agitated with fears, though they had not respect, as he said, so much to the end, as to what he might meet in the way. His last words were, speaking of Christ, "O, what shall I say? He is altogether lovely. His glorious angels are come for me!" He then closed his eyes, and his spirit passed into eternity. He published an address to the people of Limerick; and Man's Chief End to glorify God, a sermon preached at Watertown, 1689.—Midleton's Biog. Eccl. iv. 101—105; Nonconform. Memorial, i. 331—335; Mather's Fun. Ser.; and Magnalia, iii. 224—238; Elat; Farmer; Allen's Am. Biog.

BAJITH; a town of Moab. Isa. 15: 2.

BAKE. In the earliest times, the oriental nations appear to have baked their bread with great simplicity on a clean part of the hearth, or in a pan of iron. Gen. 18: 6. Lev. 2: 4—7. Afterwards, other inventions were employed. It is said the Arabs are accustomed to make a fire in a large stone pitcher, and when it is sufficiently heated, apply the soft paste or dough to the outside. As it is usually very thin, the heat of the pitcher bakes it almost in an instant. Dried dung is frequently used inside, as fuel; a practice which explains a very singular passage, Ezek. 4: 9—17. Such a custom is still found also in Barbary.—Ten women baking the bread of a nation in one oven, imports great scarcity of provisions. Lev. 26: 26. The baker sleeping all the night, indicates the singular inattention of the Jewish rulers to the dangers arising from the inflamed state of the public mind, which menaced the destruction of the state. Hos. 7: 6.

BALA, otherwise Zohar, or Zoar, one of the five cities of the plain; said to be called Bala, that is, swallowed up, because when Lot quitted it, the earth opened and swallowed it up.—Calmet.

BALAAAM; a prophet, or diviner, of the city Pethor, on the Euphrates; whose history may be found in Numb. 22 to 25 chapters. Also 31: 2, 7, 8. See also Mic. 6: 5. 2 Pet. 2: 15. Jude 11. Rev. 2: 14.—See also ASS OF BALAAAM. The rabbins relate many fanciful particulars of Balaam; as that at first he was one of Pharaoh's counsellors; according to others, he was the father of Jannes and Jambres, two eminent magicians; that he squinted, and was lame; and that he was the AUTHOR OF THAT PASSAGE IN NUMBERS, WHEREIN HIS HISTORY IS RELATED; and that Moses inserted it, in like manner as he inserted other writings.

It has been much questioned whether Balaam were a true prophet of the Lord, or a mere diviner, magician, or fortune-teller. Origen and others say, that all his power consisted in magic and cursing; because the devil, by whose influence he acted, can only curse and injure. Theodoret, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ambrose think he prophesied without being aware of the import of what he said; but Jerome seems to have adopted the opinion of the Hebrews, that Balaam knew the true God, and was a true prophet, though corrupted by avarice. Moses certainly says, he consulted the Lord; and calls the Lord, his God, (Numb. 22: 18.) but this might have been merely because he was of the posterity of Shem, which patriarch maintained the worship of the Lord among his descendants; so that, while the posterity of Ham fell into idolatry, and the posterity of Japhet were settled at a distance, in Europe, the Shemites maintained the worship of Jehovah, and knew his holiness and jealousy. This appears in the profligate advice which Balaam gives Balak, to seduce the Israelites to transgress against Jehovah, with the holiness of whose nature the perverted prophet seems to have been well acquainted.

There is something peculiar and worthy of notice in the account of Balaam's divinations, Numb. 24: 1. "When he saw that it pleased the Lord to bless Israel, he went not as at other times to seek for enchantments;" but began at once to speak in the name of the Lord. He went not literally, as "time upon time to meeting Nachashim." There is something peculiar here; and to be properly understood, the words must be strictly taken:—"he went not to meet"—it was not, then, to make observations—to watch attentively—to inspect, that he went: but to meet, à la rencontre. And what had he been used to meet, as implied in the phrase? Nachashim; the plural of Nachash; serpents; (as chap. 21: 6. "the fiery serpents," Nachashim.) Had he then been accustomed, when in his own country, to go to meet serpents? to draw auguries from those reptiles? The thing is not impossible; and since we know, that from almost every creature, auguries have been drawn. But it is much more probable, that Balaam pretended to greater powers, to intercourse with spiritual existences, who furnished him with supernatural intelligence; and who could and would perform extraordinary feats of destruction in consequence of his execration. The pretence has never wanted professors, in every age; and instances of it might be adduced from Balaam, and the witch of Endor, from the familiar spirits that peep and mutter, (Isaiah 8: 19.) out of the dust, (29: 4.) to Cornelius Agrippa, and the modern illuminati of Germany.—But, why employ the term serpents to express these spiritual powers? and, what was the supposed character of these Nachashim?—Again, it will be naturally inquired, whether we know of any term derived from the East which bears the double sense of serpent and spiritual existence? A spiritual existence not benevolent, not of celestial benignity, but insidious and infernal? We do. And if Balaam were repented, or if he affected, to hold intercourse with the powers of destruction, with potent spirits of the infernal regions, as his familiars, supposed to exist in, or to assume the form and properties of serpents, there is no word in Hebrew so proper to express this as Nachash, Nachashim. Nor should we overlook the insidious nature of this prophet's advice, worthy a disciple of these Nachashim! What he could not effect against Israel by force, he accomplished by fraud. Undoubtedly, this moral insinuation, this guile, is drawn from the gliding, the insinuating motion of the serpent tribe; in accord with which, is the description in the Revelation, (12: 9.) of "the great dragon, that old serpent, called the devil, and the Satan, which deceiveth the whole world;"—But an animal serpent could not deceive the whole world; though the Hindoo Sheshanagah, the destroyer, the sovereign serpent of the infernal regions, might do so: and when we read, (2 Cor. 11: 3.) that the serpent beguiled Eve, we must not attribute that to a natural serpent, to which a natural serpent is incompetent. To supply this deficiency, and to impart ability for the purpose, to a natural serpent, recourse has been had to supposition:—as, that the creature was merely the vehicle by which a tempting spirit acted; so Milton:

. . . . . in his mouth
The devil enter'd, and his brutal sense,
In heart or head, possessing, soon inspir'd
With act intellectual;—

. . . . . With track oblique
At first, as one who sought access, but fear'd
To interrupt, side-long he works his way:
So varied he, and of his tortuous train
Curl'd many a wanton wreath in sight of Eve,
To lure her eye—

But, may we not rather acknowledge a like duplicity of meaning in the Hebrew word Nachash, as in the Sanscrit Nāgāh? Or, may not the Hebrew Nachash be its legitimate representative, by transplantation, and, consequently, have brought with it that double import which places it at the head of serpents, natural and metaphorical:—"that old serpent, the Satan." We have seen that the Satan (so earthly spirit) tempted Job; why might he not tempt our first parents? He tempted David; he tempted the Messiah; why might he not tempt in paradise itself? But, "the Nachash of Genesis is punished by a sentence of degradation, apparently animal degradation, therefore he was animal," say some;—but will the reader have the goodness to consider by what other terms the punishment inflicted on him, could be rendered sensible to Adam? What acquaintance had our first father with the nature of spirits? None. Of what avail then, to him, would have been a punishment simply spiritual on his enemy? It would have been neither intelligible, nor cautionary. But the symbol, the serpent, would be ever before his eyes in common with other creatures, and the insidiousness of its manners, with the mortal consequences of its venom, would never be forgotten, and could never be mistaken.—Calmet.

BALAK; son of Zippor, king of Moab, Numb. 22—25. See BALAM. Balaam having advised him to engage the Israelites in sin, Balak, politically, as he thought, followed his counsel; which proved equally pernicious, (1.) to him who gave it, (2.) to those who followed it, and (3.) to those against whom it was intended. (1.) The Israelites who were betrayed by it, were slain by their brethren who continued unperverted; (2.) Balaam, the author of it, was involved in the slaughter of the Midianites; and (3.) Balak, who had executed it by means of the Midianite women, saw his allies attacked, their country plundered, and himself charged with being the cause of their calamity.—Calmet.

BALANCE; an instrument for weighing; much of the same nature, probably, as the Roman steelyard, where the weight is hung at one end of the beam, and the article to be weighed at the other end. Balances, in the plural, generally appear to mean scales,—a pair of scales. Prov. 11: 1. Job 31: 6. Ps. 62: 9. Dan. 5: 27. Job 37: 16. See WEIGHING.—Calmet.

In Rev. 6: 5, the term zugos, rendered 'a pair of balances,' is properly a yoke; and it represents in the most forcible manner the iron yoke of the papal power, and the consequent famine of the word of God.

BALDNESS, is a natural effect of old age, in which period of life the hair of the head, wanting nourishment, falls off, and leaves the head naked. Artificial baldness was used as a token of mourning; it is threatened to the voluptuous daughters of Israel, instead of well-set hair, Isa. 3: 24. See Mic. 1: 16; and instances of it occur, Isa. 15: 2. Jer. 47: 5. See Ezek. 7: 18. Amos 8: 10.

The insult offered to Elisha by the young people of Bethel, improperly rendered, "little children," who cried out after him, "Go up, thou bald head," may here be noticed. The town of Bethel was one of the principal nurseries of Ahab's idolatry, and the contempt was offered to Elisha in his public character as a prophet of the Lord. If in the expression, "Go up," there was also a reference to the translation of Elijah, as turning it into jest, this was another aggravation of the sin, to which these young people were probably instigated by their parents. The malediction laid upon them by the prophet was not an act of private resentment, but evidently proceeded from prophetic impulse.—Watson.

BALDI, (BERNARDIN); an Italian of almost universal genius. He was born at Urbino, in 1553, and made abbot of Guastalla by the sovereign of that state. He was at once a mathematician, philosopher, antiquary, geographer, historian, orator, poet, and divine; understood the ancient, the oriental, and almost all the European languages; and united a sound judgment, with his prodigious memory and indefatigable application. Such a man is a rare example of the extent to which the human faculties may be cultivated under the influence of religion. He died in 1617, leaving behind him only a few poems and scientific works. Alas! that talents and erudition like his should leave so little to enrich the world!—Davenport.

BALDWIN, (THOMAS), D. D. a distinguished Baptist minister in Boston, was born in Norwich, Conn., Dec. 23, 1753. After he had removed to Canaan in New Hampshire he became pious, and joined the Baptist church in 1781. It was with pain, that he thus forsook his connections and early friends; for he had been educated a pedobaptist, and his venerable minister at Norwich was his grand-uncle. Having for some time conducted the religious exercises at public meetings, in August, 1782, he ventured for the first time to take a text and preach doctrinally and methodically. His advantages for intellectual culture had been few. At the request of the church, he was ordained, June 11, 1783, as an evangelist; and he performed the duties of a pastor for seven years, besides preaching often during each week in the towns within a circle of fifty miles, "chiefly at his own charges," sometimes receiving small presents, but never having a public contribution. In these journeys he was obliged to climb rocky steeps and to pass through dismal swamps; and as the poor people had no silver, and the continental currency was good for nothing, sometimes the travelling preacher was obliged either to beg or to starve. For several years, he was chosen a member of the legislature.

In 1790, he was invited to Boston, as the pastor of the second Baptist church. He now successfully pursued a course of study, and by his unremitting exertions acquired a high rank as a preacher. His church, though small in 1790, became under his care numerous and flourishing.

Of his own denomination in New-England he was at the head, and to him all his brethren looked for advice. Besides being connected with most of the benevolent institutions of Boston, he was a member of the Convention for revising the Constitution of the State; and just before his death, was fixed upon, by one party among the people, as a candidate for an elector of president of the United States. He died very suddenly at Waterville, Maine, whether he had gone to attend the commencement, August 29, 1825, aged seventy-one years. Dr. Baldwin was a writer of great perspicuity and vigor, and one of the best of men

"He was a good man. And amid our tears,
Sweet, grateful thoughts within our bosoms rise—
We trace his spirit up to brighter spheres;

And think with what pure rapturous surprise
He found himself translated to the skies;
From night at once awoke to endless noon!
Oh! with what transport did his eager eyes
Behold his Lord in glory! 'Twas the boon
His heart had longed for! Why deem we it came too soon?"

He published the following discourses: at the Thanksgiving, 1795; Quarterly Sermon; at the Concert of Prayer; Account of a Revival of Religion, 1799; on the Death of lieutenant governor Phillips; Election Sermon, 1802; on the Eternal Purpose of God; at Thanksgiving; before a Missionary Society, 1804; at the Ordination of D. Merrill, 1805; before the Female Asylum, 1806; on the Death of Dr. Stillman; at the Artillery Election, 1807; and, the Baptism of Believers only, and Particular Communion vindicated, 12mo. 1806. Of this work, the first and second parts were originally published in 1789 and 1794.—Allen; Biog. of Self-taught Men; Am. Bap. Mag. 1826.

BALE, (JOHN,) Bishop of Ossory; an English divine, born in 1495, and educated at Cambridge. He became a zealous convert from Popery to Protestantism; in defence of which he wrote many works during the reigns of Edward VI. queen Mary, and Elizabeth. His style, however, is defective in Christian gentleness and kindness. He appears to have been the last writer of those religious dramas called Mysteries, once so celebrated in the South of Europe. The work by which he is principally remembered, is his Latin Account of the Lives of Eminent British Authors.—Davenport.

BALGUY, (JOHN,) an eminent English divine, was born at Sheffield in 1686, and educated at Cambridge. Though an excellent minister and writer, he never received any higher preferment in the church of England, than prebend of Salisbury. In the celebrated Bangorian controversy, he espoused and maintained the liberal views of bishop Hoadley. In reply to lord Shaftsbury, he published 'Two Letters to a Deist,' and 'The Foundation of Moral Virtue.' Of his other works, the principal are two volumes of Sermons. He died in 1748.—Davenport.

BALM. See BALSAM.

BALSAM TREE, or BALSAM; the celebrated Balm of Gilead. Gen. 37: 25. 43: 11. Jer. 8: 22. 46: 11. 51: 8. Ezek. 27: 17. The word Balsamon may be derived from Boal-shemen, that is, lord of oil; or the most precious of perfumed oils. In Arabic it is called Abuscham, that is, father of scent; sweet-scented. The tree is an evergreen; grows to the height of about fourteen feet, and from eight to ten inches diameter; the trunk having a smooth bark, with spreading crooked branches; small bright green leaves, growing in threes; and small white flowers on separate footstalks. The petals are four in number. The fruit is a small, egg-shaped berry, containing a smooth nut. The mode in which the balsam is obtained is described by Mr. Bruce. The bark of the tree is cut with an axe, at a time when its juices are in the strongest circulation. These, as they ooze through the wound, in single drops like tears, are received into small earthen bottles; and every day's produce is gathered, and poured into a larger bottle, which is closely corked. When the juice first issues from the wound, it is of a light yellow color, and a somewhat turbid appearance; but as it settles it becomes clear, has the color of honey, and appears more fixed and heavy than at first. Its smell, when fresh, is exquisitely fragrant; strongly pungent; not much unlike that of volatile salts, but more odoriferous. If the bottle be left uncorked, it loses this delicious aroma. The quantity of balsam yielded by one tree never exceeds sixty drops in a day. Hence its scarcity is such, that at the present time the genuine balsam, though found in several parts of Syria and Abyssinia, is seldom exported as an article of commerce. Even at Constantinople, the centre of trade of those countries, it cannot without great difficulty be procured. Its taste is bitter, acrid, aromatic, and astringent. The Turks take it in small quantities in water to excite the animal faculties, and fortify the stomach. It is in the highest esteem, as a medicine, as a cosmetic, and as an odoriferous unguent. It is said to grow spontaneously and without culture, now, in its native country. Azab, and all along the coast to Ebelmandel. But in ancient times, its most famous place of cultivation was Gilead or Jericho in Judæa. Hence the beautiful language of Jeremias, "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?" Jer. 8: 22.

There were three kinds of balsam extracted from this tree. The first was called opobalsamum, and was most highly esteemed. It was that which flowed spontaneously, or by means of incision, from the trunk or branches of the tree in summer time. The second was carobalsamum, made by expressing the fruit when in maturity. The third, and least esteemed of all, was lylobalsamum, made by a decoction of the buds and small young twigs. The great value set upon this drug in the East is traced to the earliest ages. The Ishmaelites, or Arabian carriers and merchants, trafficking with the Arabian commodities into Egypt, brought with them balm as a part of their cargo, Gen. 37: 25. 43: 11. Josephus, in the history of the antiquities of his country, says that a tree of this balsam was brought to Jerusalem by the queen of Saba, and given among other presents to Solomon, who, as we know from Scripture, was very studious of all sorts of plants, and skilful in the description and distinction of them. And here, indeed, it seems to have been cultivated and to have thriven; so that the place of its origin, through length of time, combined with other reasons, came to be forgotten. Notwithstanding the positive authority of Josephus, and the great probability that attends it, we cannot put it in competition with what we have been told in Scripture, as we have just now seen that the place where it grew, and was sold to merchants, was Gilead in Judæa, more than 1730 years before Christ, or 1000 before the queen of Saba; so that in reading the verse, nothing can be plainer than that it had been transplanted into Judæa, flourished, and had become an article of commerce in Gilead, long before the period he mentions. "A company of Ishmaelites came from Gilead with their camels, bearing spicery, and balm, and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt," Gen. 37: 25. Theophrastus, Dioscorides, Pliny, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Tacitus, Justin, Solinus, and Serapion, speaking of its costliness and medicinal virtues, all say that this balsam came from Judæa. The words of Pliny are, "But to all other odors whatever, the balsam is preferred, produced in no other part but the land of Judæa, and even there in two gardens only; both of them belonging to the king, one no more than twenty acres, the other still smaller." The whole valley of Jericho was once esteemed the most fruitful in Judæa; and the obstinacy with which the Jews fought here to prevent the balsam trees from falling into the possession of the Romans, attests the importance which was attached to them. This tree Pliny describes as peculiar to the vale of Jericho, and as "more like a vine than a myrtle." It was esteemed so precious a rarity, that both Pompey and Titus carried a specimen to Rome in triumph; and the balsam, owing to its scarcity, sold for double its weight in silver, till its high price led to the practice of adulteration. Justin makes it the chief source of the national wealth. He describes the country in which it grew, as a valley like a garden, environed with continual hills, and, as it were, enclosed with a wall. "The space of the valley contains two hundred thousand acres, and is called Jericho. In that valley, there is wood as admirable for its fruitfulness as for its delight, for it is intermingled with palm trees and opobalsamum. The trees of the opobalsamum have a resemblance to fir trees; but they are lower, and are planted and husbanded after the manner of vines. On a set season of the year, they sweat balsam. The darkness of the place is besides as wonderful as the fruitfulness of it; for although the sun shines nowhere hotter in the world, there is naturally a moderate and perpetual gloominess of the air." According to Mr. Buckingham, this description is most accurate. "Both the heat and the gloominess," he says, "were observed by us, though darkness would be an improper term to apply to this gloom."—Calmet; Watson; Encyc. Amer.

BAMAH; an eminence, or high place, where the Jews worshipped their idols, Ezek. 20: 29.

BAMIAN, says Ibn Haukal, is a town half as large as Irbk, situated on a hill. Before this hill runs a river, the stream of which flows into Gurjestan. Bamian has not any gardens or orchards, and it is the only town in this district situated on a hill. The cold part of Khorasa is about Bamian. (Sir W. Ousley's Trans. p. 225.) This town is affirmed to have been the residence of Shem. See CHALDEA.—Calmet.

BAMOTH; a station of the Israelites, Num. 21: 19, 20. Eusebius says, Bamoth is a city of Moab, on the river Arnon.—Calmet.

BAMOTH-BAAL, the high places of Baal, or, the heights sacred to Baal, was a city east of the river Jordan, given to Reuben. Josh. 13: 17. Eusebius says it was situated on the plains of the Arnon.—Calmet.

BAND; a connecting ligature; a cord, or chain. Hence also, a company of men; because bound and linked together, as it were, for the accomplishment of an object. A band of Roman soldiers consisted of about a thousand. Acts 21: 31. 27: 1. Government and laws are bands that restrain from sin, and draw into the path of righteousness. Ps. 2: 3. Jer. 5: 5. Slavery, distress, fears, and perplexity are called bands, because they restrain liberty, and create irritation. Lev. 26: 13. Ezek. 34: 27. Ps. 28: 22. Sinful customs, or meretricious allurements, are bands; they enslave, weaken, degrade, and embitter the soul; they are fetters that at first may seem soft as silk, but are found at last to be stronger than iron. Isai. 58: 6. Eccl. 7: 26. The wicked often 'have no bands in their death;' that is, they frequently die without any peculiar distress, fear, or perplexity; such as might be expected to stamp their real character and condition on the verge of their future woe. Ps. 73: 4. Eccl. 7: 15. 9: 2. Faith and love are bands, which unite and fasten every believer to Christ, and to the whole body of his holy people. Col. 2: 19. The authority, arguments, instances, and influence of divine love, because they draw and engage us to follow the Lord in a way suited to our rational nature, are generally supposed to be intended in Hos. 11: 4, by 'the bands of a man;' but as this idea of constraining love is distinctly expressed in the clause preceding, I am more inclined to understand the bands of a man, here to signify the strong feelings of necessity. See how the prodigal son was drawn to his father by these natural bands, as well as by the cords of love. Luke 15: 14—20.

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY; so called from Bangor, or the bishop thereof. Bishop Hoadley, the bishop of that diocese, preaching before George I., asserted, from the text "My kingdom is not of this world," the supreme authority of Christ, as King in his own kingdom; and that he had not delegated his power, like temporal lawgivers during their absence from their kingdom, to any persons, as his viceregents or deputies. This important sermon may be seen reprinted in the Liverpool Theological Repository, vol. v. p. 301. In 1717, he also published his Preservative, in which he advanced some positions contrary to temporal and spiritual tyranny, and in behalf of the civil and religious liberties of mankind: upon which he was violently opposed, accused, and persecuted by the advocates for church power; but he was defended and supported by the civil powers, and his abilities and meekness gained him the plaudits of many.—Henderson's Buck.

BANISHMENT; exile; judicial exclusion from one's kindred and country, or from the presence of the king. Ezra 7: 26. God's banished ones, (2 Sam. 14: 14,) may mean either his children under his corrections, or his chosen in their outcast and unconverted state.

BANK; a treasury for exchanging, receiving, or giving out money on interest. Luke 19: 23.

BANNER; an ensign, or standard, used by armies or caravans on their journeys in the eastern countries. The original denel is rendered by lexicographers and translators under this word, as a noun, in which form it often occurs, a standard, a banner; as a verb, once, to set up a banner, Psalm 20: 5; as a participle pahul, vehillatus, one distinguished by a banner, the chief; as a participle niphal, bannered, or with banners. The meaning of the root is illustrated by the very ingenious and sensible author of "Observations on Divers Passages of Scripture," who shows, from Pitts and Poccoke, that, as in Arabia and the neighboring countries, on account of the intense heat of the sun by day, people generally choose to travel in the night; so, to prevent confusion in their large caravans, particularly in the annual one to Mecca, each company of which the caravan consists has its distinct portable beacon, which is carried on the top of a pole, and consists of several lights, which are somewhat like iron stoves, into which they put short dry wood, with which some of the camels are loaded. Every company has one of these poles belonging to it; some of which have ten, some twelve, of these lights on their tops, more or less; and they are likewise of different figures, as well as numbers; one, perhaps, in an oval shape; another triangular, or in the form of an M, or N, &c., so that by these every one knows his respective company. They are carried in the front, and set up in the place where the caravan is to pitch, before that comes up, at some distance from one another. As travelling then in the night must be, generally speaking, more agreeable to a great multitude in that desert, we may believe a compassionate God, for the most part, directed Israel to move in the night. And in consequence, must we not rather suppose the standards of the tribes were moveable beacons, like those of the Mecca pilgrims, than flags or any thing of that kind? This ingenious author seems, however, to forget, (1.) That the pillar of fire was with the Israelites to direct their marches. (2.) That the Israelites were not a mere caravan, but an army; and, as such, for order, required standards as well by day as by night. See ARMIES.—Watson.

BANQUET. The hospitality of the present day in the East exactly resembles that of the remotest antiquity. The parable of the "great supper" is in those countries literally realized. And such was the hospitality of ancient Greece and Rome. When a person provided an entertainment for his friends or neighbors, he sent round a number of servants to invite the guests; these were called vocatores by the Romans, and kletores by the Greeks. The day when the entertainment is to be given is fixed some considerable time before; and in the evening of the day appointed, a messenger comes to bid the guests to the feast. The custom is thus introduced in Luke: "A certain man made a great supper, and bade many; and sent his servant at supper time to say to them that were bidden, Come, for all things are now ready." They were not now asked for the first time; but had already accepted the invitation, when the day was appointed, and were therefore already pledged to attend at the hour when they might be summoned. They were not taken unprepared, and therefore could not in consistency and decency plead any prior engagement. They could not now refuse, without violating their word and insulting the master of the feast, and, therefore, justly subjected themselves to punishment. The terms of the parable exactly accord with established custom. The Jews did not always follow the same method; sometimes they sent a number of servants different ways among the friends they meant to invite; and at other times, a single male domestic.

The Persians sent a deputation to meet their guests; this deputation are called openers of the way; and the more distinguished the persons sent, and the greater the distance to which they go, so much greater is the honor. So it is proclaimed, "Go forth and behold king Solomon, with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him." "The bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet him." The names of the persons to be invited were inscribed upon tablets, and the gate was set open to receive those who had obtained them; but to prevent any getting in that had no ticket, only one leaf of the door was left open, and that was strictly guarded by the servants of the family. Those who were admitted had to go along a narrow passage to the room; and after all who had received tickets of admission were assembled, the master of the house rose and shut to the door, and then the entertainment began. The first ceremony, after the guests arrived at the house of entertainment, was the salutation performed by the master of the house, or one appointed in his place. Among the Greeks, this was sometimes done by embracing with arms around; but the most common salutation was by the conjunction of their right hands, the right hand being reckoned a pledge of fidelity and friendship. Sometimes they kissed the lips, hands, knees, or feet, as the person deserved more or less respect. The Jews welcomed a stranger to their house in the same way; for our Lord complains to Simon, that he had given him no kiss, had welcomed him to his table with none of the accustomed tokens of respect.

The custom of reclining was introduced from the nations of the East, and particularly from Persia, where it seems to have been adopted at a very remote period. The Old Testament Scriptures allude to both customs; but they furnish undeniable proofs of the antiquity of sitting. As this is undoubtedly the most natural and dignified posture, so it seems to have been universally adopted by the first generations of men; and it was not till after the lapse of many ages, and when degenerate man had lost much of the firmness of his primitive character, that he began to recline.

The tables were constructed of three different parts or separate tables, making but one in the whole. One was placed at the upper end crosswise, and the two others joined to its ends, one on each side, so as to leave an open space between, by which the attendants could readily wait at all the three. Round these tables were placed beds or couches, one to each table; each of these beds was called clinium; and three of these being united to surround the three tables, made the triclinium. At the end of each clinium was a footstool, for the convenience of mounting up to it. These beds were formed of mattresses, and supported on frames of wood, often highly ornamented; the mattresses were covered with cloth or tapestry, according to the quality of the entertainer. At the splendid feast which Ahasuerus made for the nobles of his kingdom, beds of silver and gold were placed round the tables; according to a custom in the East of naming a thing from its principal ornament, these must have been couches profusely ornamented with the precious metals. Each guest inclined the superior part of his body upon his left arm, the lower part being stretched out at length, or a little bent; his head was raised up, and his back sometimes supported with pillows. In conversation, those who spoke raised themselves almost upright, supported by cushions. When they ate, they raised themselves on their elbow, and made use of the right hand; which is the reason our Lord mentions the hand of Judas in the singular number: "He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me," Matt. 26: 23. See ACQUAINTANCE.

When a Persian comes into an assembly, and has saluted the house, he then measures with his eye the place to which his degree of rank entitles him; he straightway wedges himself into the line of guests, without offering any apology for the general disturbance which he produces. It often happens that persons take a higher seat than that to which they are entitled. The Persian scribes are remarkable for their arrogance in this respect, in which they seem to bear a striking resemblance to the Jews of the same profession in the days of our Lord. The master of the entertainment has, however, the privilege of placing any one as high in the rank of the assembly as he may choose. And Mr. Morier saw an instance of it at a public entertainment to which he was invited. When the assembly was nearly full, the governor of Kashan, a man of humble mein, although of considerable rank, came in and seated himself at the lowest place; when the master of the house, after numerous expressions of welcome, pointed with his hand to an upper seat in the assembly, to which he desired him to move, and which he accordingly did. These circumstances afford a beautiful and striking illustration of the parable which our Lord uttered, when he saw how these that were invited chose the highest places.

Before the Greeks went to an entertainment, they washed and anointed themselves; for it was thought very indecent to appear on such an occasion, defiled with sweat and dust; but they who came off a journey were washed, and clothed with suitable apparel, in the house of the entertainer, before they were admitted to the feast. When Telemachus and Pisistratus arrived at the palace of Menelaus, in the course of their wanderings, they were immediately supplied with water to wash, and with oil to anoint themselves, before they took their seats by the side of the king. The oil used on such occasions, in the palaces of nobles and princes, was perfumed with roses and other odoriferous herbs. They also washed their hands before they sat down to meat. To these customary marks of respect, to which a traveller, or one who had no house of his own, was entitled, our Lord alludes in his defence of Mary: "And he turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house; thou gavest me no water for my feet, but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. Thou gavest me no kiss; but this woman, since the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet. My head with oil thou didst not anoint; but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment," Luke 7: 44. Homer mentions it as a custom quite common in those days, for daughters to wash and afterwards to anoint the feet of their parents. Our Savior was in the circumstances of a traveller; he had no home to wash and anoint himself in, before he went to Simon's house; and, therefore, had a right to complain that his entertainer had failed in the respect that was due to him as a stranger, at a distance from the usual place of his residence. The Jews regularly washed their hands and their feet before dinner; they considered this ceremony as essential, which discovers the reason of their astonishment, when they observed the disciples of Christ sit down at table without having observed this ceremony: "Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread," Matt. 15: 2. After meals they wash them again; for, says the evangelist, "the Pharisees and all the Jews, except they wash their hands off, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders," Mark 7: 3, 4. When they washed their hands themselves, they plunged them into the water up to the wrists; but when others performed this office for them, it was done by pouring it upon their hands. The same custom prevailed in Greece, for Homer says, the attendants poured water on the hands of their chiefs. This was a part of the service which Elisha performed for his master Elijah; but in no instance where such partial washings are mentioned, is either the Hebrew taval or the Greek baptizo employed.

To wash the feet was a mean and servile office, and, therefore, generally performed by the female servants of the family. It was occasionally performed, however, by females of the highest rank; for the daughter of Cleobulus, one of the Grecian sages, and king of Lindus, a city on the south-east part of Rhodes, was not ashamed to wash the feet of her father's guests. And it was customary for them to kiss the feet of those to whom they thought a more than common respect was due; for the daughter of Philoclea, in Aristophanes, washed her father, anointed his feet, and stooping down, kissed them. The towel which was used to wipe the feet after washing, was considered through all the East, as a badge of servitude. Suetonius mentions it as a sure mark of the intolerable pride of Caligula, the Roman emperor, that when at supper he suffered senators of the highest rank sometimes to stand by his couch, sometimes at his feet, girt with a towel. Hence it appears that this honor was a token of humiliation, which was not, however, absolutely degrading and inconsistent with all regard to rank. Yet our blessed Redeemer did not refuse to give his disciples, and Judas Iscariot himself, that proof of his love and humility.

The entertainment was conducted by a symposiarch, or governor of the feast. He was, says Plutarch, one chosen among the guests, the most pleasant and diverting in the company, that would not get drunk, and yet would drink freely; he was to rule over the rest, to forbid any disorder, but to encourage their mirth. He observed the temper of the guests, and how the wine worked upon them; how every one could bear his wine, and to endeavor accordingly to keep them all in harmony, and in an even composure, that there might be no disquiet nor disturbance. To do this effectually, he first proclaimed liberty to every one to drink what he thought proper, and then observing who among them was most ready to be disordered, mixed more water with his wine, to keep him equally sober with the rest of the company; so that this officer took care that none should be forced to drink, and that none, though left to their own choice, should get intoxicated. Such, we have reason to believe, was the governor of the feast at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, when our Lord honored with his presence. The term architriklinos literally signifies the governor of a place furnished with three beds; and he acted as one having authority; for he tasted the wine before he distributed it to the company, which, it is universally admitted, was one of the duties of a symposiarch. Neither the name nor the act accords with the character and situation of a guest; he must, therefore, have been the symposiarch, or governor of the feast. The existence of such an officer among the Jews is placed beyond a doubt, by a passage in the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, where his office is thus described: "If thou be made the master of a feast, lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care of them, and so sit down. And when thou hast done all thine office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for the well-ordering of the feast." Ecclesiasticus 32: 1.—Watson.

BAPTISM; (from the Greek baptisma or baptizo;) a word whose usage in the sacred writings has given rise to a vast amount of unhappy and unnecessary disputation.

In accordance with the plan of our work we shall present to our readers in succession the views taken of this subject by the two great denominations into which the Christian world is divided, Pedobaptists and Baptists, in articles prepared expressly for this work. For the first the Rev. JOSEPH TRACY, Editor of the Boston Recorder, is responsible; the last prepared by the Rev. JAMES D. KNOWLES, Professor in the Newton Theological Institution.

VIEW OF THE PEDOBAPTISTS.

BAPTISM. The word is derived from the Greek baptisma and baptizo, and more remotely from bapto, and properly signifies a washing, whether the substance washed be partially or wholly immersed in the liquid, or the liquid be applied to the substance, by running, pouring, rubbing, dropping, or sprinkling. There were (diaphorais baptis-mois) "diverse washings" or baptisms enjoined under the former dispensation, (Heb. 9: 10.) some of which were performed by bathing, but more by sprinkling or affusion. The apostle, having mentioned these "diverse baptisms," speaks expressly, in the following verses, of diverse sprinklings, which shows satisfactorily that they were included.

PROSELYTE BAPTISM.

We have sufficient evidence that baptism, as an initiatory rite, was practised in connexion with circumcision, on the admission of proselytes to the Jewish church, long before the coming of Christ. As this fact is disputed, it will be necessary to exhibit some of the evidence on which it rests.

1. The baptism of proselytes appears altogether natural and probable, considering the genius of the Mosaic institutions, and the views which the Israelites were accustomed to entertain of the Gentile nations. Nothing was more common among this people than lustrations and purifications by washing, or baptism. In these, the external part of their religion in no small degree consisted. And as they considered all the Gentiles to be impure, unclean, how natural for them to insist, when any of these came over to their religion, that they should be ceremonially purified by the application of water.

2. That the Jews were familiar with the rite of baptism, previous to the coming of Christ, is implied in the question addressed to John by those who were sent to him from Jerusalem: "Why baptizeth thou, if thou be not the Christ, neither Elias, neither that prophet?" John 1: 25. The inquiry was not, "What new rite is this?" but, "Why do you administer it?" The Jews had long been accustomed to the rite of baptism; but if John was "not the Christ, neither Elias, neither that prophet," they understood not by what authority, or for what reason, he had taken it upon him to baptize.

3. The Jewish rabbins, ancient and modern, bear testimony to the custom of baptizing proselytes. This practice is mentioned and enjoined in both the Talmuds. It is thus spoken of by Maimonides, a learned Jew, who flourished in the twelfth century: "In all ages, when a Gentile is willing to enter into the covenant of Israel, and place himself under the wings of the Divine Majesty, and take upon him the yoke of the law, he must be circumcised and baptized, and bring a sacrifice; or if it be a woman, be baptized, and bring a sacrifice."

4. Other writers besides Jews, ancient and modern, who have paid most attention to the subject, and been in the most favorable circumstances to form an opinion, have been generally agreed in maintaining that the Jews baptized their proselytes. Thus Arrian, a heathen philosopher at Rome, A. D. 140, reproaches those who turned proselytes to the Jews, calling them the baptized ones.* And Cyprian, a Christian father of the third century, says, "The case of the Jews, who were to be baptized by the apostles, was different from that of the Gentiles; for the Jews had already, and a long time ago, the baptism of the law and of Moses, and were now to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ."† Other writers, who speak expressly of this practice among the Jews, are Leo Modena, in his Jewish History, Lightfoot, Reiskius, Selden, Michaelis, Ainsworth, Ernesti, Weinstein, Hammond, Witsius, Priedaux, Stackhouse, Wall, Jahn, Priestley, Rosenmueller, Kuinoel, Doddridge, &c.

5. The existence of such a rite as baptism among the Jews can hardly be accounted for, unless it be traced to a period anterior to the commencement of the Christian era. We know that they baptized their proselytes in the second century, and have continued to do so ever since. But how was this rite introduced among them? Was it copied from the Christians? Is it likely that, at so early a period, or at any period, the Jews, the most inveterate enemies of Christ, should copy one of his sacraments, and incorporate it among the institutions of their venerated lawgiver? To those who have any knowledge of Jewish prejudices, the supposition must appear incredible. It follows, therefore, that the Jews must have received the custom of baptizing proselytes (as they profess) from the patriarchs of their nation, and that it was in common use at the coming of the Savior.

JOHN'S BAPTISM.

The first mention of baptism in the New Testament relates to its administration by the forerunner of Christ. "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea," &c. Matt. 3: 1—6.

It has been made a question respecting the baptism of John, whether it was the same as the ordinance instituted by Christ, (Matt. 28: 29.) and observed in the church in all periods since. We are decidedly of the opinion that it was not the same, but merely an introductory rite, designed to prepare the way for the gospel dispensation; and in this we agree, not only with the ancient church,‡ but with the most respectable writers, Baptist and Pedobaptist, of the present day. The following are some of the reasons, urged by Rev. Robert Hall (a Baptist) and others, to show that the baptism of John was a preparatory rite, and not to be regarded as a Christian ordinance.

1. This baptism took place under the Jewish dispensation. The Jewish dispensation continued in force till the death of Christ. Then, the veil of the temple was rent in twain. Then, the great sacrifice for sin was offered, and the typical sacrifices ceased. It was then that Christ blotted out the hand-writing of ordinances, that was against us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross,§ Col. 2: 14. Our Savior lived under the old dispensation, and was a strict observer of the institutions of Moses; and all that was done in the church previous to his death belonged properly to that dispensation. This certainly is strong presumptive evidence that the baptism of John was not a Christian ordinance.

2. Christian baptism originated in the express command of CHRIST: "Go ye and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." No such origin can be claimed for the baptism of John, who baptized for some time before he knew Christ, John 1: 31. He ascribes his commission to the Father, John 1: 33.

3. The baptism of John was evidently a preparatory ordinance. He came to "prepare the way of the Lord." He preached to the people that the Messiah was coming, and exhorted them to prepare to receive him; and in or-* Dissert. in Epictet. lib. ii. cap. 9. † Epis. 73, ad Julianum.

‡ Origen says, "Christ himself was baptized by John, not with that baptism which is in Christ, but with that which is in the law." (Com. in Rom. 6.) It was superior to the first, but inferior to the second."—Homil. 24.

der that they might be prepared, called them to repentance and baptism.

4. One part of the design of John's baptism, as stated by himself, shows it to have been entirely distinct from Christian baptism: "That he (Christ) should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water," John 1: 31. It was an important part of the object of John's ministry and baptism, to point out the Messiah to the Jewish people, bear public testimony in his behalf, and induct him, by the washing of water, into the ministry. It hardly need be said, that there is nothing in Christian baptism which resembles this. "A Christian ordinance not founded on the authority of Christ, not the effect but the means of his manifestation, and first executed by one who knew him not, is an incomprehensible mystery."*

5. The baptism of John, unlike Christian baptism, was not administered in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. This we know; because some, whom John baptized, had "not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost," Acts 19: 2. Indeed, John did not baptize in the name of Christ, or in any other name; but merely directed those who came to his baptism to "believe on him who should come after him," Acts 19: 4.

6. Some of those who received John's baptism were afterwards baptized by the apostles. This was the case with certain disciples whom Paul found at Ephesus, (Acts 19: 5.) and in all probability with many others.

For these reasons we think it demonstrable, that John's baptism was not Christian baptism, but rather an introductory rite, intended to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah and his kingdom.

MODE OF BAPTISM.

The Protestant world has long been agitated with an unhappy controversy respecting the mode of Christian baptism; one part affirming, and the other denying, that a total immersion in water is essential to the ordinance. After long study and reflection, we are decidedly with those who take the negative on this question. Our reasons for this opinion we propose briefly to exhibit.

The question at issue between Baptists and Pedobaptists, relative to this matter, it should be remembered, is not this: Whether immersion is valid baptism? We admit that it is; and are willing that those in our congregations who prefer to be baptized in this way should be gratified. Nor is the question this: Whether immersions have not been frequently practised in the Christian church? for we admit that they have been. They have been practised much more frequently, at some periods, than it can be proved that they were in the days of the apostles. But the question at issue is simply this: Is immersion essential to the ordinance? Our Baptist brethren contend with one voice that it is. They tell us that the idea of immersion enters into the very nature of baptism; that the terms baptism and immersion are equivalent and interchangeable.† "The meaning of the word (baptize) is always the same, and it always signifies to dip. It never has any other meaning."‡ All Baptists hold, that there can be no baptism without immersion; that this is essential to the ordinance. Now this we deny; and in justification of the denial offer the following reasons:

1. The rite of immersion is not calculated for universal practice. The health of ministers is often such as to render it unsafe for them to go into the water; and the health of those desiring baptism is more frequently such as to render it unsafe for them to receive the ordinance in this way. In some parts of the earth, and particularly at some seasons of the year, it must be very inconvenient, if not impracticable, to administer baptism by immersion. Now is it likely that our blessed Lord, who intended that his religion should be universal, would append to it, and make essential, a rite which is so ill fitted for universal practice?

2. The signification of water baptism shows the propriety of some other mode of administration besides immersion. Water baptism is a symbol, an emblem of spiritual baptism. It shadows forth, by an expressive sign, the cleansing, purifying operations of the Holy Spirit.

* R. Hall.

† Judson's Sermon, p. 14.

‡ Carson on Baptism, pp. 13, 83.

Hence the mode of water baptism might be expected to correspond to the manner in which the Divine Spirit is represented as descending upon the heart. But this is uniformly by pouring or sprinkling. "I will pour out my Spirit unto you." "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean." This pouring out and sprinkling of the Holy Ghost is in Scripture called the baptism of the Holy Ghost, of which water baptism is the instituted sign. It seems evident, therefore, that pouring or sprinkling must be a proper, if not the most proper, mode of water baptism.*

3. That the original words used to denote the ordinance of baptism may be used to signify immersion is conceded; but certainly they are not confined to this particular sense. This is evident,

(1.) From their etymology. They are derived from the Greek bapto, a word which, it is now admitted, does not always signify immerse. Mr. Carson, a late Baptist writer, proves that this word signifies to dye, as well as to dip, and to dye or color in any manner.

It is the word used in the Septuagint, where the body of Nebuchadnezzar is said to have been wet with the dew of heaven, Dan. 5: 21. Certainly his body was not immersed in the dew.

(2.) The translators of our New Testament, whenever they have translated the words denoting baptism, have uniformly given to them the general sense of washing. See Heb. 9: 10. Luke 11: 38. Mark 7: 4. And in most instances where they have transcribed (not translated) the original words, they have connected them with particles which show that they intended to use them in the same general sense. This is true in all those cases in which persons are said to be baptized with water, or with the Spirit. No English scholar would say immersed with water.

(3.) The most respectable lexicographers, ancient and modern, concur in giving to the words in question a wider signification than that of simple immersion. In proof of this, we may refer to Stephanus, Scapula, Passor, Suidas, Hedericus, Coulon, Parkhurst, Ainsworth, Schleusner, and Wahl. Indeed, Mr. Carson, after announcing his position that baptizo "always signifies to dip," admits that he has "all the lexicographers against him," p. 79.

(4.) To the judgment of lexicographers may be added that of the most learned and respectable commentators and theologians. Piscator, Zanchius, Alstedius, Masticrith, Pareus, Wickliffe, Leigh, Lightfoot, Calvin, Beza, Witius, Hammond, Wall, Poole, and many others, speak of the mode of baptism as a thing not essential. It may be immersion, or it may be something else.

(5.) But that which is most decisive in regard to the meaning of the words denoting baptism, is their use. They are certainly used, by authors sacred and profane, in other senses besides that of immersion. They are so used in the apocryphal books of the Old Testament, and so translated by our English translators. See Ecclesiasticus 34: 25. Judith 12: 7. They are so used by the early Christian fathers. Origen represents the wood on the altar, over which water was poured at the command of Elijah, (1 Kings 18: 33.) as having been baptized. Cyrian, Jerome, and some other of the fathers, understood the prediction, "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean," (Ezek. 36: 25.) as having reference to wa-

* It has been said that baptism with water is not significant of the baptism of the Spirit, but rather of the burial and resurrection of Christ. "We are buried with him by baptism into death." See Rom. 6: 4, and Col. 2: 12. But if baptism with water is not significant of the baptism of the Spirit, then why are the two baptisms spoken of by Christ in such immediate connexion? "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." "John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost," John 3: 5. And why is the renewing of the Holy Ghost spoken of as all united with the figure of a baptism, this renewal is not the thing shadowed forth in literal baptism? The passages in which believers are said to be "buried with Christ by baptism into death," do not seem to have any reference to the mode of baptism with water. "The apostle is here speaking," says Mr. Judson very properly, "of spiritual circumcision and spiritual baptism." In spiritual baptism or regeneration, believers are spiritually "crucified with Christ," die with him, are buried with him, and rise with him to "newness of life and to new obedience." But what has all this to do with the mode of water baptism? And how far can it go towards proving that a total immersion in water is essential to the ordinance?

For a full and satisfactory discussion of this subject, see Stuart's Commentary on Rom. 6: 4.

ter baptism. The baptism of tears and blood was a favorite phraseology with the early Christians.

The words denoting baptism are used in the New Testament where they cannot signify immersion. The congregation of Israel "were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea," 1 Cor. 10: 2. Yet we know that they were not baptized by an immersion in the waters, for "they went into the midst of the sea upon dry ground," Exod. 14: 22. The Jews were accustomed to baptize, not only their cups and pots, but their brazen vessels and their tables, Mark 7: 4. But it is not at all likely that they washed their large vessels and tables, by immersing them in water.

4. The circumstances attending most of the baptisms recorded in the New Testament indicate some other mode besides immersion. Let any impartial reader contemplate the baptism of the three thousand on the day of Pentecost, after the greater part of the day had been spent; or the baptism of Paul, in the peculiar situation in which he was placed; or the baptism of Cornelius and his family, when the apostle said, "Can any man forbid water?" i. e. that it should be brought; or the baptism of the jailer and his household, by one of his prisoners, in the midst of an agitated and affrighted city, and at the dead hour of night; and in whatever mode he may think these different persons were baptized, he will find it difficult to satisfy himself that they could have been immersed.

5. Immersion was never considered as essential to baptism till subsequent to the Reformation in the sixteenth century. We say essential; for this, it will be recollected, is the point in dispute. That immersions were frequent in the ancient church, (at some periods more frequent than they now are among Pedobaptists, or than they were in the days of the apostles,) we see no reason to doubt. But at times when immersions most generally prevailed, the sick were always baptized in some other mode, and such baptisms were considered as perfectly valid. A question was proposed to Cyprian, about the middle of the third century, "Whether they are to be esteemed right Christians who have been only sprinkled with water, and not washed, or dipped?" to which this learned father replied, that "the sprinkling of water is of equal validity with the laver."* Cave says, that the primitive Christians "did not hold sprinkling to be unlawful, especially in cases of necessity, or where convenience of immersing could not be had."† Calvin tells us that, "the substance of baptism being retained, the church, from the beginning, enjoyed a liberty of using somewhat different rites."‡ Dr. Wall, who had a partiality for immersion, says, "On extraordinary occasions, baptism by affusion of water on the face was by the ancients counted sufficient baptism. Of this there are many proofs."§

The author of Letters to Bishop Hoadley, a learned and professed Baptist, admits that, "for thirteen hundred years successively after the apostles, sprinkling was permitted upon extraordinary occasions."|| Mr. Robinson, also, a learned Baptist, admits that, "before the Reformation, sprinkling was held valid in cases of necessity."¶ The doctrine, then, that there can be no valid baptism without immersion, is a novelty. It was not held by the primitive church.

SUBJECTS OF CHRISTIAN BAPTISM.

There is a difference of opinion between Baptists and Pedobaptists respecting not only the mode, but the subjects of Christian baptism; the latter affirming, and the former denying, that the children of believing, covenanting parents should be baptized. In support of the duty of baptizing such children, the following reasons may be urged:

1. This duty is reasonable in itself, and in accordance with our best affections. In the children of those we love, we all naturally feel a peculiar interest. A good prince would wish, and would provide, that the children of his beloved and faithful friends should be placed in a near relation to himself. And shall it be supposed that the Prince of life will not regard with tokens of peculiar favor the children of his covenant people?

2. The analogy of God's covenant dealings in past ages is in favor of the doctrine of infant baptism. In all the covenants which God has hitherto made with men, children have been connected with their parents. Thus it was in the covenants with Adam, with Noah, with Abraham, and with David. God dealt favorably with the children of Lot for their father's sake; and he declares himself to be a God keeping covenant with those that love him "to a thousand generations." How unlikely, then, that in the covenant of the Christian church, God has swerved from the invariable economy of his covenant dealings, and sundered the connexion between believing parents and their children?

3. Had children been deprived of their interest in the covenant under the gospel dispensation, believing Jewish parents in the primitive church would undoubtedly have complained. In the days of the apostles, many thousands of the Jews believed, who were "all zealous of the law." They were tenacious even of their former burthens; and would they cheerfully relinquish their accustomed privileges? Yet we hear not a word of complaint on the subject. There was no objection to the gospel, by friend or foe, on this ground. It is morally certain, therefore, that in respect to covenant relations and privileges, "their children were as aforetime," Jer. 30: 20.

4. It is a conclusive argument in favor of infant baptism, that baptism is now substituted in place of circumcision. In support of this proposition, it may be observed,

(1.) That the visible church has been substantially the same under both dispensations. It has held essentially the same doctrines, enjoyed the same spiritual promises, and professed the same religion, the religion of the Bible. The religion of the Old Testament is not distinct from that of the New, like the religion of Brumha, or Mohammed. In all essential particulars it is the same, and has been professed by the church in all ages.

The church, under both dispensations, is represented as the same in various passages of Scripture. The ancient predictions of the ingathering of the Gentiles, and of the future prosperity and glory of the church, were made, not to a new church to be established under the gospel, but to the Zion of the Old Testament, the church at that time existing in Israel. See Isa. 60. and 49: 20, 21. Our Savior predicted that many should "come from the east, and from the west, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the" same "kingdom of heaven," the same visible church, from which "the children of the kingdom," the Jews, "should be cast out;" and that the same "kingdom of God," in which the Jews had been unfaithful, "should be taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof," Matt. 8: 11, 12. 21: 43. In perfect accordance with these predictions, Paul represents the Gentile believers as grafted into the same olive tree from which the Jews, for their unbelief, were broken off, and into which the converted Jews shall be grafted again, Rom. 11: 17. In view of these representations, nothing is more certain, than that the visible church, under both dispensations, has been substantially the same body. But baptism is now, what circumcision was formerly, an instituted prerequisite to a regular standing in the visible church. Consequently, baptism is substituted in place of circumcision.

(2.) The covenant of the church, under both dispensations, has been essentially the same. This is evident from the identity of the church. The church is constituted by its covenant; so that, if the former is unchanged, the latter must be. The covenant of the church under the former dispensation was the covenant with Abraham. Consequently this, in its full and spiritual import, must be regarded as the covenant of the church now. The covenant with Abraham has never been abolished. It is spoken of in the Old Testament as "everlasting;" and in the New as to exist "forever," Gen. 17: 7. Luke 1: 55. It is represented by Paul as a covenant of "promise," and as "confirmed of God in Christ;" and we are assured that "the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul" it, and render it of no effect, Gal. 3: 17. Believers under the gospel are spoken of as children of the covenant with Abraham, Acts 3: 25. It is on account of their interest in this covenant that they are denominated "Abraham's seed," (Gal. 3: 29.) and that Abraham is so often represented as "the father of all them that believe." "He received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised, that he might be the father of all them that believe," Rom. 4: 11. It is evident from Scriptures such as these, that the covenant of the church, like the church itself, has been essentially the same under both dispensations; and that this covenant is the covenant with Abraham.* But of this covenant, baptism is now, what circumcision was formerly, the visible token. Hence, baptism has come in place of circumcision.

(3.) Baptism and circumcision are of precisely the same import. Circumcision was both a sign and a seal. As a sign, it represented the circumcision of the heart, or regeneration. "Circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter," Rom. 2: 29. As a seal, it confirmed "the righteousness of faith," or the covenant of grace, Rom. 4: 2. Baptism, too, is both a sign and a seal. As a sign, it is an emblem of "the washing of regeneration," or the baptism of the Holy Ghost. As a seal, it assures those who receive it, and whose characters are conformed to its sacred import, that their faith is imputed to them for righteousness. It thus appears that when the ancient token of the covenant was abolished, an ordinance was established in the same church, and appended to the same covenant, of precisely similar import. How is it possible, then, to resist the conclusion, that the latter is substituted for the former?

(4.) The Scriptures countenance the idea, that baptism is substituted in place of circumcision. "Beware," says the apostle, "of the concision," or those persons who lay an exorbitant stress on the rite of circumcision; "for we," we who have been baptized, "are the circumcision, who worship God in the spirit," Phil. 3: 2, 3. Again, to the Colossians he says, "Ye are circumcised, with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ, buried with him in baptism," Col. 2: 11, 12. In other words, ye are circumcised, having been baptized. It is admitted that the circumcision and baptism here spoken of are both spiritual. But if the two ordinances are spiritually the same, and the one was instituted in the church on the removal of the other, is not this the substitution the one for the other?

(5.) The primitive Christian fathers considered baptism as having come in the place of circumcision. Our limits forbid us to cite particular passages. Whoever will take the trouble to consult Wall's History of Infant Baptism, vol. i. chapters 6—15, will find that many of the early fathers, as Justin, Cyprian, Basil, Ambrose, Augustine, and Chrysostom, speak expressly on this point. They considered baptism as the Christian circumcision, and as standing in the place of circumcision.

But if this is true, and if such was the understanding of the church in times nearest the apostles, then the question about baptizing infants is at an end. There certainly was a command to circumcise infants; and if baptism is substituted in place of circumcision, the same command is valid in favor of their baptism.

5. The Jewish proselyte baptism furnishes a conclusive argument for the baptism of children. At the time of our Savior's appearance, and long previous, the Jews had been accustomed, not only to circumcise their proselytes, but to baptize them. And they were accustomed to baptize children with their parents. In proof of this, see Wall's Introduction to the History of Infant Baptism. But when our Savior gave the command, "Go ye and teach, or proselyte, the nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," must not his disciples have understood him to intend that kind of baptism to which both he and they had been accustomed, viz. the baptism of children with their parents? How could they have understood him in any other way? Under these circumstances, instead of needing an express command to authorize the baptism of children, the disciples needed an express prohibition to prevent their doing it. But no such prohibition was given.

6. Christ and his apostles taught and practised just as we might expect, on supposition they intended that children should be baptized; and just as we should not expect, on the contrary supposition. In order to determine what we might or might not expect of Christ and his apostles, it will be necessary to keep in mind the established customs of the period in which they lived. In the Jewish church, children had always been connected with their parents. They early received the token of the everlasting covenant. Also the children of proselytes were connected in covenant with their parents, and entitled to the initial rites of circumcision and baptism. And now what might be expected of Christ and his apostles, on supposition they intended to put an end to this state of things? Not silence, surely. Silence would be a virtual approbation of it. On this supposition, they would have lost no opportunity of insisting that the ancient covenant connexion between children and parents was abolished, and must no more be recognised in the rites of the church. But did they pursue such a course? Never, in a single instance.

What, then, might be expected of Christ and his apostles, on supposition they intended that the established covenant connexion of children with their parents should be continued? Not, indeed, that they should enjoin it by express precepts; for this would be to enjoin expressly what every one already understood and practised. But they would be likely often to allude to this connexion with approbation, and to drop expressions which implied it. They would be likely, also, as occasions occurred, to baptize households, when those at the head of them made profession of their faith. And this, it hardly need be said, is the course which our Savior and the apostles actually pursued. Christ applauded the practice of bringing infants to receive his blessing, and declared that "of such is the kingdom of God," Luke 18: 15. He spoke of little children being received in his name, or as belonging to him, Mark 9: 37, 41. Peter taught believing parents, that the promise was to them and to their children, Acts 2: 39. Paul affirms that "the blessing of Abraham," an important part of which consisted in the covenant connexion of his children, "has come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ;" and he denominates the children of believing parents holy, Gal. 3: 14. 1 Cor. 7: 14. He repeatedly baptized households on the profession of parents, or of those who had the charge of them. Lydia believed, and she and her household were baptized. The jailer believed, and he and all his were baptized straightway. Paul also baptized the household of Stephanus, 1 Cor. 1: 16.

7. The testimony of history is conclusive in favor of the practice of infant baptism. It has been observed already, that the Christian fathers considered baptism as having come in the place of circumcision. Justin, who wrote only about forty years after the death of John, says, "We have not received this carnal circumcision, but the spiritual circumcision; and we have received it by baptism.*" Is it not manifest from this passage what must be the opinion of Justin in regard to the important question before us?

Irenæus, who wrote a few years later than Justin, says, "Christ came to save all persons who by him (reanuncetur in Deum) are baptized unto God, infants, and little ones, and children, and youths, and elder persons.**" The only objection to this testimony is, that Irenæus here expresses baptism by a word which literally denotes regeneration, putting, by a common figure, the thing signified for the sign. That he really intended to express baptism by this word is so evident from his use of it in other instances, and from the general usage of the fathers, that Dr. Wall does not hesitate to speak of the above passage as an "express mention of baptized infants." And Whiston, a learned Baptist, admits the same. "This," says he, "is a thing undeniable by any modest arguer.†"

Tertullian, who was contemporary with Irenæus, although he advises to delay baptism in the case of infants and un-

* The Jews, in the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah, believed that God had made a temporal covenant with their nation, in the person of Abraham their father, of which circumcision was the seal, the observance of the ceremonial law the condition, and temporal prosperity the blessing promised. Some Christian commentators have advanced the same doctrine; but the prophets earnestly and repeatedly protest against it. They uniformly labor to enforce the truth, that holy obedience, such as is now required under the Christian dispensation, was the condition of the covenant with Abraham.

married persons, yet speaks most expressly of infant baptism as a prevailing and established practice.*

Origen, who was born within eighty-five years of the death of John, and was descended from Christian ancestors who must have lived in the apostolic age, speaks repeatedly and expressly of infant baptism, and declares that the practice had come down from the apostles.†

Subsequent to this period, infant baptism is mentioned often, and in the most positive terms, by all the principal Christian fathers, as Cyprian, Optatus, Basil, Gregory, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine. It is recognised in the acts of councils, as well as the writings of individuals. It is represented as resting on apostolic example and authority. Indeed, the right of infants to baptism was denied by no one in the primitive church, except those who rejected water baptism altogether. Pelagius, in his controversy with Augustine, had strong inducements to deny it—so strong that he was reported by some to have done so; but he repels the charge as an injurious slander. "Men slander me," says he, "as if I denied the sacrament of baptism to infants." "I never heard of any, not even the most impious heretic, who denied baptism to infants."‡

Dr. Wall, who has so thoroughly investigated the history of infant baptism as to leave little to be done by those who come after him, assures us that the first body of men, of which he can find any account, who denied baptism to infants, were the Petrobrusians, a sect of the Albigenses, in the former part of the twelfth century. And Milner says that, "a few instances excepted, the existence of Anti-pedobaptism seems scarcely to have taken place in the church of Christ till a little after the beginning of the Reformation."

Such, then, is the history of infant baptism; and the argument from this source, in favor of the divine origin and authority of the practice, is deemed conclusive. If infant baptism does not rest on the ground of apostolic example, how can it be accounted for that it should have been introduced so early into the church, and prevailed so universally, and that, too, without a whisper of dissension, or a note of alarm? We have catalogues extant of all the different sects of professing Christians in the four first centuries,—the very period when infant baptism must have been introduced if it were not of divine origin,—in which the differences of opinion which obtained in those times respecting baptism are particularly recounted and minutely designated. Yet there is no mention of any, except those who denied water baptism altogether, who did not consider infant baptism as a divine institution. Is it not certain, then, that infant baptism is a divine institution; that it is not an innovation, but was sanctioned by the apostles themselves? On this ground, and this only, "all sacred and profane history, relating to the subject, appears plain and consistent, from Abraham to Christ, and from Christ to this day."

The principal writers on the Pedobaptist side are Wall, Walker, Henry, Bradbury, Bostwick, Tongood, Addington, Williams, P. Edwards, Miller, Evans, Clarke, Glas, Parsons, Lathrop, Reed, Stuart, Woods, Worcester, Wardlaw, Milligan, Moore, Jerram, and Dwight.

VIEWS OF THE BAPTISTS.

We will now proceed to state the opinions of the Baptists, and the arguments by which they maintain them. May the Spirit of Truth assist us in this service.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

BAPTISM, (from baptisma, a Greek word, derived from the verb baptizo), is the name of a Christian rite, which the Savior has commanded all his followers to observe. His commission to the apostles, and to all succeeding ministers, requires them to "go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," Mark 16: 15, 16. In the corresponding passage, (Matt. 28: 19,) the same command is expressed in somewhat different terms: "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

This command of the Savior is confirmed and illustrated by his own example, (Matt. 3: 13—17. Mark 1: 9—11. Luke 3: 21, 22,) and by the uniform practice of the apostles, both under his own immediate direction (John 4: 1, 2.) and after his resurrection, Acts 2: 38—41. 8: 12, 36—38. 9: 18, &c. The rite has been observed, in some form, through all the succeeding ages, by nearly all professed Christians.

The Baptists, in common with the greater portion of their brethren, believe that the ordinance of baptism is positively binding on every Christian who has the opportunity to observe it. They believe it to be essential to salvation, in the same sense that obedience to any other command of the Savior is necessary to salvation. They believe, that neither baptism nor any other ceremony is of any avail in preparing men for heaven, without regeneration by the power of the Holy Ghost; but they believe, that he who should deliberately refuse to be baptized, or to perform any other duty, so far as he understood that duty, and had the opportunity to perform it, would thus furnish evidence that he had not been born again, and consequently was unprepared for heaven. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me. He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings," John 14: 21, 24.

The Baptists believe, moreover, that baptism is a specific rite, having, as to its essence, one unvarying character; and that, as there is but "one Lord" and "one faith," so there is, in the same literal, numerical sense, but "one baptism," Eph. 4: 5.

Baptism is a positive institution, and the obligation to practise it arises wholly from the authority of the Savior. His command is the origin and the rule of our duty respecting baptism; we must obey the precept exactly as it was meant to be observed; we have no right to deviate, in the slightest degree, from the prescribed rule, just as the Jews could not, without guilt, deviate from a strict compliance with the ceremonies of their law; and consequently, if we can ascertain what the Lord Jesus meant by baptism, that, and that only, we must practise, without hesitation or change.

One additional observation remains:—As the Savior's will is our only rule in baptism, and as that will is revealed in the Bible alone, we must resort to the Bible to ascertain what is baptism, and who are the proper subjects. The Baptists adhere steadfastly to the great Protestant principle, that the Bible is the sole and sufficient rule in religious concerns. They accordingly appeal to the Scriptures, and insist, that if any practice, claiming to be a positive Christian rite, is not clearly sanctioned by the Bible, it must be rejected, whatever arguments may be produced in its favor from supposed analogies, or from the practice of some portions of the Christian world.

After these preliminary remarks, we proceed to state, that, in the opinion of the Baptists, baptism is the immersion in water of a suitable candidate, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The only suitable candidate is a person who has been born of the Spirit, and who is united to Christ by faith.

The arguments by which the Baptists maintain these positions must be presented in a very compendious manner, without extended critical remarks, or a full citation of authorities.

I. THE NATURE OF BAPTISM.

1. The first argument which proves that baptism is immersion only, is drawn from the meaning of the word employed in the Scriptures to designate the rite. It must be supposed that a proper word was used—one which exactly defines the nature of the ordinance. If, then, the meaning of that word can be ascertained, all doubt ought to be removed.

The word is baptizo, which has been merely transferred to our language, by changing the Greek for Roman letters, and altering the termination.

What, then, is the meaning of the Greek word? It is natural to refer in the first place to the lexicons; but these all give, as the primary meaning of the word, to dip, to * De Baptismo, cap. xviii.

† Rom. on Lev. 12. and Luke 14, and Com. on Rom. lib. 5.

‡ Wall's Hist. of In. Bap., vol. 1.

plunge, to immerse. Professor Stuart, in his learned article in the Biblical Repository for April, 1833, p. 298, admits, respecting the Greek words bapto and baptizo, that they both "mean to dip, plunge, or immerse into any thing liquid. All lexicographers and critics, of any note, are agreed in this."

The next resort is, to the classical Greek writers, to ascertain how they use the word. Professor Stuart has quoted passages from Homer, Pindar, Aristotle, Aristophanes, Herodotus, Heraclides Ponticus, Aratus, Xenophon, Plutarch, Lucian, Diodorus Siculus, Plato, Epicurus, Hippocrates, Strabo, Polybius, and Josephus, all of whom use the words bapto and baptizo to signify immersion.

In the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, and in the Apocrypha, the word baptizo is used to signify, "1. To plunge, immerse, dip in. 2. To overwhelm. 3. To wash, or cleanse, by bathing the person in water."—See Prof. Ripley's Examination of Prof. Stuart's Essay, p. 38.

In the New Testament, the word baptizo and its derivatives are repeatedly used in cases where the ordinance of baptism is not referred to, Mark 7: 3, 4. Luke 11: 38. Mark 7: 4, 8. Heb. 9: 10. All these cases, however, are shown by professor Ripley to include the original, proper meaning, to immerse.

In all this extended range of examination, while numberless examples of the use of the word baptizo to signify immersion are found, professor Stuart himself has been unable to produce a single instance from the classical Greek writers, from the Septuagint and Apocrypha, or from the New Testament, where the word plainly and undeniably signifies something inconsistent with immersion. Professor Stuart acknowledges himself to be "philologically compelled" to conclude, "that the probability that baptizo implies immersion is very considerable, and on the whole a predominant one; but it does not still amount to certainty."—(Bib. Rep. p. 318.) There are few points on which "certainty" is attainable; and if, in religious concerns, we refuse to believe and act till this "certainty" is reached, where is the office of faith? Reasonable probability is the highest evidence which can be obtained on most subjects; and if, after ascertaining the almost unanimous concurrence of all Greek writers respecting the meaning of the word baptizo, its meaning is not to be received as settled, it seems impossible to determine the signification of any word whatever.

It would be easy to fill many pages with quotations from the most distinguished Pedobaptist writers, of various countries and ages, who confess that baptism means immersion. Mr. Booth, in his learned work, "Pedobaptism Examined," has collected more than eighty testimonies of this kind. A single quotation from Calvin is the only one which our limits allow: "The very word baptize signifies to immerse, and it is certain that immersion was the practice of the ancient church."—L. 4. c. 15. § 19.

2. The figurative use of the word is a second argument. A figure is used for illustration or emphasis, and in either case, its force depends on the literal signification. In this figurative sense baptizo is used in the New Testament to signify overwhelming. Thus in Luke 12: 50, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!" That is, as professor Stuart rightly paraphrases it, "I am about to be overwhelmed with sufferings, and I am greatly distressed with the prospect of them," p. 310. Similar examples are found in Mark 10: 38, 39. Matt. 3: 11, &c.

The word is used figuratively to signify burial, in Rom. 6: 3, 4: "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." In Col. 2: 12, the same figure occurs: "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead." It seems too plain for argument, that baptism is here compared to a burial, in which the believer, being "dead to sin," (Rom. 6: 2.) is "buried" in baptism, and from this emblematic grave he rises again to a new and spiritual life. The figure is apt, beautiful, and impressive, if baptism is immersion; but it has no apparent pertinency if any thing else is baptism.

3. The places selected for the administration of baptism furnish an argument. The accounts of the baptisms by John would probably convey to the minds of all men who should read the Bible for the first time, without any knowledge of the controversies on this subject, a right idea concerning baptism. We find John baptizing the people "in Jordan," Matt. 3: 5, 6. Mark 1: 5, 6. If the idea that the preposition "in" might mean "at" were correct, the fact would still remain, that he repaired, for the purpose of baptizing, to the river Jordan, "the average breadth of which, between the sea of Galilee and the Dead sea, is from sixty to eighty feet, and its depth about ten or twelve."—(Rob. Wahl's Lex. art. Jordan.) The reason expressly assigned for selecting a spot at Enon, near Salim, is, "because there was much water there," John 3: 23. If the words translated much water were susceptible of the translation which Beza and others have contended for, i. e. "many streams or rivulets," it would nevertheless be a fact, that the place was chosen for baptism with an express reference to an abundant supply of water, and "many streams or rivulets" would afford accommodations for the act of immersion. But it is highly improbable, in itself, that there were many streams or rivulets in the neighborhood of the Jordan, and professor Ripley has shown, with a clearness and force which ought to settle the question, that the phrase hudata polia, translated "much water," is a Hebrew expression, which is repeatedly applied in the Old Testament to the sea, and which therefore signifies a great quantity of water. Can there be any reasonable doubt, that John selected this spot because it was a convenient place for immersing the candidates? Is it a probable interpretation, that he chose the spot because the multitude needed many streams to supply themselves and their cattle with drink?

The case of the Ethiopian, (Acts 8.) may be cited: "And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water, and the eunuch said, See, here is water: what doth hinder me to be baptized?" v. 36. "And they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch, and he baptized him. And when they were come up out of the water," &c. v. 38, 39. Whatever ingenious critics may say, is not the impression which this account naturally makes upon the mind of a plain man the true one? i. e. that the travellers had been conversing on the truths of the gospel, and on the ordinance of baptism; that when they arrived at a body of water, the Ethiopian proposed to be baptized; and that Philip, having led him into the water, immersed him. Do not all the circumstances lead to this conclusion?

Though in many other cases of baptism mentioned in the New Testament, no reference is made to the place where the ceremony was performed, yet nothing is said inconsistent with the idea of immersion. Oriental countries abound with large baths, and other collections of water, where baptism could be, and where, in modern times, it often has been, performed. It is a settled rule of criticism, that a defective or obscure passage must be explained by those which are clear; and as we know that large bodies of water were in some cases selected, we are bound to conclude, that in other cases the practice was similar, though nothing may be said on the subject.

4. The practice of the Christian world, for many centuries, affords important testimony.

On this point there is overwhelming evidence. The best ecclesiastical historians, Mosheim, Waddington, Neander, &c. affirm that the practice of the primitive churches was immersion. Professor Stuart, after citing the testimony of many ancient writers, says:—"But enough. 'It is,' says Augusti, (Denkw. vii. p. 216.) 'a thing made out,' viz. the ancient practice of immersion. So, indeed, all the writers who have thoroughly investigated the subject conclude. I know of no one usage of ancient times which seems to be more clearly and certainly made out. I cannot see how it is possible for any candid man who examines the subject to deny this," p. 359.

F. Brenner, a Roman Catholic writer, states, "that thirteen hundred years was baptism generally and ordinarily performed by the immersion of a man under water; and only on extraordinary occasions was sprinkling or affusion permitted. These latter methods of baptism were called in question, and even prohibited."—Stuart, p. 361.

In the Greek church, it is well known, the practice of immersion is continued, without variation, till the present day.

In the English Episcopal church, immersion was practised until the beginning of the seventeenth century. In many old houses of worship, large baptisteries now exist, which were once used in baptism. The first liturgy, in 1547, enjoins a trine immersion, in case the child is not sickly. The present liturgy permits, though it does not require, immersion.

Luther would have introduced immersion into his church, if he had followed his own opinions. He says, after speaking of baptism as a symbol of death and resurrection, "On this account, I could wish that such as are to be baptized should be completely immersed into water, according to the meaning of the word and the signification of the ordinance; not because I think it necessary, but because it would be beautiful to have a full and perfect sign of so perfect and full a thing, as, also, without doubt, it was instituted by Christ."—Works, vol. i. p. 76, ed. 1551. (See Appendix to Professor Chase's Sermon before Boston Association, in 1828.)

It may be added here, that the Jews early practised the baptism of proselytes. It is not necessary to enter into the controversy respecting the origin of this practice. It is sufficient for the present purpose to say, that this baptism, as professor Stuart acknowledges, was performed by immersion, p. 354. If, then, the Jews borrowed the practice from the Christians, or if the Savior adopted a ceremony already known, it is, in either case, a strong proof that Christian baptism is immersion.

Other arguments might be adduced; but the limits of this article forbid us to proceed. Those which have been mentioned are, however, sufficient. If "all lexicographers and critics of any note" confess that baptizo means to immerse; if the usage, in the classics, in the Septuagint and Apocrypha, and in the New Testament, on other topics than baptism, clearly, and in numberless passages, refers to immersion, while not one passage undeniably means something else; if the figurative meaning of the word clearly includes the idea of overwhelming and burying; if the places selected for baptizing, in repeated instances mentioned in the New Testament, were large bodies of water; if it is "a thing made out," that the ancient churches practised immersion, and if the usage has been continued by all professed Christians till a recent period, and by large bodies of professed Christians till the present day;—the Baptists may well ask,—If the real nature of baptism is not ascertained to be immersion, is it possible to ascertain the meaning of any word or ceremony whatever? They think the case perfectly clear, and they believe that all Christians are bound, on the simplest principles of evidence, to come to the same conclusion.

II. THE SUBJECTS OF BAPTISM.

The second point which requires to be considered is of still greater importance—Who are the proper subjects of baptism?

The Baptists maintain, that true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ are the only proper subjects of baptism. Their reasons for this opinion are numerous. A few of them we will now state.

1. The first argument is drawn from the commission which the Savior gave to his ministers. As our authority to baptize is derived from the Savior alone, we must be governed by his will in determining who are to be admitted to the sacred rite. It is his prerogative to decide this point; and we are bound to follow implicitly his directions. What, then, is the commission? "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned," Mark 16: 15, 16. Here the qualifications of the persons to be baptized are clearly defined. They are first to be taught the truths of the gospel, and then those who believe are to be baptized. The language is plain—the condition is exactly specified—the relation between faith and baptism is unalterably established. What right have the ministers of Christ to depart from the plain letter of his commission, and admit to baptism those who do not and cannot believe?

2. Another argument is drawn from the examples of baptism in the Scriptures. John the Baptist required repentance, and faith in the coming Messiah, as qualifications for baptism, Matt. 3: 5—12. Luke 3: 3—9. Acts 19: 4. On the day of Pentecost, after Peter had preached the gospel to the multitude, "they that gladly received his word were baptized," Acts 2: 41. At Samaria, "when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women," Acts 8: 12. To the question of the eunuch, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" Philip replied, "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest," Acts 8: 37. Peter said, respecting Cornelius and his friends, "Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Acts 10: 47. To the question of the Philippian jailor, "What must I do to be saved?" Paul and Silas answered, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved and thy house." The subsequent verses state, that he and all his household were taught the truths of the gospel, that they all believed, and were all baptized, Acts 16: 30—34. It is asserted of Lydia, that before she was baptized, "the Lord opened her heart, that she attended to the things which were spoken of Paul," Acts 16: 14. At Corinth, "Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house; and many of the Corinthians, hearing, believed, and were baptized," Acts 18: 8. Such was the practical construction which the apostles placed on the commission of their Lord. In every case of baptism recorded in the Scriptures, some facts are stated, which assert or imply that the persons baptized were believers.

There is, on the other hand, not a single example in the New Testament of the baptism of an infant, nor one word which fairly implies it. "There is no example of baptism recorded in the Scriptures," says Mr. T. Boston, a Pedobaptist writer, (Works, p. 384,) "where any were baptized but such as appeared to have a saving interest in Christ." The cases of the baptism of households do not form an exception; for it is expressly said of the Philippian jailor and his household, and of Crispus and his house, that they all believed; (Acts 16: 34, and 18: 8.) and though the same assertion is not made respecting the households of Lydia and Stephanas, yet other circumstances are stated, which imply that none of the members of those families were infants. Many households are now baptized by Baptist ministers, which contain no infants. While, therefore, there is so much evidence that the apostles baptized none but believers, it is evident, as Neander admits, that "from the examples of the baptism of whole families, we can by no means infer the existence of infant baptism."—Bib. Repos. Ap. 1834, p. 273.

In the epistles, in which numerous questions respecting the discipline of the churches and the duties of different classes of persons are discussed, there is not a word which implies that infants were regarded as in any sense members of the visible family of Christ, as they would have been if they had been baptized. Children are repeatedly charged to obey their parents, and parents are commanded to train up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; but there is no hint at infant baptism. The passage I Cor. 7: 14, "The unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband; else were your children unclean, but now are they holy," has no bearing on the subject. It is plain that a pious wife cannot so "sanctify" an unbelieving husband, as that he can be entitled to baptism without personal faith. Neither can pious parents so make their children "holy," as that they can be entitled to baptism without personal faith. The meaning of the apostle is thus stated by the Rev. John L. Dagg, in a note to Pengilly's Guide to Baptism, as published by the Baptist General Tract society: "The unbelieving husband is not unclean, so that his wife may not lawfully dwell with him; the unbelieving wife is not unclean, so that her husband may not lawfully dwell with her. If they are unclean, then your children are unclean, and not one parent in the whole church must dwell with or touch his children until God shall convert them." If this interpretation is correct, this verse is a decided proof that infant baptism did not exist in the days of the apostles.

The passage in Matt. 19: 13, 14, and the parallel passages in Mark 10: 13, 14, and Luke 18: 15, 16, are sometimes quoted as sanctioning infant baptism. "Then were brought to Jesus little children, that he should put his hands on them and pray, and the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. And he laid his hands on them." This passage has no bearing on infant baptism. It cannot be proved that the children referred to were infants. The same word is used, (Mark 5: 39.) to designate a child twelve years old. The object for which the children were brought to the Savior, is distinctly stated:—"that he should put his hands on them and pray," in accordance with a Jewish custom, which attributed high value to the blessing of a person distinguished for age or piety. See Genesis 27, and 48: 14. We are told that the Savior actually did—"he laid his hands on them." There is no allusion to baptism. The expression, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven," manifestly refers to the dispositions of those who shall enter heaven, as in the verse which immediately succeeds in Luke: "Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no case enter therein."

3. Since, then, the commission and the practice of the apostles both confine baptism to believers, the Baptists require, that those who consider infants as proper subjects of baptism should produce from the Bible some plain precept which commands or permits infant baptism. The Savior alone can so modify his commission as to admit to baptism persons who do not believe. If he has modified it, the evidence must be produced from the Scriptures. If such evidence cannot be produced, the Baptists argue, that we have no more right to baptize persons who do not profess faith in Christ, than we have to neglect baptism altogether.

Can such evidence be furnished? Let us hear the confessions of Pedobaptists themselves. Dr. Woods, in his Lectures on Infant Baptism, says:—"It is a plain case, that there is no express precept respecting infant baptism in our sacred writings. The proof, then, that infant baptism is a divine institution must be made out in another way," lect. i. p. 11. Professor Stuart makes the same acknowledgment in stronger terms: "Commands, or plain and certain examples, in the New Testament, relative to it, [infant baptism] I do not find."—Bib. Rep. Ap. 1833, p. 385.

Other Pedobaptists have made the same concession. Bishop Burnet says, "There is no express precept or rule given in the New Testament for baptism of infants."—Exposition of Articles, art. xxvii.

If this is so, the Baptists think the case settled. They cannot believe any institution to be divine, for which there is in the Bible "no express precept," and of which there are "no plain and certain examples in the New Testament." To "make out the proof in another way," they consider to be unauthorized and dangerous. If a license be given to mere inference, the worst errors of popery may be sanctioned. The papist does not pretend to produce an "express precept," or "plain and certain examples," for many of his corrupt and pernicious doctrines and practices; but he can "make out the proof in another way," to his own satisfaction at least. He does not justify his practice of infant baptism by scriptural evidence only, but by the authority of the church; and he justly accuses the Protestant of inconsistency, who practises infant baptism and yet pretends to take the Scriptures as his only guide.

Among the other ways by which the practice is defended, the only one which can now be alluded to, and the one on which the greatest stress has been laid, is, that "the covenant with Abraham was a spiritual covenant, and that as such it included infants; that they were accordingly circumcised under the old dispensation; that baptism is a substitute for circumcision, and that consequently infants are to be baptized." The Baptists deny the truth of every part of this argument. They deny that there was any such thing as a church among the Jews, that is, a separate body of true saints. The whole nation were considered as one political body, and the rite of circumcision was a national mark of distinction, which all male Jews, whether pious or wicked, were required to possess. Male infants were accordingly circumcised, not because their parents were pious, but because they were Jews; and the Jews were required to circumcise their male servants, whether born in their houses or bought with their money, on precisely the same principle that they circumcised their children, viz., because those servants and children were now members of the Jewish nation. The Baptists deny that there is any proof that baptism is a substitute for circumcision. Not a word is said in the New Testament which justifies such a conclusion; and to infer such a substitution is a dangerous license, which virtually overthrows the authority of the Bible. Multitudes who had already been circumcised, were baptized by John and by the apostles. Why so, if baptism was merely a substitute for circumcision? We learn from Acts 21, that Paul was censured by many of the believing Jews, because he taught the Jews which were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying "that they ought not to circumcise their children," v. 21. How natural would it have been for Paul to appease the clamor and conciliate the prejudices of the Jews, by replying that baptism was a substitute for circumcision. Had this been the case, he ought to have taught the doctrine. We may be sure that he would have taught it. But we hear not a word from his lips on the subject.

In the fifteenth chapter of Acts we are informed, that a council was held at Jerusalem by the apostles and elders, to determine the important question, how far the Gentile converts were to be required to conform to Jewish usages. The decision was:—"It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things: that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication," v. 28, 29. "Thus," says Dr. Baldwin, (Chris. Bap. p. 24.) "by the unanimous voice of a council, comprising most if not all the apostles and elders of the whole Christian church, and by the approbation of the 'Holy Ghost,' we see circumcision put down, and no SUBSTITUTE proposed in its room! In this whole account there is not the most distant hint that baptism was to be practised in the room of circumcision. If these apostles and elders had understood the subject as our Pedobaptist brethren do, is it not perfectly unaccountable that they should not have mentioned it on this perplexing occasion? To me, I confess, the supposition is too unreasonable to be admitted."

If, however, baptism is a substitute for circumcision, then the Jewish example must be followed out, and male infants only must be baptized; all male infants must be baptized, and all male servants must be baptized, whatever may be their age or character. If the example is authoritative in one point, why not in all?

3. Another argument which proves that infant baptism was unknown to the apostles, is, that there is no evidence that it was practised in the churches for the first two centuries. No clear and undeniable allusion is made to it by any writer earlier than Tertullian, and there is some doubt whether even he has reference to mere infants.

Venema, in his Ecclesiastical Hist. t. iii. s. 2. § 108-9, says: "Tertullian has nowhere mentioned pedobaptism among the traditions or customs of the church that were publicly received and usually observed, for in his book, De Baptismo, [supposed to be written A. D. 204.] he dissuades from baptizing infants, and proves the delay of it to a more mature age to be preferred. Nothing is to be affirmed with certainty concerning the custom of the church before Tertullian, seeing there is not anywhere, in more ancient writers, that I know of, undoubted mention of infant baptism."

But it is sufficient to adduce the testimony of one of the most recent and most able ecclesiastical historians, Neander, who is professor of theology at Berlin, and is himself a Pedobaptist. After stating that baptism was, in the days of the apostles, performed by immersion, "as best adapted to express that which Christ intended to express by this symbol—the merging of the whole man into a new spirit and life," he says : " Since baptism was thus immediately connected with a conscious and voluntary accession to the Christian fellowship, and faith and baptism were always united, it is highly probable that baptism took place only in those cases where both could meet together, and that the custom of infant baptism was not practised in this age." " The lateness of the time when the first distinct mention of infant baptism is made, and the long continued opposition made to it, lead us to infer its non-apostolic origin."—Bib. Repos. Ap. 1834, p. 273-4.

Infant baptism was probably introduced into the church about the commencement of the third century, in connexion with other corruptions, which even then began to prepare the way for popery. A superstitious idea respecting the necessity of baptism to salvation led to the baptism of sick persons, and finally to the baptism of infants. Sponsors, holy water, anointing with oil, the sign of the cross, and a multitude of similar ceremonies, equally unauthorized by the Scriptures, were soon introduced. The church lost her simplicity and purity, her ministers became ambitious, and the darkness gradually deepened into the long and dismal night of papal despotism.

4. One other argument has great weight with the Baptists. They consider infant baptism as inconsistent with one of the fundamental principles of Christianity, viz. that every man is held responsible for his own conduct, and must be justified by his own individual faith. The piety of the parent cannot save the child, and the piety of the child cannot avail for the salvation of the parent. John the Baptist told the Jews that even their connexion with Abraham was an insufficient plea, Matt. 3: 9. The same principle is stated in Ezek. ch. 18. Repentance and faith are required of every individual, as the indispensable conditions of salvation. But infant baptism is founded on another principle. It supposes that the faith of the parent so far extends its benefit to the child, as to entitle him to become a visible member of the family of Christ. The child, then, owes this privilege, not to his own faith, but to that of his parent. Here is a very dangerous doctrine, the true result of which is seen in the popish indulgences, which are granted on the ground that the merits of one man can be transferred to another.

Neander, in the article already quoted, argues the improbability that Paul taught and practised infant baptism, because it would have seemed to contradict his great principle of justification by faith. This objection has not less importance now; and those who wish to maintain, in all its purity, the doctrine of justification by faith, and to preserve the church from the prevalence of popish errors, ought to renounce every thing which is not authorized by the plain and unperverted word of God. The Baptists stand on the firm Protestant principle—the principle of the Reformation—that the Bible alone is the standard and the guide for all Christians. Since, therefore, the commission of the Savior requires faith as a qualification for baptism; since the apostles, so far as we can ascertain their practice, baptized none but believers; since Pedobaptists themselves acknowledge that there is no express precept nor plain example in the Scriptures on the subject; since there is strong evidence that infant baptism was unknown in the apostolic age; and since it is inconsistent with the fundamental principle of justification by faith,—the Baptists are constrained to view infant baptism as an unscriptural corruption, and to maintain that true believers are the only proper subjects of baptism.

Having thus briefly presented a few of the reasons for the doctrines maintained by the Baptists, we may add, that they cannot conscientiously regard any persons as baptized who have not been immersed on a profession of their faith. Viewing, as most other Christians view, baptism, as a prerequisite to the participation of the Lord's supper, they cannot consistently consider those whom they are compelled to regard as unbaptized to be qualified to partake of the supper. They do not deny nor question the piety of their Pedobaptist brethren, but they must, as honest men, refuse to recognise as baptism what they view as an unauthorized ceremony. They desire the union of all Christians, and they believe that they are laboring the most effectually to promote that union, by endeavoring to uphold in love the pure principles of the Bible. May the God of Peace enable all his people to ascertain, and love, and practise the truth, that they may be one indeed.

DESIGN OF BAPTISM.

A due regard to the doctrinal import and design of this New Testament ordinance would probably go farther than all the learning and ingenuity which have been employed in managing the controversy on either side, to establish the mind of an inquirer, both as to the proper subjects and mode of administration. For it is plain that the value of signs depends chiefly upon the importance of the things signified. And as Dr. Owen observes, " there is nothing in religion that hath any efficacy for compassing an end, but it hath it from God's appointment of it to that purpose. God may in his wisdom appoint and accept of ordinances and duties unto one end, which he will refuse and reject when they are applied to another. To do any thing appointed unto an end, without aiming at that end, is no better than the not doing it at all, in some cases much worse." The design of baptism, therefore, as taught in the New Testament, and the practical uses to which it is there applied, ought to be thoroughly investigated by both ministers and people; in order that they may know and comply with the revealed intention of God in its appointment.

" It is generally agreed among divines," says the learned Venema, " that the communion of a believer with Christ, and the effects of his obedience, by which the guilt, the pollution and the punishment of sin are taken away, and so the remission of sin, sanctification and glorification are conferred, are presented to view in baptism; yet they do not sufficiently show the way and manner in which that representation is made, and frequently speak with but little consistency. If, in baptism, the appearance of nothing but washing presented itself to our consideration, the thing would be easy. For, seeing we are delivered from sin by the obedience of Christ, that would be readily understood by every one as the cause of our purification, and as represented by water, in which there is a cleansing virtue; especially as the Scripture usually comprehends it under the emblem of water. But washing is neither the only idea, nor, as I think, the principal one, of this institution."

The principal and most comprehensive design of this ordinance appears from the Scriptures to be, a SOLEMN, PUBLIC, AND PRACTICAL PROFESSION OF CHRISTIANITY. Thus Paul sums up the baptism of John in Acts 19: 4. " John verily baptized with the baptism of REPENTANCE, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on CHRIST JESUS." And thus he describes his own; (Gal. 3: 27.) " As many of you as have been baptized into CHRIST, HAVE PUT ON CHRIST." To the same purpose are the words of Peter on the day of Pentecost; " Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, IN THE NAME OF JESUS CHRIST." Hence also a rejection of baptism is by our Lord called a REJECTION OF THE COUNSEL OF GOD, that is, of Christianity. Luke 7: 30. Acts 20: 27. And the reception of baptism is represented as the act by which we JUSTIFY GOD; that is, practically approve his method of salvation by faith in the Messiah. Luke 7: 29 Hence, whatever may be said of baptism as it is now generally understood and practised, and of the personal religion of those who practise it, it is certain that it was originally appointed to be the boundary of visible Christianity.

But this general design of baptism comprehends many particulars. Christianity consists partly of truths to be believed, partly of precepts to be obeyed, and partly of promises to be hoped for; and this, its initiatory ordinance, is rich in significance in relation to them all. We are taught to regard it: 1. AS THE SOLEMN PROFESSION OF OUR FAITH IN THE TRINITY. John 1: 33. Matt. 3: 16, 17. 28: 19. Ephes. 2: 18. Tit. 3: 4-7. Particularly—of our adop- tion by the Father. Gal. 3: 26—29. 4: 1—7. John 1: 12, 13. 2 Cor. 6: 17, 18. 1 John 3: 1—3. Of our union to the Son. Acts 8: 35—39. Rom. 6: 3—14. Col. 2: 12, 13, 20. 3: 1—11. Matt. 20: 22, 23. 1 Pet. 3: 18—22. 1 Cor. 1: 30. Of our sanctification by the Spirit. John 3: 5—8. 7: 37—39. 14: 15—17, 26, 27. 16: 12—15. Acts 2: 38, 39. Rom. 8: 1—27. 2 Cor. 1: 21, 22. Gal. 3: 2, 3. 4: 6, 7. 5: 22—25. Ephes. 1: 11—14. 4: 30. 5: 9—2. AS THE PUBLIC PLEDGE OF THE RENUNCIATION AND REMISSION OF SINS. Mark 1: 4, 5. Acts 2: 38. 22: 16. Rom. 6: 4.—3. AS THE EXPRESSION OF OUR HOPE OF A FUTURE AND GLORIOUS RESURRECTION. Rom. 6: 5. Col. 3: 1—4. 1 Cor. 15: 29.—4. AS A VISIBLE BOND OF UNION AMONG CHRISTIANS. 1 Cor. 12: 3—31. Ephes. 4: 5. Baptism, therefore, is designed to give a sort of visible epitome of Christianity.

VII.—PERPETUITY OF THE LAW OF BAPTISM.

Although Christians have been generally agreed that baptism was delivered to the primitive churches as an ordinance of universal and perpetual obligation, yet there have been some, and two bodies of Christians in particular, who have on different grounds denied or questioned its perpetuity. (See articles QUAKERS, and ANTI-BAPTISTS, in this volume.) The first class consider all external forms, in which they include Baptism and the Lord's Supper, rather as obstructions than aids to spiritual worship; and hence interpret the apostolic commission, either of baptism with the Holy Ghost, or limit its duration to the close of the Jewish economy, as being rather a part of the baptism of John than of Christ. They quote in favor of these views, Matt. 3: 11. John 3: 30. 1 Cor. 12: 13. Ephes. 4: 5. and 1 Cor. 1: 17. The second class derive their opinion chiefly from the supposition that Christian baptism is a continuation of Jewish proselyte baptism; from which they argue that it ought not to be administered to any but converted Pagans, Mahometans, and others, who did not previously receive Christianity as the true religion.

Both of these classes of Christians have been requested to consider, 1. That the apostles themselves understood their commission of baptizing in water; as is clear from their practice recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. 2. That to baptize with the Holy Ghost, or put the soul under his divine influence, is the prerogative of Christ alone. John 1: 33. 8: 37—39. Acts 1: 4—8. 2: 1—4. 3. That so far from regarding the baptism of the Spirit as superseding the baptism of water, Peter, in the house of Cornelius, argues it as a divine argument of the propriety of the water; Who can forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord. Acts 10. 4. That this, therefore, is "the one baptism" to which the apostle refers as being a visible bond of union among Christians; the baptism of the Holy Ghost, (superior as it is in importance,) being so called, not literally, but by a rich and beautiful metaphor, indicating the overwhelming abundance of his holy influences and endowments. Be ye filled with the Spirit. Ephes. 5: 18. John 7: 37—39. 5. That the Christian law of baptism could not have been derived from that of Jewish proselytes; because many such proselytes were baptized, as the Ethiopian eunuch, Cornelius, and others, which proves either that the Christian administrators knew no such custom as proselyte baptism, or that they rebaptized those who had received it. 6. That the apostles in their writings draw from the baptism of their converts the most powerful motives to a life of spiritual holiness. 7. That our Lord himself honored the ordinance by his own example; and that while it is safe to obey and imitate him, it must be dangerous to set aside or slight even the least of his commandments. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you. John 15: 14. He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me. John 14: 21. Lastly, Christians are exhorted to hold fast the profession of their faith without wavering, and to draw nigh to the throne of grace, having their hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and their bodies washed with pure water; which they cannot do unless baptized. Heb. 10: 22, 23. Whence it follows that baptism in water, however and to whomsoever it is to be administered, is a Christian ordinance of perpetual obligation.

Others have stated the argument thus. We have seen that Christianity and its laws are of perpetual obligation; that baptism is a part of Christianity in its complete form; that the example of Christ in this particular is binding on all his disciples, through all ages; that the perpetuity of baptism is implied in the nature of the ordinance, as an act of worship, a monument of the Savior's death, burial and resurrection, a symbol of the renunciation of sin, and the new birth to righteousness, a solemn self-dedication to the Savior, a public recognition of our adoption as the children of God, and of our hope of a glorious resurrection; that the promise connected with the institution prophetically declares its perpetuity; that baptism is wrought in the law of the institution with some other things which are acknowledged to be of perpetual obligation, as teaching and believing; and that the apostles understood it to be perpetual, and derived from it motives to holiness, which are now powerless upon any other supposition than that the ordinance is still to be regarded. Now in view of all these things, what shall we say? Can further evidence be necessary? If there be any who still doubt the perpetual obligation of the ordinance, we would respectfully put to them the following questions: Is there in the law of the institution any thing which appears to limit the obligation of obedience to time, or place, or nation? Is not the language of the commission as exempt as language can be, from all such limitations? Was this law ever repealed by the same authority which enacted it? If it were, it can certainly be shown when, and where, and how; and we ask for the evidence. We ask again, Has it (as the seventh day Sabbath, has) been virtually repealed, by being superseded by another ordinance? If so, what is its name? and whence its origin? and where its authority? We ask once more, Do not the same reasons exist for its continuance, as did for its appointment? Miraculous gifts were a seal to the commission; they accredited the apostles as messengers of God; but now the proof of the divine origin of Christianity is complete, and the miraculous powers have ceased. They have ceased, because the same reason for which they were given, does not continue. But the same doctrinal and the same practical uses of baptism continue; and why should the ordinance be laid aside? Why should it be regarded by any disciple of the crucified Savior as antiquated or obsolete? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism in the likeness of his death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we also should walk in newness of life. Rom. 6: 4, 5.

Need we remark then, how sacred is the obligation which rests upon men of learning, and especially ministers of the gospel, to instruct the disciples of Christ truly, in relation to their Lord's command and their personal duty, on this point as on every other. If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle? Let an awful fear of God hold a torch before us in all our inquiries, and the love of Christ constrain us to feed his sheep, and to feed his lambs. EDITOR.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD. The argument of St. Paul, (1 Cor. 15: 29.) "If the dead rise not at all, what shall they do who are baptized for the dead," has excited many different ideas in the minds of interpreters. Bochart has collected no less than fifteen senses in which it has been understood, or rather in which learned men have confessed that they did not understand it. Yet doubtless it was clear and cogent, not only in the view of the apostle, but of the Corinthian church whom he addressed. The three senses most prominent are, 1. It is an appeal founded on the conduct of those who were converted and baptized in view of the martyrdom of Christians; thus fearlessly filling up the ranks of the dead, from a confidence in their glorious resurrection. This sense is adopted by Doddridge. 2. It is an appeal founded on the figurative sense of the word baptize, that is, to overwhelm with sufferings; as in Matt. 20: 22, 23. This sense is preferred by professors Stuart and Robinson. Yet it seems to leave the phrase obscure, for what is the meaning of "overwhelmed in sufferings for the dead"? 3. It is an appeal to the Corinthians, founded on the usual symbolic sense of the ordinance of Christian baptism; as in Rom. 6: 4. Col. 3: 12, where the apostle explains it to signify, not only a death and burial, but also a resurrection from the dead. The meaning of the apostle then is this:

"If there be no resurrection, why express such a belief in the use of the ordinance of baptism? What shall they do who have made this solemn profession of their faith and hope, if there be no corresponding reality?" This last sense is preferred by the learned Neander, and seems most natural.

BAPTISM OF THE HOLY GHOST; that overwhelming abundance of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, which our Savior, after his ascension, poured forth upon his disciples. The basis of this beautiful metaphor is found in the literal signification of baptism, which is to cover one completely with any kind of element, particularly water. So the apostles and primitive believers are said to have been, not only in a degree subjected to the influence of the Holy Spirit, but filled with it, immersed in it, as in a new element of existence, life, perception, feeling, and action. A measure of the same divine influence they had received before; but this was a far more copious and ample communication of it, to qualify them for their public labors, as well as to elevate their personal character, and to promote their spiritual enjoyment. Nor does this rich donation of spiritual blessings appear to have been restricted to miraculous gifts on the one hand, or to the primitive believers on the other. For it is represented, 1. As the prerogative of Christ's personal dignity. Matt. 3: 11. Mark 1: 8. Luke 3: 16. John 1: 15—17, 32, 33. 2. As the grand distinction of his glorious reign. John 7: 37—39. 16: 7. 3. As the special promise of the new covenant. Luke 24: 49. Acts 1: 4—8. 2: 1—4, 16—21, 33, 38, 39. Heb. 8: 6—12. 4. As the privilege and seal of every believer. Ephes. 1: 13, 14. 4: 30. 5: 18. Gal. 4: 6. 5: 16, 25. 5. As the proper object of expectation and prayer. Isa. 32: 15—17. 44: 3—5. Luke 11: 5—13. Phil. 1: 19. 6. As comprehending gifts and graces, varied in kind and degree, to supply the necessities of the church, according to the will and wisdom of the Spirit himself. 1 Cor. 12: 1—13, 31. 14: 1. Ephes. 5: 9. 4: 30. Rcm. 8: 9, 13, 14. 14: 17. 15: 13.

From these passages it appears that the Baptism of the Holy Ghost is not to be confounded, on the one hand, with regeneration, as it sometimes has been; nor, on the other, restricted to miraculous powers, and of course to the primitive age; but is to be sought in the more copious communication of such gifts and graces as are needed in the present condition of the Christian church, by ourselves and others. Whatever of superior illumination, sanctity, or fervor; whatever of heavenly purity of motive, clearness of perception, tenderness of affection, strength of purpose, or energy of character; whatever of divine peace, and consolation, and hope, and joy, drawn from the things eternal and unseen, we at any time need; whatever is necessary to make the gospel effectual to its end, among men—is to be sought and expected of God through Christ, the great Dispenser of spiritual blessings. Of his fulness have all received, and grace for grace. The same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full. John 1: 16, 33. 16: 24.

BAPTISM OF FIRE. The words of John in describing the baptism of Christ, (Matt. 3: 11), "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," have been variously interpreted. Some have referred the words "with fire," to a purgatory after death; others to the unquenchable fire of hell into which the wicked shall be plunged after the final judgment; others to the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, in the form of fiery tongues. Others still consider the words, and with fire, as exegetical, and interpret them of that celestial fervor and zeal which the baptism of the Holy Ghost conferred upon those who received it. And the structure of the original favors this sense, as do also the facts of the case; though, perhaps, not to the exclusion of the external sign mentioned in Acts 2: 3.

BAPTISM OF BLOOD. Tertullian gave this name to martyrdom before baptism, and to the death of martyrs in general. By him and other fathers after him, it was thought to have a peculiar efficacy to purify from sins; from which mistaken notion it was urgently recommended to believers. But the blood of Christ alone cleanseth us from all sin. 1 John 1: 7. Rev. 1: 5. 7: 14.

BAPTISTERIES. It would seem that the primitive

Christians were under a necessity of baptizing in open waters, or, where they had not private baths of their own, of constructing baptisteries for the express purpose of administering baptism. Authors are not agreed about the time when the first baptisteries were built. All agree that the first were, like the manners and condition of the people, simple, and merely for use; and that in the end, they rose to as high a degree of elegant superstition, as enthusiasm could invent.

Baptisteries are to be first sought for, where they were first wanted, in towns and cities; for writers of unquestionable authority assert, that the primitive Christians continued to baptize in rivers, pools, and baths, till about the middle of the third century. Justin Martyr says that they went with the catechumens to a place where there was water, and Tertullian adds, that candidates for baptism made a profession of faith twice, once in the church, that is, before the congregation in the place where they assembled to worship, and then again when they came to the water; and it was quite indifferent whether it were the sea or a pool, a lake, a river, or a bath. About the middle of the third century, baptisteries began to be built: but there were none within the churches until the sixth century; and it is remarkable that though there were many churches in one city, yet, (with a few exceptions,) there was but one baptistery. This simple circumstance, as popery advanced, was perverted into a title to dominion; and the congregation nearest the baptistery, or to whom in some places it belonged, and by whom it was lent to the other churches, pretended that all the others ought to consider themselves dependent on them.

By a baptistery of the fourth century, (which must not be confounded with a modern font,) is to be understood an octagon building, with a cupola roof, resembling the dome of a cathedral, adjacent to a church, but no part of it. All the middle part of this building was one large hall, capable of containing a great multitude of people. The sides were parted off, and divided into rooms; and in some, rooms were added without-side, in the fashion of cloisters. In the middle of the great hall was an octagon bath, which strictly speaking, was the baptistery, and from which the whole building received its name. Some had been natural rivulets before the buildings were erected over them, and the pool was contrived to retain water sufficient for dipping, and to discharge the rest. Others were supplied by pipes; and where baptism was performed on naked subjects, (as from the fourth to the sixteenth century was the common practice of the Catholic as well as the Greek churches, a practice founded on certain fanciful notions of the fathers,) the water was conveyed into one or more of the side rooms, that the baptism of the women might be performed apart from that of the men. Some of the surrounding rooms were vestries; others school-rooms, both for the instruction of youth, and for transacting the affairs of the church. Councils have been held in the great halls of these buildings. It was necessary they should be capacious; for as baptism was now administered only twice a year, the candidates were numerous, and the spectators of each sex more numerous than they. It is an opinion generally received, and very probable, that some of the names given to these buildings, were borrowed from the memorable pool of Bethesda. The Syriac and Persian versions call Bethesda a place of baptistery.

The most ancient baptistery is that of St. John Lateran. At Rome, there were many; in other Italian cities, only one at first; in the middle ages two, a unitarian, and trinitarian; in modern times, only one, the trinitarian. Some are yet standing. The memory of others is preserved in records and monumental fragments. The place of others is now supplied by fonts within the churches. At Constantinople, the baptistery of St. Sophia was one of the appendages of that splendid church, erected by Constantine, and rebuilt by Justinian with unrivalled magnificence. And it is worthy of notice, that the canon laws, the officers, the established rituals, the sermons of the prelates, and the baptism of the archbishops themselves, prove that baptism was here administered, by true immersion indeed, but only to instructed persons, whether pagans or the descendants of Christians. It would be easy, says Mr. Robinson, to make similar remarks on the churches at Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and many more; for their baptisteries resembled that of St. Sophia, and their baptism was that of believers by trine immersion.—Robinson's History of Baptism; Usage; Mosheim; Ciampini Vet. Monumenta.

BAPTISTS; a well-known denomination of Christians, distinguished by their simple adherence to the Scriptures, by their views of the spiritual constitution of the Christian church, and of the holy design, subjects, and mode of baptism. In regard to this ordinance of Christ, "they have ever held," says Mr. Benedict, their historian, "that a personal profession of faith, and an immersion in water, are essential to baptism." Some of their arguments for these opinions may be found under the article BAPTISM. In regard to the constitution of the Christian church, while they believe in the existence of a universal or catholic church, composed of the whole body of believers in Christ in all nations and ages, they think that the Christian church, properly so called, was not visibly organized in the family of Abraham, nor in the wilderness of Sinai; but by the ministry of Christ himself and of his apostles; and that it was then constituted of such, and such only, as made a credible profession of repentance from sin, and faith in the Savior. All others they consider to be constitutionally excluded. That the primitive churches were uniformly organized on these principles; that they embraced only visible saints, and were essentially voluntary compacts of piety, virtue, and brotherly love, they think perfectly plain from the New Testament. This new and beautiful organization, so unlike all establishments founded on national principles, they believe to be the kingdom of God, foretold by the prophet Daniel, and announced by John the Baptist as at hand. Dan. 2: 44. And in the days of those kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. Matt. 3: 2. 4: 17. et passim.

Hence the Baptists reject the baptism of infants, and national church establishments, as obvious innovations, incompatible with the spiritual purity of the visible church of Christ. Hence they distinguish between the covenant of grace in the Messiah, and the covenant of circumcision; which the Pædo-baptists consider as one, though twenty-four years elapsed between them. Gen. 15: Gen. 17: Gal. 3: Hence also they reject all claims of the civil magistrate to any but a civil jurisdiction; though willing and peaceable subjects to civil authority, where the rights of conscience are not involved. Hence, in every age, their strong attachment to liberty; especially to religious liberty, whose principles they were the first to proclaim, and the first also to exemplify. Their principles have subjected them to persecution from age to age, and to such principles they have counted it a glory to be martyrs. Though their own blood has flowed freely, they have never shed the blood of others. Indeed, civil persecution of any kind, on their principles, is impossible. And to them was allowed the happiness of establishing in this country, in 1636, a code of laws, "in which," says Judge Story, "we read for the first time since Christianity ascended the throne of the Cæsars, the declaration that 'conscience should be free, and men should not be punished for worshipping God in the way they were persuaded he required.'" This declaration Rhode Island has never departed from; and in it she has been since followed by all the United States. That wretched doctrine of the union of church and state, by which Christianity has been made the minister of every wrong, that boasted alliance on which so many encomiums have been lavished, they have ever regarded as a foul corruption, inconsistent with the very nature of that kingdom which is not of this world, destructive of the very purposes of the Christian church, and in effect "little more than a compact between the priest and the magistrate to betray the liberties of mankind, both civil and religious." (Complete Works of Robert Hall, vol. ii. p. 22.) Christians of these sentiments have existed in every age, and their number, as Mr. Benedict observes, has been larger than their friends generally imagine, or their opposers were ever willing to acknowledge. Among the most distinguished are Berengarius, Peter de Bruis, Henry, Arnold of Brescia, Lollard, Wickliffe, Tyndal, Menno, Dudith, Schyn, Tombes, Canne, Grantham, Milton, Bunyan, Delame, Gale, Gill, Stenact, Booth, Entercworth, Giford, Ryland, Carey, Marshman, Ward, Fuller, Hall, Foster, Gregory, Roger Williams, Backus, Stillman, Baldwin, Staughton, Judson, &c.

Origin, History, &c. It has been asserted that the Baptists originated in Germany about the year 1522, at the beginning of the Reformation. It is true that no denomination of Protestants can trace the origin of its present name, farther back than about the time of the Reformation; and most of them have originated since that period. And it appears to be true that the name of Baptists, by which this people have since been known, was then first assumed, probably in opposition to that of Anabaptists, with which their enemies were continually reproaching them. (See ANABAPTISTS.) It is not, however, the history of a name, but the prevalence of principles, which is the just object of attention with the student of ecclesiastical history. The Baptists do not pretend that the primitive saints were called Baptists, but that all the primitive Christians were what would now be called by this name; and that there always has been a people on earth, from the introduction of Christianity, who have held the leading sentiments by which they now are, and always have been, distinguished, is a point which they most firmly believe, and undertake to prove. In so doing, they attempt no wrong to any other denomination in Christendom. Their object, says Benedict, is not to show what is not true respecting others, but what is true concerning themselves. They do not deny that Episcopalians can find bishops, and the Presbyterians elders or presbyters, and the Methodists zeal, and the Quakers inward light, among the primitive Christians; neither do they doubt that the Congregationalists or Independents have good grounds for thinking that the apostolic churches were of their belief respecting church government. They only ask that terms should be properly explained. With most denominations they find something with which they can agree, and their hearts cleave in love to all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. And though compelled in some few points to differ from them all, it is only that they may with a pure conscience contend for the faith, and keep the ordinances as they were delivered to the saints. Conscientious fidelity to Christ, and an ardent desire by every lawful means to win others to the same fidelity, they think, so far from deserving the name of sectarianism, is the very essence of true catholicism.

Innumerable volumes have been written under the title of Church History; but, after all, we know but very little of the real church of Christ for many hundred years. We have very ample accounts of the Antichristian church, that false pretender, in unhallowed alliance with the kings of the earth, and drunken with the blood of the saints; but the history of the uncorrupted church, which maintained the word, worship, and ordinances of Christ, while all the world was wondering after the beast, is enveloped in the obscurity of that retreat which God prepared for her in the wilderness. It is astonishing to perceive how far even most Protestants are from acknowledging the whole truth on this subject. So deeply has the corrupt union of church and state, under which they still live, blinded their eyes, that Protestant writers still persist in styling the history of the papal power, for example, the history of the Christian church. Against this the Baptists protest. They believe, with the ancient Waldenses, that "the church of Rome is the whore of Babylon;" and "that only is the church of Christ, which bears the pure doctrine of Christ, and observes the ordinances instituted by him, in whatsoever place it exists." (Waldensian Confession of the twelfth century.) Mosheim, with all his violent prejudices against the Baptists, in relating the history of the primitive church, has given a description which will not apply to his own church, the Lutheran, nor to any sect in Christendom except the Baptists. "The churches in those early times," he observes, "were entirely independent, none of them subject to any foreign jurisdiction, but each one governed by its own rulers and laws. For though the churches founded by the apostles, had this particular deference shown them, that they were consulted in difficult and doubtful cases, yet they had no juridical authority, no sort of supremacy over the others, nor the least right to enact laws for them." "A bishop during the first and second century was a person who had the care of one Christian assembly. In this assembly he acted not so much with the authority of a master, as with the zeal and diligence of a faithful servant." "Baptism was administered in the first century without the public assemblies, in places appointed for that purpose, and was performed by the immersion of the whole body in water." Mr. Robinson, after the most diligent research, not only confirms these statements of Mosheim, but says expressly, "All this time they were Baptist churches; and though all the fathers of the four first ages, down to Jerome, were of Greece, Syria, and Africa, and though they gave great numbers of histories of the baptism of adults, yet there is not one record of the baptism of a child till the year 370, when Galates, the dying son of the Arian emperor Valens, was baptized by order of the monarch, who swore he would not be contradicted. The age of the prince is uncertain, and the assigning of his illness as the cause of his baptism, indicates clearly enough that infant baptism was not in practice."

But the primitive churches in process of time became corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. This corruption, and the great apostasy to which it led, had been foretold in the Scriptures; (see article ANTI-CRIST,) and even in the days of the apostles, the mystery of iniquity did already work. When in the third century, the discipline and morals of the principal churches became altogether relaxed, such as had the purity of the Redeemer's kingdom at heart, after struggling in vain to resist the torrent of corruption, gradually separated themselves from a community which had become unworthy of the Christian name. Though these early Protestant dissenters were confounded with heretics by the prevailing party, which assumed the name of the Catholic church; yet it is certain, that their faith was scriptural and orthodox, and that among them we must look for the humble, pure, and persecuted church of Christ. Such, for example, were the Novatians at Rome; the Donatists in Africa; the Arians and Paulicians in Greece; the Carthari, or Puritans, of Germany; the Paterines of Italy; and the Waldenses of France, and other countries, a succession of whom continued up to the time of the Reformation. (See WALDENSES.)

GREAT BRITAIN. The Baptists in England form one of the three denominations of Protestant Dissenters. They separate from the Episcopal Establishment for the same reasons as their brethren of the other denominations, with whom they are united, and from additional motives resulting from their particular tenets respecting baptism. The constitution of their churches and their mode of worship are congregational or independent; in the exercise of which they are protected, in common with other dissenters, by the act of toleration. Previous to this, they were liable to pains and penalties as Non-conformists, and often suffered for their peculiar sentiments as Baptists.

In the reign of Henry VIII., some of them were burnt, and others banished. In the reign of Elizabeth, they were subjected to imprisonment; and in that of James, they fled into Holland. William Sawtre was the first who in this country suffered at the stake for his religious opinions, in 1401, and who was supposed to deny infant baptism; and Edward Wightman, a Baptist, of Burton-upon-Trent, was the last person that suffered this cruel kind of death in England: so that this denomination had the honor of both leading the way and bringing up the rear of all the martyrs who were burnt alive in England; besides which, a great number of those who suffered death for their religion in the two hundred intervening years were of the Baptist denomination.

The Baptists are distinguished into two denominations, which have but little communication with one another; namely, the Particular and the General Baptists.

THE PARTICULAR BAPTISTS are so denominated, from their embracing the Calvinistic system, which includes in it, as a leading article, the doctrine of particular redemption, though there are many among them who admit the universality of the atonement. The Calvinistic or Particular Baptists are by far the most numerous; their congregations in England and Wales, in 1832, amounting to above twelve hundred. They have four public academies for the education of young men for the ministry, at Bristol, Stepney, Bradford, and Abergavenny; and they have long enjoyed two exhibitions for students, to be educated for four years at one of the universities in Scotland, given them by Dr. Ward, of Gresham college. In 1792, they established the important Mission to India, which promises so much good to all the nations of the East, and which has been liberally assisted by the contributions of other denominations. Other missions, at home, in Africa, the West Indies, Ireland, and France, are also supported by this body, at an expense of eighty thousand dollars annually.

THE GENERAL BAPTISTS maintain the doctrine of general redemption, and the other points of the Arminian system; and are agreed with the Particular Baptists only on the subject of baptism, worship, and church discipline. The founder of this denomination is said to have been a Mr. Smith, an Episcopalian clergyman; but resigning his living in the church, he went over to Holland, where his principles were warmly opposed by Messrs. Ainsworth and Robinson; the former then pastor of the Browns or Independents at Amsterdam, and the latter of those at Leyden. About the year 1611, this subdivision of Baptists published a confession of faith, which is said to have diverged much farther from Calvinism than those now called Arminians would approve.

The General Baptists have of late been distinguished into the Old and New Connexion. The old General Baptists have continued progressively to decline. Four of their congregations in London were some years ago united in one. Socinianism has so far reduced their numbers that, under its influence, they are likely to become extinct. For the present, however, they hold a general assembly in London, on the Tuesday in Whitsun-week, when a sermon is preached, and the affairs of their churches are taken into consideration.

Towards the year 1770, a body of General Baptists arose chiefly in the midland counties, which reverted to the doctrinal principles originally espoused by that denomination. These, as they are more orthodox than the others, are also much more zealous, more numerous, and more flourishing. They are quite distinct from the old General Baptists, and are known by the name of "the New Connexion." Their congregations amount to one hundred and fourteen, and their annual association is held at different places by rotation. In the year 1798, an evangelical academy was opened, and placed under the care of the Rev. Dan Taylor; but its patronage has been very small. Lately, it has been removed from London to Wisbeach in Lincolnshire, where its prospects are encouraging, though the connexion yet experiences the want of able ministers. This society also has established a mission in India.

THE SCOTTISH BAPTISTS are of a more recent date, and differ in various respects from the English Baptists. No trace can be found of a Baptist church in Scotland, excepting one which appears to have been formed out of the soldiers of Cromwell's army, previous to 1765; when a church was settled at Edinburgh, under the pastoral care of Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Archibald McLean. Others have since been formed at Dundee, Glasgow, Paisley, Perth, Largo, Dumfries, and in most of the principal towns of Scotland. There are also churches in several towns in England, holding the principles of the Scottish Baptists, and connected with them, particularly in London, Nottingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Preston, Carlisle, Beverley, &c.

They think that the order of public worship which uniformly obtained in the apostolic churches, is clearly set forth in Acts 2: 42—47, and therefore they endeavor to follow it out to the utmost of their power. They require a plurality of elders in every church, administer the Lord's supper, and make contributions for the poor, every first day of the week. The prayers and exhortations of the brethren form a part of their church order, under the direction and control of the elders, to whom it exclusively belongs to preside in conducting the worship, to rule in cases of discipline, and to labor in the word and doctrine, in distinction from the brethren exhorting one another. The elders are all laymen, generally chosen from among the brethren; but when circumstances require, are supported by their contributions. They approve also of persons who are properly qualified for it, being appointed by the church to preach the Gospel and baptize, though not vested with any pastoral charge.

For several years after their first setting out, the Baptist churches in Scotland were all of one faith and order; owned each other as sister churches, and had fellowship one with another in the institutions of the Gospel, as did also the different societies in England that stood connected with them. But of late years, numerous Baptist societies have started up in different parts of Scotland, which, though they retain much of the doctrinal sentiments, and of the social practices of the original churches, yet are unhappily divided on some points of minor importance, chiefly respecting the administration of the Lord's supper. These latter have sprung up chiefly out of what, in Scotland, is termed the Tabernacle Connexion; that is, from the societies gathered by the ministry and means of Messrs. James and Robert Haldane. Setting out upon the principle of Pædo-baptism, numbers of them in process of time changed their views on the article of Baptism, and formed themselves into churches of that denomination, independent of the parent stock. Hence much confusion has arisen among the Scottish Baptist churches, which has much defaced the beauty of the profession in that quarter. This evil has also been greatly heightened in consequence of divisions which have taken place among the original Scotch Baptist churches themselves, occasioned by a sentiment getting in among them, that the Lord's supper is not peculiarly a church ordinance, nor the administration of it a matter which belongs exclusively to the pastoral office; but that, on the contrary, it is the duty of any two or three persons, who may come together to worship God on the first day of the week, to take the Lord's supper, though none of them be a pastor. The adoption of this principle has occasioned considerable separations from the parent societies, and introduced many divisions and subdivisions among them; an evil which time and further experience, it is hoped, will rectify. For a more detailed account of the General Baptists, the reader may consult Mr. Adam Taylor's History of the General Baptists, and his Life of Mr. Dan Taylor. And for a fuller view of the doctrinal sentiments and social religious practices of the Scottish Baptists, he is referred to The Works of Mr. Arch. McLean, particularly his Illustration of Christ's Commission to his Apostles; Mr. J. A. Haldane's View of Social Worship, &c.; and Mr. W. Braidwood's Letters on Various Subjects, relating chiefly to Christian Fellowship and Church Order. IRELAND. In Dublin, &c., Baptist churches have existed for one hundred and eighty years. Of late, they increase more rapidly than in times past, though the exact number is not known.

UNITED STATES. About ten years after the settlement of New England, Roger Williams, the celebrated divine of Salem, embraced the sentiments of the Baptists, for which he was banished to Rhode Island. The first Baptist church in the United States was founded by him at Providence, Rhode Island, in 1639. The first minister ever settled in New Hampshire was a Baptist, Hanserd Knollys. He took charge of the first church in Dover, in 1635, but returned to England in 1639. His character has been injured by most New England historians, but is vindicated by Cotton Mather and Neale. Some of the first settlers in Massachusetts, Mather says, were Baptists; "and as holy, watchful, fruitful, and heavenly people, as perhaps any in the world;" but the first church they attempted to form was forcibly broken up by the magistrates, and the members fined, by the General Court, in 1639. Five years afterwards, a legislative act was passed for the suppression of the obnoxious sect, "but with what success," says Mr. Hubbard, "it is hard to say; all men being naturally inclined to pity them that suffer." Letters of remonstrance from Sir Henry Vane and Sir Richard Saltonstall, then in England, had no effect in arresting the hand of persecution; "the bloody tenet" was carried into operation upon the Baptists and Quakers; and such was the dreadful blindness it produced in some of the best of men, that Christians—Protestants—Puritans—in the light of the seventeenth century—were beheld resorting to fines, and prisons, and whipping posts, and gibbets, to break down the consciences of their brethren, for whom Christ died! But God, who is rich in mercy, caused good to arise out of evil. The persecutions inflicted on Messrs. Holmes, Clark, and Crandal, drew the attention of President Dunster of Cambridge to the question in dispute; and he became a convert to Baptist principles, though at the loss of his high office. His preaching against infant baptism led Mr. Thomas Gould to examine the subject; whose inquiries issued in founding the first Baptist church in Boston, in 1665. But the legal opposition, in this state, and the "glorious liberties" of Rhode Island which invited removal, so retarded their progress, that only eighteen Baptist churches were found in this state a century afterwards, at the commencement of the revolutionary war. Under the new government, though for some time not favored with equal rights, their circumstances were greatly improved and their numbers rapidly increased. This was the case also in the other States of the Union; until they have become, it is supposed, the most numerous denomination of Christians in the United States.

Besides the Regular or Associated Baptists, who are in sentiment moderate Calvinists, there are several smaller bodies who adopt the same views of baptism, but have no direct connection with them. The Seventh-day Baptists are mostly Calvinistic; but the Free-Will Baptists are supposed to be inclined to Arminianism; and the Christians, a sect which arose among them about thirty years since, with few exceptions, deny the Trinity. Formerly, the Free-Will and the Christian Baptists were connected together on the principles of Free or Mixed Communion; but latterly, a separation has taken place, similar to that of the New Connexion in England. These denominations will be found under their proper names.

The Baptists of all denominations being independent or congregational in their form of church government, their ecclesiastical assemblies disclaim all right to interfere with the concerns of individual churches. Their public meetings by delegation from different churches, are held for the purpose of mutual advice and improvement, but not for the general government of the whole body.

The Associated Baptists in this country meet annually in associations, and state conventions, to promote missions, education, and other benevolent objects. Every three years there is a meeting of the Baptist General Convention of the United States, which was formed at Philadelphia in 1814, and is restricted by its constitution to the promotion of foreign missions. The American Baptist Home Mission Society, formed in 1832, is chiefly designed to supply the wants of the great valley of the Mississippi. They have also a General Tract Society at Philadelphia. All these organizations, of course, are voluntary and free; the suggestions of brotherly love and philanthropic wisdom, not the enactments of ecclesiastical power. So long as they continue on this footing, and are watched over by a vigilant prudence, they do not seem liable to the abuses of clerical power, which in former ages corrupted the churches from the simplicity which is in Christ; while by combining their counsels, affections and prayers, it enables the whole body to act with tenfold advantage, energy and success, in advancing the Redeemer's kingdom on earth. They sustain missions in Burmah, Siam, France, Western Africa, and among the American Indians.

They have already established five or six colleges, numerous academies and manual labor schools, and six theological institutions, in different parts of the United States, which are in a flourishing condition. In New England alone, they have three hundred students preparing for the Christian ministry, and in the rest of the States perhaps more than double that number.

The number of Regular Baptists in America, as reported in Allen's Register for 1833, was as follows: 309 associations; 5458 churches; 3204 ordained ministers; 402,863 communicants. About 50,000 communicants were added to the churches by baptism in 1832. Connected with this denomination is a population of not far from three millions of souls; embracing a respectable share of the wealth, talent, learning, and influence of the country, as well as one fifth of its population.

The following brief Declaration of Faith, with the Church Covenant, was recently published by the Baptist Convention of New Hampshire, and is believed to express, with little variation, the general sentiments of the body in the United States.

I. OF THE SCRIPTURES.—We believe the Holy Bible was written by men divinely inspired, and is a perfect treasure of heavenly instruction; that it has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth without any mixture of error for its matter; that it reveals the principles by which God will judge us; and therefore is, and shall remain to the end of the world, the true centre of Christian union, and the supreme standard by which all human conduct, creeds and opinions should be tried.

II. OF THE TRUE GOD.—That there is one, and only one, true and living God, whose name is JEHOVAH, the Maker and Supreme Ruler of heaven and earth; inexpressibly glorious in holiness; worthy of all possible honor, confidence and love; revealed under the personal and relative distinctions of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; equal in every divine perfection, and executing distinct out harmonious offices in the great work of redemption.

III. OF THE FALL OF MAN.—That man was created in a state of holiness, under the law of his Maker, but by voluntary transgression fell from that holy and happy state; in consequence of which all mankind are now sinners, not by constraint but choice; being by nature utterly void of that holiness required by the law of God, wholly given to the gratification of the world, of Satan, and of their own sinful passions, and therefore under just condemnation to eternal ruin, without defence, or excuse.

IV. OF THE WAY OF SALVATION.—That the salvation of sinners is wholly of grace, through the mediatorial offices of the Son of God, who took upon him our nature, yet without sin; honored the law by his personal obedience, and made atonement for our sins by his death; being risen from the dead, he is now enthroned in heaven; and uniting in his wonderful person the tenderest sympathies with divine perfections, is every way qualified to be a suitable, a compassionate, and an all-sufficient Savior.

V. OF JUSTIFICATION.—That the great Gospel blessing, which Christ of his fulness bestows on such as believe in Him, is justification; that justification consists in the pardon of sin and the promise of eternal life, on principles of righteousness; that it is bestowed not in consideration of any works of righteousness which we have done, but solely through his own redemption and righteousness; that it brings us into a state of most blessed peace and favor with God, and secures every other blessing needful for time and eternity.

VI. OF THE FREEDOM OF SALVATION.—That the blessings of salvation are made free to all by the Gospel; that it is the immediate duty of all to accept them by a cordial and obedient faith; and that nothing prevents the salvation of the greatest sinner on earth, except his own voluntary refusal to submit to the Lord Jesus Christ; which refusal will subject him to an aggravated condemnation.

VII. OF GRACE IN REGENERATION.—That in order to be saved, we must be regenerated or born again; that regeneration consists in giving a holy disposition to the mind, and is effected in a manner above our comprehension or calculation, by the power of the Holy Spirit, so as to secure our voluntary obedience to the Gospel; and that its proper evidence is found in the holy fruit which we bring forth to the glory of God.

VIII. OF GOD'S PURPOSE OF GRACE.—That election is the gracious purpose of God, according to which he regenerates, sanctifies, and saves sinners; that being perfectly consistent with the free agency of man, it comprehends all the means in connection with the end; that it is a most glorious display of God's sovereign goodness, being infinitely wise, holy and unchangeable; that it utterly excludes boasting, and promotes humility, prayer, praise, trust in God, and active imitation of his free mercy; that it encourages the use of means in the highest degree; that it is ascertained by its effects in all who believe the Gospel; is the foundation of Christian assurance; and that to ascertain it with regard to ourselves, demands and deserves our utmost diligence.

IX. OF THE PERSEVERANCE OF SAINTS.—That such only are real believers as endure unto the end; that their persevering attachment to Christ is the grand mark which distinguishes them from superficial professors; that a special Providence watches over their welfare; and they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.

X. HARMONY OF THE LAW AND GOSPEL.—That the law of God is the eternal and unchangeable rule of his moral government; that it is holy, just, and good; and that the inability which the Scriptures ascribe to fallen men to fulfil its precepts, arises entirely from their love of sin; to deliver them from which, and to restore them through a Mediator to unfeigned obedience to the holy law, is one great end of the Gospel, and of the means of grace connected with the establishment of the visible church.

XI. OF A GOSPEL CHURCH.—That a visible church of Christ is a congregation of baptized believers, associated by covenant in the faith and fellowship of the Gospel; observing the ordinances of Christ; governed by his laws; and exercising the gifts, rights and privileges invested in them by his word; that its only proper officers are bishops or pastors, and deacons, whose qualifications, claims, and duties are defined in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus.

XII. OF BAPTISM AND THE LORD'S SUPPER.—That Christian baptism is the immersion of a believer in water, in the name of the Father, Son, and Spirit; to show forth in a solemn and beautiful emblem, our faith in a crucified, buried, and risen Savior, with its purifying power; that it is pre-requisite to the privileges of a church relation; and to the Lord's supper, in which the members of the church, by the use of bread and wine, are to commemorate together the dying love of Christ; preceded always by solemn self-examination.

XIII. OF THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.—That the first day of the week is the Lord's Day, or Christian Sabbath, and is to be kept sacred to religious purposes, by abstaining from all secular labor and recreations; by the devout observance of all the means of grace, both private and public; and by preparation for that rest which remaineth for the people of God.

XIV. OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT.—That civil government is of divine appointment, for the interests and good order of human society; and that magistrates are to be prayed for, conscientiously honored, and obeyed, except in things opposed to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the only Lord of the conscience, and the Prince of the kings of the earth.

XV. OF THE RIGHTEOUS AND THE WICKED.—That there is a radical and essential difference between the righteous and the wicked; that such only as through faith are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and sanctified by the Spirit of our God, are truly righteous in his esteem; while all such as continue in impotence and unbelief are in his sight wicked, and under the curse; and this distinction holds among men both in and after death.

XVI. OF THE WORLD TO COME.—That the end of this world is approaching; that at the last day, Christ will descend from heaven, and raise the dead from the grave, to final retribution; that a solemn separation will then take place; that the wicked will be adjudged to endless punishment, and the righteous to endless joy; and that this judgment will fix forever the final state of men in heaven or hell, on principles of righteousness.

CHURCH COVENANT.—Having been, as we trust, brought by divine grace to embrace the Lord Jesus Christ, and to give up ourselves wholly to him; we do now solemnly and joyfully covenant with each other, to WALK TOGETHER IN HIM WITH BROTHERLY LOVE, to his glory as our common Lord. We do, therefore, in his strength engage,

That we will exercise a mutual care, as members one of another, to promote the growth of the whole body in Christian knowledge, holiness, and comfort; to the end that we may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God.

That to promote and secure this object, we will uphold the public worship of God and the ordinances of his house; and hold constant communion with each other therein; that we will cheerfully contribute of our property for the support of the poor, and for the maintenance of a faithful ministry of the Gospel among us.

That we will not omit closet and family religion at home, nor allow ourselves in the too common neglect of the great duty of religiously training up our children, and those under our care, with a view to the service of Christ, and the enjoyment of heaven.

That we will walk circumspectly in the world, that we may win their souls; remembering that God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and of love and of a sound mind; that we are the light of the world and the salt of the earth, and that a city set on a hill cannot be hid.

That we will frequently exhort, and if occasion shall require, admonish one another, according to Matthew 18th, in the spirit of meekness; considering ourselves est we also be tempted, and that as in baptism we have been buried with Christ, and raised again; so there is on us a special obligation henceforth to walk in newness of life.

And may the God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make us perfect in every good work to do his will; working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight through Jesus Christ: to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.

BAR; (1.) that whereby a door is bolted and made fast. Neh. 3: 3, 6. (2.) A narrow cross-board, or rafter, to fasten other boards to. Exod. 26: 26. (3.) A rock in the sea that runs across its bottom. Jonah 2: 6. (4.) The bank or shore of the sea, which as a bar shuts up its waves in their own place. Job 38: 10. (5.) Strong fortifications and powerful impediments are called bars, or bars of iron. Amos 1: 5. Isa. 45: 2.

BARABBAS; a notorious robber, guilty also of sedition and murder; yet preferred before Jesus Christ, by the Jews. John 18: 40. Origen says, that in many copies, Barabbas was called Jesus likewise. The Armenian has the same reading: "Whom will ye that I deliver unto you; JESUS Barabbas, or JESUS who is called Christ?" This gives an additional spirit to the history, and well deserves notice.—Calnet.

BARACHEL, ( blessing, or bowing the knee to God;) the father of Elibu. Job 23: 6.

BARACHIAS; the father of Zacharias, mentioned Matt. 23: 35, and generally thought to have been Baruch, father of Zechariah, who is mentioned by Josephus, in his books concerning the Jewish war, as having been killed between the porch and the altar, by the zealots, a little before the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans.—Calnet.

BARAK; the son of Abinoam, who was chosen by God to deliver the Hebrews from that bondage under which they were held by Jabin, king of the Canaanites, Judg. 4: 4. He refused to obey the Lord's orders, signified to him by Deborah, the prophetess, unless she consented to go with him. Deborah therefore accompanied him towards Kelesh of Naphtali; and having assembled ten thousand men, they advanced to mount Tabor. Sisera, being informed of this movement, marched with nine hundred chariots of war, and encamped near the river Kishon; but Barak rapidly descending from mount Tabor, and the Lord having spread terror through Sisera's army, a complete victory was easily obtained. Sisera was killed by Jael, and Barak and Deborah composed a hymn of thanksgiving.—Calnet.

BARBARIAN; a word used by the Hebrews to denote a stranger; one who knows neither the holy language, nor the law. According to the Greeks, all other nations, however learned or polite they might be in themselves and in their manners, were barbarians. Hence Paul comprehends all mankind under the names of Greeks and barbarians, (Rom. 1: 14.) and Luke calls the inhabitants of the island of Malta, barbarians, Acts 28: 2, 4. In 1 Cor. 11:

11. the apostle says, that if he who speaks a foreign language in an assembly, be not understood by those to whom he discourses, with respect to them he is a barbarian; and, reciprocally, if he understand not those who speak to him, they are to him barbarians. Barbarian, therefore, is used for every stranger, or foreigner, who does not speak our native language, and includes no implication whatever of savage nature or manners in those respecting whom it is used.—Calnet.

BARBED; having points like hooks or prickles of thorn. Job 41: 17.

BARCEPHA, (MOSES;) a Syrian bishop, of the ninth century, celebrated for his great learning. The works of his now extant, display marks of true genius, and an uncommon acquaintance with the art of writing.

BARCLAY, (ROBERT,) the celebrated apologist of the Quakers, was born in 1648, at Gordonstown, in the shire of Moray, in Scotland, of an ancient and honorable family. The troubles of the country induced his father, Colonel Barclay, to send him to Paris, to be educated under the care of his uncle, who was principal of the Scotch college in that city. Under his influence, he was easily induced to become a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, on which his father sent for him to return home, and soon after turning Quaker, young Robert followed his example. Uniting all the advantages of a learned education to great natural abilities, it was not long ere he distinguished himself by his talents and zeal, in support of his new opinions. His first work, published in 1670, entitled "Truth cleared of Calumnies, &c." was an answer to an attack on the Quakers by a Scotch minister of the name of Mitchel. It is written with great spirit and vigor, and tended greatly to remove from the body the opprobrium under which they lay with government. The book, however, which has fixed his celebrity, is his "Apology for the True Christian Divinity, as the same is preached and held forth by the People in scorn called Quakers." It was originally published in Latin, and soon reprinted at Amsterdam, and translated into German, Dutch, French, and Spanish, and by the author himself, into English. It received many answers; but they are now almost forgotten. The author afterwards accompanied William Penn through the greater part of England, Holland, and Germany, for the purpose of propagating their sentiments, and acquired great respect wherever he went. He had, however, after this, his own share of persecution, and was more than once imprisoned, but spent the latter part of his life in the bosom of a large family, and died in 1690, in the forty-second year of his age.—Head. Buck.

BARCLAY, (HENRY, D. D.) an episcopal clergyman in New York, was a native of Albany, and graduated at Yale college in 1731. In England, he received orders in the church, and was appointed missionary to the Mohawk Indians. Having served in this capacity for some years, with but little success, he was called to the city of New York, and appointed rector of Trinity church. In this respectable station he continued till his death, in 1765. The translation of the liturgy into the Mohawk language, made under his direction, and that of Rev. W. Andrews and J. Ogilvie, was printed in 1769. Mr. Ogilvie succeeded him both among the Indians and at New York.—Life of Ritten. 245; Müller's Retr. II. 356; Allen.

BAR-CHOCHÉBA, or CHOCHEBAS, or CHOCHEBUS; a famous impostor. It is said, he assumed the name of Bar-Chochéba, that is, Son of the Star, from the words of Balaam, which he applied to himself as the Messiah: "There shall come a star (cocob) out of Jacob, and a sceptre out of Israel." Bar-Chochéba engaged the Jews to revolt, (A. D. 136,) under the reign of Adrian, who sent Julius Severus against him. The Romans shut him up in Bether, the siege of which was long and obstinate. The town, however, was at length taken, and the war finished. Bar-Chochéba perished, and the multitude of Jews put to death, or sold during the war, and in consequence of it, was almost innumerable. After this, Adrian published an edict, forbidding the Jews, on pain of death, to visit Jerusalem; and guards were placed at the gates, to prevent their entering. The rebellion of Bar-Chochéba happened A. D. 136, in the 19th year of Adrian.—Calnet.

BARD, (JOHN, M. D.) a learned physician, was born in Fairlington, New Jersey, February 1, 1716. He received an early education under the care of Mr. Ananias of Philadelphia, a very eminent teacher. About the age of fifteen, he was bound an apprentice for seven years to Dr. Kearsley, a surgeon, of unhappy temper, and rigorous in the treatment of his pupils. Under his thralldom, the kindness of Mrs. Kearsley and the friendship of Dr. Franklin beguiled his sorrows. He engaged in business in 1737, and soon acquired a large share of practice, and became much respected. In 1743, he was induced by urgent applications from New York, to remove to that city, to supply the loss of several eminent physicians. Here he continued till within a few months of his death. In the year 1795, when the yellow fever had put to flight a number of physicians, who were in the meridian of life, the veteran Dr. Bard, though verging towards his eightieth year, remained at his post. In May, 1798, he removed to his estate at Hyde Park, near Poughkeepsie. Here he continued in the enjoyment of perfect health, till he felt a paralytic stroke, which in a few days occasioned his death. He died, March 30, 1799, aged eighty-three years.

Dr. Bard was eminent in his profession, and his practice was very extensive. Soon after the close of the war with Great Britain, on the re-establishment of the Medical Society of the state of New York, he was elected its president; and he was placed in the chair for six or seven successive years. He possessed a singular ingenuity and quickness in discriminating diseases; yet he did not presumptuously confide in his penetration, but was remarkably particular in his inquiries into the circumstances of the sick. Ever desirous of removing the disorders to which the human frame is subject, his anxiety and attention were not diminished when called to visit the indigent, from whom he could not expect compensation. His conduct, through his whole life, was marked by the strictest honor and integrity. In conversation he was polite, affable, cheerful, and entertaining. To his pupils he was not only an instructor, but a father. In the early part of his life, he devoted much attention to polite learning, in which he made great proficiency. He possessed a correct and elegant taste, and wrote with uncommon accuracy and precision. He drew up an essay on the pleurisy of Long Island in 1749, which was not published; a paper, inserted in the London Medical Observations; and several papers on the yellow fever, and the evidence of its importation, inserted in the American Medical Register. In 1750, he assisted Dr. Middleton in the first recorded dissection in America, that of Hermannus Carroll, executed for murder.

He was a firm believer in the truth and excellency of the Christian religion. In a letter to his son, Dr. Samuel Bard, he said, "Above all things, suffer not yourself by any company or example, to depart, either in your conversation or practice, from the highest reverence to God and your religion." In his old age he was cheerful, and remarkable for his gratitude to his heavenly Father.—Thacher's Med. Biog. 96—103; M'Vicker's Life of S. Bard; Allen.

BARDESANES; one of the ancient heretics. He flourished about the year 170, and was a native of Edessa, in Mesopotamia. According to Eusebius, he was intimately acquainted with the Chaldean philosophy, and is said also to have been well skilled in the Greek and Syrian languages. He wrote against Marcion and other heretics, but afterwards fell into some of the errors of the Valentinian school. Yet though this was the case, it would be unjust to class his tenets indiscriminately with those of Valentinus. He received the whole of the Old Testament, he believed that God, who was the Father of Jesus Christ, is the Creator of the world; and he even held that the Word of God, or his Son, co-operated in this creation. He held, however, that the body of Jesus was a delusive image which came down from heaven; in which point, and that of the denial of the resurrection of the body, he agreed with Valentinus. It is also stated to have been one of his opinions, that the devil was not created by God. He appears to have lived to retract some of his errors, and to abjure the doctrines of Valentinus. The fullest account of his life and doctrines is given by Beausobre, vol. ii. p. 153. See also Dr. Burton on the Early Heresies, note 13.—Head, Buck.

BARDESANISTS; those who held the opinions of Bardesanes.

BAR-JESUS, or, according to some copies, BAR-JEU, was a Jewish magician in the island of Crete. Acts 13. 6. Origen and Chrysostom think that Elymas, or Bar Jesus, was converted, and that St. Paul speedily restored his sight.—Watson.

BAR-JONA; a name by which our Savior sometimes calls Peter; (Matt. 16. 17.) and which, as some think, is put for Bar-Johanna, son of John.—Calmet.

BARK; (1.) to utter a cry, as a dog; to give an alarm of danger. Ministers, that, as dumb dogs, cannot bark, are such as have neither conscience nor courage to reprove men's sins, and publish the alarming truths revealed by God in his Word. Isa. 56: 10. Also, (2.) To peel the bark or rind off a tree. Joel 1: 7.

BARLAAMITES; the followers of Barlaam, in the fourteenth century, who was a very zealous champion in behalf of the Greek against the Latin church. It is said that he adopted the sentiments and precepts of the Stoics, with respect to the obligations of morality and the duties of life; and digested them into a work of his, which is known by the title of Ethica ex Stoicis.—Henderson's Buck.

BARLEY; Exod. 9: 31. Levit. 27: 16, &c. A well-known kind of grain. It derives its Hebrew name from the long hairy beard which grows upon the ear. Pliny, on the testimony of Menander, says that barley was the most ancient aliment of mankind. In Palestine, the barley was sown about October, and reaped in the end of March, just after the passover. In Egypt, the barley harvest was later; for when the hail fell there, (Exodus 9: 31.) a few days before the passover, the flax and barley were bruised and destroyed: for the flax was at its full growth, and the barley began to form its green ears; but the wheat, and more backward grain, were not damaged, because they were only in the blade, and the hail bruised the young shoots which produce the ears.

The rabbins sometimes called barley the food of beasts, because in reality they fed their cattle with it, (1 Kings 4: 28.) and from Homer and other ancient writers we learn, that barley was given to horses. The Hebrews, however, frequently used barley bread, as we find by several passages of Scripture: for example, David's friends brought to him in his flight, wheat, barley, flour, &c. 2 Sam. 17: 28. Solomon sent wheat, barley, oil, and wine, to the laborers king Hiram had furnished him. 2 Chron. 2: 15. Elijah had a present made him of twenty barley loaves, and corn in the husk. 2 Kings 4: 22. And, by miraculously increasing the five barley loaves, Christ fed a multitude of about five thousand. John 6: 8—10. The jealousy-offering in the Levitical institution, was to be barley meal. Num. 5: 15. The common mincha, or offering, was of five wheat flour, (Levit. 2: 1.) but this was of barley, a meaner grain, probably to denote the vile condition of the person in whose behalf it was offered. For which reason, also, there was no oil or frankincense permitted to be offered with it. Sometimes barley is put for a low, contemptible reward or price. So the false prophets are charged with seducing the people for handfuls of barley, and morsels of bread. Ezek. 13: 19. Hosea bought his emblematic bride for fifteen pieces of silver, and a homer and a half of barley. Hosea 3: 2.—Watson.

BARNABAS; a disciple of Jesus Christ, and companion of St. Paul in his labors. He was a Levite, born in the isle of Cyprus. His proper name was Joses, to which the apostles added Barnabas, signifying the son of consolation. He is generally considered one of the seventy disciples, chosen by our Savior. He was brought up with Paul, at the feet of Gamaliel. When that apostle came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, Barnabas introduced him to the other apostles. (Acts 9: 26, 27.) about A. D. 37. Five years afterwards, the church at Jerusalem, being informed of the progress of the Gospel at Antioch, sent Barnabas thither, who beheld with great joy the wonders of the grace of God. Acts 11: 22, 24. He exhorted the faithful to perseverance. Some time afterwards, he went to Tarsus, to seek Paul, and bring him to Antioch, where they jointly labored two years, and converted great numbers; and here the disciples were first called Christians. They left Antioch, A. D. 41, to convey alms from this church to that at Jerusalem. At their return, they brought John Mark, the cousin of Barnabas. While they were at Antioch, the Holy Ghost directed that they should be separated for those labors among the Gentiles to which he had appointed them. They departed into Cyprus, where they converted Sergius Paulus, the proconsul. They preached at Perga, in Pamphylia, without much success, by reason of the obstinacy and malice of the Jews; but being come to Iconium, they made many converts. Here the Jews stirred up a sedition, and obliged them to retire to Derbe and Lystra, in Lycaonia, where St. Paul curing one Æneus, who had been lame from his birth, the people of Lystra regarded them as gods; calling Barnabas, Jupiter, and Paul, Mercury; and would have sacrificed to them, which the two apostles with great difficulty hindered: nevertheless, soon afterwards, they were persecuted in this very city. Having revisited the cities through which they had passed, and where they had preached the Gospel, they returned to Antioch, in Syria.

In A. D. 51, Barnabas was sent with Paul from Antioch to Jerusalem, on occasion of disputes concerning the observance of legal rites, to which the Jews wished to subject the Gentiles. Paul and Barnabas were present in the council at Jerusalem, and returned immediately to Antioch. Peter, arriving there soon afterwards, was led to countenance, in some degree, by his conduct, the observance of the Mosaic distinctions. Barnabas, too, (who, being by descent a Levite, might retain some former notions,) used the like dissimulation: but Paul reproved Peter and Barnabas with great freedom. Paul afterwards determining to visit the churches in the isle of Cyprus, and in Asia Minor, Barnabas desired that John Mark might accompany them: but Paul objected, because Mark had left them on the first journey. Hereupon the two apostles separated: Paul went towards Asia; and Barnabas, with Mark, to Cyprus. This is all we know certainly concerning Barnabas.—Watson.

BARNABAS'S GOSPEL, an apocryphal work ascribed to Barnabas, the apostle, wherein the history of Jesus Christ is related in a manner very different from the account given us by the four evangelists. The Mahometans have this gospel in Arabic, and it corresponds very well with those traditions which Mahomet followed in his Koran. It was, probably, a forgery of some nominal Christians, and afterwards altered and interpolated by the Mahometans, the better to serve their purpose.—H. Buck.

BARNABAS'S EPISTLE. Barnabas, according to Jerome, wrote a letter full of edification for the church. It is frequently cited by Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. Eusebius and Jerome reckon it among the apocryphal or uncanonical writings; but neither of them deny that it belongs to Barnabas. But he could not be author of a work so full of forced allegories, extravagant and unwarrantable explications of Scripture, together with stories concerning beasts, and such like conceits, as make up the first part of this epistle. It is uncertain to whom this epistle was addressed, because we have not the superscription: but it seems to have been written to the converted Jews, who were too zealously addicted to the observance of the law of Moses. It is divided into two parts. In the first, he shows the unprofitableness of the old law, and the necessity of the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ. He cites, and explains allegorically, several passages relating to the ceremonies and precepts of the law of Moses, applying them to Jesus Christ and his law. The second part is a moral instruction, handled under the notion of two ways, the one of light, the other of darkness; the one under the conduct of the angels of God, the other under the guidance of the angels of Satan. The way of light is a summary of what a Christian is to do, in order to obtain eternal happiness; and the way of darkness is a representation of those particular sins which exclude men from the kingdom of God.

This epistle was first published in Greek, from a copy of father Hugh Menard, a Benedictine monk. An ancient version of it was found in a manuscript of the abbey of Corbey, near a thousand years old. Vossius published it in the year 1656, together with the epistles of Ignatius. It is recently republished in the Apocryphal New Testament. Hend. Buck.

BARNABITES; a religious order, founded in the sixteenth century, by three Italian gentlemen, who had been advised, by a famous preacher of those days, to read carefully the epistles of St. Paul. Hence they were called clerks of St. Paul; and Barnabites, because they performed their first exercise in the church of St. Barnabas, at Milan. They dress in black, like the secular clergy, and devote themselves to missions, preaching, and the instruction of youth; and in Italy, where they taught theology in the academies of Milan and Pavia, in France, Austria, and Spain, they had houses which they called colleges. In France and Austria, they were employed to convert the Protestants. The order only exists at present in Spain and some parts of Italy.—Hend. Buck.

BARNARD, (JOHN,) minister of Marblehead, Massachusetts, was born in Boston, November 6, 1681. His parents were remarkable for their piety, and they took particular care of his education. He was graduated at Harvard college, in 1700. In the former part of his collegiate course, the sudden death of two of his acquaintance impressed his mind, and led him to think of his own departure from this world; but the impression was soon effaced. However, before he left that institution, he was brought to repentance, and he resolved to yield himself to the commands of God.

He was ordained minister of Marblehead, July 18, 1716, as colleague with Mr. Cheever. In 1762, he received Mr. Whitwell as his assistant. The last sermon which he preached, was delivered, January 8, 1569. He died, January 24, 1770, aged eighty-eight years.

Mr. Barnard was eminent for his learning and piety, and was famous among the divines of America. During the latter part of his life, when he retained a vigor of mind and zeal uncommon at so advanced an age, he was regarded as the father of the churches. His form was remarkably erect, and he never bent under the infirmities of years. His countenance was grand, his mien majestic, and there was a dignity in his whole deportment. His presence restrained the imprudence and folly of youth, and when the aged saw him, they arose and stood up. He added a knowledge of the Hebrew to his other theological attainments; he was well acquainted with the mathematics; and he excelled in skill for naval architecture. When he first went to Marblehead, and for some years afterwards, there was not one trading vessel belonging to the town. It was through his exertions, that a commercial improvement soon took place.

His charity was of a kind which is worthy of imitation. He was not disposed to give much encouragement to common beggars; but he sought out those objects of benevolent attention, who modestly hid their wants. The poor were often fed by him, and the widow's heart was gladdened, while they knew not where to return thanks, except to the merciful Father of the wretched. In one kind of charity he was somewhat peculiar. He generally supported at school two boys, whose parents were unable to meet this expense. By his last will, he gave two hundred pounds to Harvard college. He left no children. In his sickness, which terminated in his death, he said, with tears flowing from his eyes, "My very soul bleeds, when I remember my sins; but I trust I have sincerely repented, and that God will accept me for Christ's sake. His righteousness is my only dependence."

The publications of Mr. Barnard are numerous and valuable. They show his theological knowledge, and his talents as a writer. His style is plain, warm, and energetic. The doctrines which he enforces, are the same which were embraced by the fathers of New England. His version of the Psalms, which he published when he was about seventy years of age, he fondly hoped would be sung in all the New England churches; but it was never used beyond the limits of the town in which it was composed. The labors of Watts had rendered it unnecessary. A letter from Mr. Barnard to President Stiles, written in 1767, giving a sketch of the eminent ministers of New England, is published in the Massachusetts Historical Collections.—Whitwell's Fun. Serm.; Collect. Hist. Soc. vii. 66—69; x. 157, 167; Holmes, ii. 525; Allen.

BARNES, (DANIEL H. LL. D.,) a distinguished conchologist, died in the meridian of life, October 27, 1818. He and Dr. Griscom originated, and conducted with great reputation, the high school of New York. He was also a Baptist preacher. Invited by General Van Rensselaer to attend the first public examination of the school established by him at Troy, he proceeded to New Lebanon, and there preached on Sunday, the day before his death, from the text, "Ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life," &c. On Monday, while riding between Nassau and Troy, the driver being thrown from his seat as the stage was rapidly descending a hill, Dr. Barnes, in his alarm, jumped from the carriage and fractured his skull. He died in a short time after. Of the New York lyceum of natural history he was an active member. He was a classical scholar of high attainments, and of a most estimable character as a man. He had presided over several seminaries, and refused the presidency of the college at Washington city. He was probably the first conchologist in the United States. His learned communications on conchology were published in Silliman's Journal, with explanatory plates.—Silliman's Journal, xv. 401; Allan.

BARONIUS, (CÆSAR.) an ecclesiastical historian, was born in 1538, at Sora, in the Neapolitan territory, entered the church, and, in 1598, rose to the dignity of cardinal. But for the opposition of the Spanish court, he would have filled the papal chair. His death took place in 1607. He wrote several works; but the production on which his fame rests, is the Ecclesiastical Annals, from the first to the twelfth century.—Davenport.

BARRALIER, (H. F. N. D.) a youth of piety and precocious talents, was born at Marseilles, in 1805, acquired a knowledge of languages with extraordinary facility, and, before he was sixteen, wrote a discourse on the Immortality of the Soul; a Treatise on Morality; and some poems. He died in 1821.—Davenport.

BARRINGTON, (LORD VISCOUNT), was the youngest son of Benjamin Shute, a merchant of London, who was the youngest son of Francis Shute, of Upton, in the county of Leicester, esquire. He was born at Theobalds, in Hertfordshire, in the year 1678; and he received part of his education at Utrecht, as appears from a Latin oration which he delivered at that university. After his return to England, he applied himself to the study of the law in the Inner Temple; and, in 1701, he published, but without his name, "An Essay upon the Interest of England, in respect to Protestants dissenting from the Established Church," a piece in which he endeavored to make it appear, that it would be unjust and impolitic to pass any new laws unfavorable to the Dissenters; and, in particular, to prevent occasional conformity. It was reprinted two years after, with considerable enlargements; and the title, likewise, was somewhat varied. Having thus drawn his pen in a good cause, and acquitted himself with great reputation, he proceeded to publish another piece, in quarto, entitled, "The Rights of Protestant Dissenters," in two parts.—A second edition of which was printed in 1705, and dedicated to queen Anne.

In the year 1725, lord Barrington published, in two volumes, octavo, his "Miscellanea Sacra; or, a New Method of considering so much of the History of the Apostles as is contained in Scripture; with four Critical Essays: 1. On the Witness of the Holy Spirit. 2. On the Distinction between the Apostles, Elders, and Brethren. 3. On the Time when Paul and Barnabas became Apostles. 4. On the Apostolical Decrees." In this work the noble author has, with great accuracy and judgment, traced the methods taken by the apostles and first preachers of the Gospel for propagating Christianity; and explained, with great distinctness, the several gifts of the Spirit, by which they were enabled to discharge that office. These, in particular, he has improved into an argument for the truth of the Christian religion, which is said to have staggered the infidelity of Mr. Anthony Collins. His lordship was also author of several other tracts, chiefly political, which he published at different times, and upon various occasions. He died at his seat at Becket, in Berkshire, after an illness of seven hours only, on the 14th of December, 1734, in the fifty-sixth year of his age.

This learned and distinguished nobleman was a disciple and friend of Mr. Locke; and as he had the highest regard for the holy Scriptures, in which he was eminently skilled, so, as a theological writer, he contributed greatly to the diffusing of that spirit of free scriptural criticism, which has since obtained among all denominations of Christians. At the same time, his exemplary candor toward those who differed from him in regard to religious opinions, and his steady attachment to the principles of liberty, both in church and state, carried with them their own encomium.

In private life, his lordship was a shining example of sobriety, regularity, and justice; he was religious without enthusiasm, and zealous without bigotry. He was remarkable for the politeness of his manners, and the gracefulness of his address; and he enjoyed the constant friendship and esteem of many of the greatest and best men the nation ever knew.

He generally attended divine worship among the Dissenters, and for many years received the sacrament at Finners' hall, when Dr. Jeremiah Hunt was pastor of the congregation that assembled there.—Brit. Biog.; Jones's Chris. Biog.

BARRENNES. This was looked upon as reproachful among the Greeks and Romans, but more particularly so among the Jews; which may be accounted for by the constant expectation of the Messiah, and the hope that every woman had, that she might be the mother of the promised seed. This constant hope of the speedy coming of the great "Seed of the woman," serves also to account for many circumstances in the Old Testament history. "Couple it," says the Rev. J. J. Blunt, "with this consideration, and I see the scheme of revelation, like the physical scheme, proceeding with beautiful uniformity: a unity of plan, 'connecting,' as it has been well said by Paley, 'the chicken roosting upon its perch, with the spheres revolving in the firmament;' and a unity of plan connecting, in like manner, the meanest accidents of a household, with the most illustrious visions of a prophet. Abstracted from this consideration, I see in the history of Moses details of actions, some trifling, some even offensive, pursued at a length (when compared with the whole) singularly disproportionate; while things which the angels would desire to look into, are passed over and forgotten. But this principle once admitted, all is consecrated; all assumes a new aspect; trifles, that seem at first not bigger than a man's hand, occupy the heavens; and wherefore Sarah laughed, for instance, at the prospect of a son, and wherefore that laugh was rendered immortal in his name; and wherefore the sacred historian dwells on a matter so trivial, whilst the world and its vast concerns were lying at his feet, I can fully understand. For then I see the hand of God shaping every thing to his own ends, and in an event thus casual, thus easy, thus unimportant, telling forth his mighty design of salvation to the world, and working it up into the web of his noble prospective counsels. Gen. 21: 6. I see that nothing is great or little before Him who can bend to his purposes whatever he willeth, and convert the light-hearted and thoughtless mockery of an aged woman into an instrument of his glory, effectual as the tongue of the seer which he touched with living coals from the altar. Bearing this master-key in my hand, I can interpret the scenes of domestic mirth, of domestic stratagem, or of domestic wickedness, with which the history of Moses abounds. The Seed of the woman, that was to bruise the serpent's head, Gen. 3: 15. however indistinctly understood, (and probably it was understood very indistinctly,) was the one thing longed for in the families of old; was 'the desire of all nations,' as the prophet Haggai expressly calls it, Hag. 2: 7.; and, provided they could accomplish this desire, they (like others, when urged by an overpowering motive,) were often reckless of the means, and rushed upon deeds which they could not defend. Then did the wife forget her jealousy, and provoke, instead of resenting, the faithlessness of her husband, Gen. 16: 2. 30: 3. 9.; then did the mother forget a parent's part, and teach her own child treachery and deceit, Gen. 25: 23. 27: 13.; then did daughters turn the instincts of nature backward, and deliberately work their own and their father's shame, Gen. 19: 31.; then did the daughter-in-law veil her face, and court the incestuous bed, Gen. 38: 14.; and to be childless, was to be a by-word, Gen. 16: 5. 30: 1.; and to refuse to raise up seed to a brother, was to be spit upon, Gen. 38: 26. Deut. 25: 9.; and the prospect of the promise, like the fulfilment of it, did not send peace into families, but a sword; and three were set against two, and two against three, Gen. 27: 41.; and the elder, who would be promoted unto honor, was set against the younger, whom God would promote, Gen. 4: 5. 27: 41.; and national differences were engendered by it, as individuals grew into nations, Gen. 19: 37. 26: 35.; and even the foulest of idolatries may be traced, perhaps, to this hallowed source; for the corruption of the best is the worst corruption of all, Numb. 25: 1, 2, 3. It is upon this principle of interpretation, and I know not upon what other so well, that we may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, who have made those parts of the Mosaic history a stumbling-block to many, which, if rightly understood, are the very testimony of the covenant; and a principle which is thus extensive in its application and successful in its results, which explains so much that is difficult, and answers so much that is objected against, has, from this circumstance alone, strong presumption in its favor, strong claims upon our sober regard."—Watson.

BARROW, (ISAAC, D. D.) distinguished alike as a mathematician and divine, was born in London, in the month of October, 1630. He received at the Charter-house school, in two or three years, the first elements of knowledge; but there he discovered more of natural courage than inclination to study, being much given to fighting, and fond of promoting it among his school-fellows. That disposition gave much pain to his father; and he frequently wished, "that if it pleased God to take away any of his children, it might be his son Isaac." From that establishment his father removed him, and sent him to Felstead, in Essex. At that place his conduct changed; he soon made a very great progress in learning, and every other valuable qualification; and his master appointed him tutor to lord Fairfax, of Emely, in Ireland, who was then his scholar. In 1648, he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and, in 1649, was chosen fellow of the college. Soon after obtaining that fellowship, he determined on quitting the church, and on attending to the profession of physic; and in the acquisition of that knowledge he made great proficiency. He attained an accurate knowledge of anatomy, botany, and chemistry; but feeling that he was conscientiously bound, by the oath he had taken on his admission to his fellowship, to study divinity, he applied himself accordingly, and without delay, to its study. In addition to that study, he devoted much time and attention to acquire a knowledge of astronomy; and finding that such science depended much upon geometry, he soon made himself master of Euclid's Elements of Geometry, and rapidly attained a profound knowledge of mathematics. In 1653, he was incorporated in the degree of master of arts, at Oxford; and when Dr. Dupont resigned the chair of Greek professor, he recommended his pupil, Mr. Barrow, for his successor. That situation he did not, however, obtain, as he was suspected of holding Arminian tenets. Barrow then determined to visit foreign countries; but, in order to execute his design, he was obliged to sell his books.

In 1660, he was chosen to the Greek professorship at Cambridge. The duties of the professorship he performed with wisdom and industry, and appeared habitually to recollect, that for all his talents he should be required to render an account. On July 16, 1662, he was elected professor of geometry, in Gresham college, at the recommendation of Dr. Willkins, master of Trinity college, and afterwards bishop of Chester. In the same year, he wrote some Greek verses on the marriage of king Charles and queen Catharine. Upon the 20th of May, 1663, he was elected a fellow of the Royal society, in the first choice made by the council after their charter; and afterwards was appointed to the situation of first professor of a mathematical lecture, established at Cambridge, and he then resigned that of Gresham college. In 1669, he also resigned his mathematical chair to his learned friend, Mr. Isaac Newton; being determined no longer to pursue the study of mathematics, but immediately to enter on that of divinity. Upon quitting his professorship, he was only a fellow of Trinity college, till his uncle presented him with a small sinecure in Wales; and Dr. Ward, bishop of Salisbury, conferred on him a prebend in his church. In 1670, he was made a doctor in divinity, by mandate; and when Dr. Pearson, master of Trinity college, was promoted to the see of Chester, Barrow was appointed to succeed him, by the king's patent, bearing date the 13th of February, 1672. Barrow was chaplain to the king, and to him he was much attached; insomuch, that he declared, "he had given it to the best scholar in England." He would also call him an "unfair preacher, because he exhausted every subject, and left nothing for others to say after him." In 1675, Barrow was chosen vice-chancellor of the university; and, in every situation to which he was elected, he performed its duties with punctuality and wisdom. The life of Barrow was, however, but short. Forty-two years had not rolled over him, ere he was numbered with the dead; for, on the 4th of May, 1672, after but a short illness, he expired. But his name has survived him; and not only is it recorded on the marble tablet, erected in Westminster abbey, but it is handed down in his writings, which, for close reasoning, deep thinking, and sterling sense, have seldom been equalled, and never surpassed. Barrow was, indeed, no ordinary man. His religion was, at once, that of the head and heart; and whilst, therefore, his writings delight and improve the understanding, they enlighten and convince the judgment. His temper was good; his disposition amiable; his manners pleasing; his conversation instructing; his life moral, useful, and pious, and his death happy. Let those men, who assert that Christianity is a religion of fraud and ignorance, remember, that amongst multitudes of learned and literary men, Barrow not only believed in, but vindicated and supported it.

For further account of this extraordinary man, see his Life and Writings.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

BARSABAS. Joseph Barsabas, surnamed Justus, was one of the first disciples of Jesus Christ, and probably one of the seventy. When St. Peter proposed to the disciples to fill up the place of Judas the traitor, by choosing another apostle, (Acts 1: 21.) Barsabas was nominated along with Matthias; but the lot fell on Matthias, who was therefore numbered with the eleven apostles.—We know nothing farther of the life of this Barsabas.

2. Barsabas was also the surname of Judas, one of the principal disciples mentioned, Acts 15: 22, &c. This is all we know of Barsabas Judas.—Watson.

BARSUMAS; bishop of Nisibis, in Persia, who flourished during the fifth century. Of all the promoters of the Nestorian cause, says Mosheim, there was not one to whom it has such weighty obligations as to the famous Barsumas, who was removed from his place in the school of Edessa, and created bishop of Nisibis, in 435. This zealous prelate labored with incredible assiduity and dexterity, from the year 440 to 485, to procure for the Nestorians a solid and permanent settlement in Persia; and he was vigorously seconded in this undertaking by Maanes, bishop of Ardascira. So remarkable was the success which crowned the labors of Barsumas, that his fame extended throughout the East; and those Nestorians who still remain in Chaldaea, Persia, Assyria, and the adjacent countries, consider him alone, and not without reason, as their parent and founder. This indefatigable ecclesiastic not only persuaded Firouz, the Persian monarch, to expel from his dominions such Christians as had adopted the opinions of the Greeks, and to admit the Nestorians in their place, but he even engaged him to put the latter in possession of the principal seat of ecclesiastical authority in Persia, the see of Selencia, which the patriarch, or catholic of the Nestorians has always filled, even down to our times. The zeal and activity of Barstumas did not end here: he erected a famous school at Nisibis, whence issued those Nestorian doctors, who, in this and the following century, spread abroad their tenets through Egypt, Syria, Arabia, India, Tartary and China.—Mosheim.

BARTHOLOMEW, one of the twelve apostles, Matt. 10: 3. is supposed to be the same person who is called Nathanael, one of the first of Christ's disciples. This opinion is founded on the circumstance, that as the evangelist John never mentions Bartholomew in the number of the apostles, so the other evangelists never mention Nathanael. And as in John 1: 45. Philip and Nathanael are mentioned together as coming to Jesus, so in the other evangelists, Philip and Bartholomew are constantly associated together. The supposition also acquires additional probability from considering, that Nathanael is particularly mentioned among the apostles to whom Christ appeared at the sea of Tiberias, after his resurrection; Simon Peter, Thomas, and Nathanael, of Cana in Galilee; the sons of Zebedee, namely, James and John; with two other of his disciples, probably Andrew and Philip. John 21: 2. It is an early tradition, that Bartholomew propagated the faith as far as India, and also in the more northern and western parts of Asia, and that he finally suffered martyrdom. But all the particulars respecting the life and labors of the apostles, not mentioned in the New Testament, are exceedingly uncertain.—Watson.

BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY; a feast held on the 24th of August, in honor of Bartholomew, but awfully memorable as the day of the horrid slaughter of the Huguenots in France, in the year 1572, when, at midnight, not only was a signal given to massacre all who were found in Paris, but orders were issued that the massacre should extend through the whole kingdom; in consequence of which, in the space of thirty days, upwards of thirty thousand victims are calculated to have been slain. (See PERSECUTION, FRANCE).—Hend. Buck.

BARTHOLOMITES; a religious order founded at Genoa, in 1307; but, the monks leading irregular lives, it was suppressed in 1650, and their effects confiscated. In the church of the monastery of this order at Genoa, is preserved the image which, it is pretended, Christ sent to king Abarigus.—Buck.

BAR-TIMÆUS; a blind man of Jericho, who sat by the side of the public road, begging, when our Savior passed that way to Jerusalem. Mark (10: 46—52.) says, that "Jesus coming out of Jericho, with his disciples, and a great crowd, Bar-Timæus, when he heard it, began to cry out, Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me!" and Jesus restored him to sight. But Matthew, (20: 30.) relating the same story, says, that two blind men, sitting by the way-side, understanding that Jesus was passing, began to cry out, &c. and both received sight. Mark notes Bar-Timæus only, because he was more known, and not improbably (as his name is preserved) was born in a superior rank of life, therefore was no common beggar; if, besides, his blindness had been the cause of reducing him to poverty, no doubt his neighbors would mention his name, and take great interest in his cure. Probably, Timæus, his father, was of note in that place; as such was generally the case, when the father's name was taken by the son. The cure of another blind man, mentioned Luke 18: 35, 43. is different from this; that happened, when Jesus was entering into Jericho; this, the next day, as he was coming out.—Calmet.

BARUCH, the son of Neriah, and grandson of Maaseiah, was of illustrious birth, and of the tribe of Judah. He had a brother of the name of Seraiah, who occupied an important station in the court of king Zedekiah; but he himself adhered to the person of the prophet Jeremiah, and was his most steady friend, though his attachment to him drew on himself several persecutions and much ill-treatment. He appears to have acted as his secretary during a great part of his life, and never left him till they were parted by death, on which Baruch retired to Babylon, where the rabbins say he also died in the twelfth year of the captivity. Jer. 36: 43. The Book of Baruch is justly placed among the apocryphal writings. Grotius thinks it a fiction written by some Hellenistic Jew; and St. Jerome gives as the reason why he did not write a commentary upon it, that the Jews themselves did not deem it canonical.—Watson.

I. BARZILLAI; a native of Rogelim, in Gilead, and one who assisted David when expelled from Jerusalem by Absalom. 2 Sam. 17: 27, 28. When David returned to Jerusalem, Barzillai attended him to the Jordan.—II. A native of Melohath, father of Adriel, who married Michal, formerly wife of David. 2 Sam. 21: 8.—III. A priest, who married a daughter of Barzillai the Gileadite. Nehem. 7: 63.—Calmet.

BASHAN. The land of Bashan, otherwise the Bata-næa, is east of the river Jordan, north of the tribes of Gad and Reuben, and in the half-tribe of Manasseh. It is bounded east by the mountains of Gilead, the land of Ammon, and East Edom; north by mount Hermon; south by the brook Jabbok; west by the Jordan. Og, king of the Amorites, possessed Bashan when Moses conquered it. Bashan was esteemed one of the most fruitful countries in the world; its rich pastures, oaks, and fine cattle are exceedingly commended. Num. 21: 33. 32: 33. Isa. 2: 13. Deut. 3: 1. Psal. 22: 12.

The following description of this region is by Mr. Buckingham: "We had now quitted the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites, and entered into that of Og, the king of Bashan, both of them well known to all the readers of the early Scriptures. We had quitted, too, the districts apportioned to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and entered that which was allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, eastward, leaving the land of the children of Ammon on our right, or to the east of the Jabbok, which divided Ammon, or Philatelpnia, from Gerasa. The mountains here are called the land of Gilead in the Scriptures, and in Josephus; and, according to the Roman division, this was the country of the Decapolis, so often spoken of in the New Testament, or the province of Gaulonitis, from the city of Gaulon, its early capital. We continued our way over this elevated tract, continuing to behold, with surprise and admiration, a beautiful country on all sides of us: its plains covered with a fertile soil, its hills clothed with forests, and at every new turn presenting the most magnificent landscapes that could be imagined. Amongst the trees, the oak was frequently seen; and we know that this territory presented them of old. In enumerating the sources from which the supplies of Tyre were drawn in the time of her great wealth and naval splendor, the prophet says, 'Of the oaks of Bashan have they made thine oars.' (Ezek. 27: 6.) Some learned commentators, indeed, believing that no oaks grew in these supposed desert regions, have translated the word by alders, to prevent the appearance of inaccuracy in the inspired writer. The expression of 'the fat bulls of Bashan,' which occurs more than once in the Scriptures, seemed to us equally inconsistent, as applied to the beasts of a country generally thought to be a desert, in common with the whole tract which is laid down in the modern maps as such, between the Jordan and the Euphrates; but we could not now fully comprehend, not only that the bulls of this luxuriant country might be proverbially fat, but that its possessors, too, might be a race renowned for strength and comeliness of person. . . . The general face of this region improved as we advanced further in it; and every new direction of our path opened upon us views which surprised and charmed us by their grandeur and beauty. lofty mountains gave an outline of the most magnificent character; flowing beds of secondary hills softened the romantic wildness of the picture; gentle slopes, clothed with wool, gave a rich variety of tints, hardly to be imitated by the pencil; deep valleys, filled with murmuring streams and verdant meadows, offered all the luxuriance of cultivation, and herds and flocks gave life and animation to scenes as grand, as beautiful, and as highly picturesque as the gems or taste of a Claude could either invent or desire."—Cu met.

BASIL, called the Great, to distinguish him from other Greek patriarchs of the same name, was born in 329, at Cesarea, in Cappadocia, and, after having studied at Athens, he for a while taught rhetoric and dialectics at the bar. In 370, he was made bishop of the area, where he died in 379. He is the most distinguished ecclesiastic among the Grecian patriarchs. His efforts for the regulation of clerical discipline, of the divine service, and of the standing of the clergy; the number of his sermons; the success of his mild treatment of the Arians; and above all, his endeavors for the promotion of a monastic life, for which he prepared vows and rules, observed by himself, and still remaining in force, prove the extent of his influence. The Greek church honors him as one of its most illustrious patron saints, and celebrates his festival, January 1. His followers are widely extended; there are even some in America. They lead an austere life. The vows of obedience, chastity and poverty, framed by Basil, are the rules of all the orders of Christendom, although he is particularly the father of the Eastern, as Benedict is the patriarch of the Western order. In point of genius, controversial skill, and a rich and flowing eloquence, Basil was surpassed by very few in the fourth century.—Ency. Amer.; Davenport; Mosheim; Rob. Hist. Baptism, p. 80.

BASILIAN MONKS; religious of the order of Basil, in the fourth century, who, having retired into a desert in the province of Pontus, founded a monastery, and drew up rules, to the amount of some hundreds, for his disciples. This new society soon spread all over the East; nor was it long before it passed into the West. Some pretend that Basil saw himself the spiritual father of more than ninety thousand monks in the East only; but this order, which flourished for more than three centuries, was considerably diminished by heresy, schism, and a change of empire; but the number is still considerable, and some are found even in America. The historians of this order say that it has produced 14 popes, 1805 bishops, 3010 abbots, and 11,085 martyrs, besides an infinite number of confessors and virgins. This order likewise boasts of several emperors, kings, and princes, who have embraced its rule.—Hend. Buck.

BASILICA; properly a royal palace; but in the first centuries of Rome, the basilicas were splendid public buildings, of an oblong shape, and four-cornered, and commonly adorned with Corinthian columns and statues, where the citizens collected to consult for their common welfare, transact mercantile business, and hear the young orators exercise themselves in declamation. Some of them having been given by Constantine to the Roman Christians for their worship, the first buildings appropriated to this purpose obtained the name of basilica; and afterwards, when new churches were built, the shape of the ancient basilica was retained.—Hend. Buck.

BASILIDEANS; the followers of Basilides of Alexandria, a Gnostic leader of the early part of the second century. (See Gnostics.)—Watson.

BASILIDES; author of one of the earliest heresies—Gnosticism. Different opinions have been entertained as to the time at which he lived; but if he was a disciple of Menander, who was a disciple of Simon Magus, he must have lived about the beginning of the second century, and may have spread his doctrines in the reign of the emperor Trajan. He studied at Alexandria, and is said to have been also in Persia; but whether he learned his views of Gnosticism there is uncertain.—Hend. Buck.

BASKET, kophinos; a wicker-basket, from kuphion, to cut off, because made from twigs, or cuttings of trees, or from kouphotes, levity, on account of its lightness. The Jews appear to have been in the habit of using these wicker-baskets, which were probably of a certain measure, for carrying about with them their daily provision; and as the chief baker of Pharaoh, in his dream, carried three baskets on his head with all manner of baked meats for Pharaoh, we may thus infer the connection between the image of the basket and the event of which it was the emblem,—that when three days' provision should be expended, the event predicted should happen; and hence the basket which contains the daily provision becomes the emblem of a day,—the time for which the provision would last. The kophinai were the baskets of which twelve were filled with the fragments remaining after the five loaves and two small fishes had been blessed and increased to the supply of five thousand persons by our Lord; Matt. 4: 20. 16 9. and it is probable from the number of these baskets, that they were those belonging to the twelve disciples, and used by them for the purpose of containing their daily supply of food; thus rendering the miracle, if possible, more impressive. For not only were the wants of the multitude supplied, but also the disciples themselves obtained their next day's provision from the five barley loaves and two small fishes. Their subsequent mistake of the words of our blessed Lord, when he speaks of the leaven of the Pharisees,—“It is because we have taken no bread,” was thus brought more home to themselves personally, when their unbelief and want of understanding, upon that occasion were reprov'd.—Sherwood.

BASLE, COUNCIL OF; which commenced its sittings, December 11, 1431, under the presidency of the cardinal legate Julianus Cæsarini of St. Angelo, and after holding not fewer than forty-five, terminated its labors, May 16, 1443. Its objects, which were partly attained, were to extirpate heresies, limit the power of the pope, effect a reformation of the clergy, and consolidate the interests of the church. Its decrees are not admitted into any of the Roman collections, and are considered of no authority by the Roman lawyers. They are, however, recognised in points of canon law in France and Germany; and though some later concordats have modified the application of them, they have never been formally and entirely annulled.—Hend. Buck.

BASNAGE DE BEAUVAL, (JAMES), an eminent Protestant divine, was born at Rouen, in 1653, and educated at Saumur in Geneva. When the edict of Nantz was revoked, he retired to Rotterdam, and, in 1709, was chosen one of the Walloon pastors at the Hague. Being in favor with the grand pensionary Heinsius, and still preserving his attachment to France, he rendered such services to his country, in facilitating the treaty of alliance with Holland, that he was rewarded with his recall and the restoration of his property. He died in 1723. Basnage was a man of erudition, sincerity, and virtue; and of such enlarged political views and talents, that Voltaire declared him to be more fit for a minister of state than of a parish. Among his principal works are, a History of the Church; a History of the Jews; a History of the Religion of the Reformed Church; and Annals of the United Provinces.—Ency. Amer.

BASTARD; one born out of wedlock. A bastard among the Greeks was despised, and exposed to public scorn, on account of his spurious origin. In Persia, the son of a concubine is never placed on a footing with the legitimate offspring; any attempt made by parental fondness to do so would be resented by the relations of the legitimate wife, and outrage the feelings of a whole tribe. The Jewish father bestowed as little attention on the education of his natural children as the Greek: he seems to have resigned them, in a great measure, to their own inclinations; he neither checked their passions, nor corrected their faults, nor stored their minds with useful knowledge. This is evidently implied in these words of the apostle: “If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons,” Heb. 12: 7, 8. To restrain the licentious desires of the heart, Jehovah by an express law fixed a stigma upon the bastard, which was not to be removed till the tenth generation; and to show that the precept was on no account to be violated, or suffered to fall into disuse, it is emphatically repeated, “A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to his tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation of the Lord,” Deut. 23: 2.—Watson.

BASTINADO; the punishment of beating with sticks. It is also called tympanum, because the patient was beaten like a drum. Upwards of a hundred blows were often inflicted, and sometimes the beating was unto death. St. Paul, Heb. 11: 35, says that some of the saints were tortured, tympanizo, suffered the tympanum, that is, were stretched on an instrument of torture, and beaten to death.—Watson.

BAT. This singular creature, which possesses properties that connect it with both beasts and birds, has been variously placed in systems of natural history. The editor of Calmet says, “it is too much a bird to be properly a beast, and too much a beast to be properly a bird." Doubts as to its nature, however, no longer exist. The bat is now universally made to take its place among the animal tribes, to which the bringing forth its young alive, its hair, its teeth, as well as the rest of its habitudes and conformation, evidently entitles it. In no particular, scarcely, does it resemble a bird, except in its power of sustaining itself in the air, which circumstance is scarcely enough to balance the weight of those particulars which we have noticed, as placing it among quadrupeds.

The Hebrew name of the bat denotes "the fier in duskiness," that is, the evening. It was similarly named by the Greeks and the Latins. In Deut. 14: 18, 19, it is well described: "Moreover the bat, and every creeping thing that fieth, is unclean to you: they shall not be eaten."

The legs of the bat are formed in a very particular manner, and entirely different from any other animal. It creeps with the instruments of its flight. During the entire winter, it conceals itself in its hole, as it does, also, during the day-time even in summer, never venturing out, except for an hour or two in the evening, in order to supply itself with food. The usual place in which it takes up its abode is the hollow of a tree, a dark cavern, or the chink of some ruined building, of which it seems particularly fond. This illustrates Isa. 2: 20, "In that day, a man shall cast his idols of silver and his idols of gold to the moles and to the bats;" that is, he shall carry his idols into the dark caverns, old ruins, or desolate places, to which he himself shall flee for refuge; and so shall give them up, and relinquish them to the filthy animals that frequent such places, and have taken possession of them as their proper habitation.—Abbott's Script. Nat. History.

BATANIA; the same as BASHAN, which see.

BATANISTS, or ASSASSINS. See ASSASSINS.

BATES, (WILLIAM, D. D.) an eminent non-conformist minister of the seventeenth century, was born in the year 1625; but of the place of his birth, or the particulars of his family, his contemporaries have left us no record. He was educated at the university of Cambridge, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1647, and was admitted doctor of divinity in 1660. Soon after the restoration, he was appointed chaplain to king Charles II. and was also, for some time, minister of St. Dunstan's in the West; from whence he was ejected by the act of uniformity. He was one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference in 1660, for reviewing the public liturgy, and assisted in drawing up the exceptions against the Book of Common Prayer. He was likewise chosen on the part of the non-conformist ministers, together with Dr. Jacomb and Mr. Baxter, to manage the dispute with Dr. Pearson, afterwards bishop of Chester, Dr. Gunning, afterwards bishop of Ely, and Dr. Sparrow, afterwards bishop of Norwich. The object of this conference was to persuade the dissenters to fall in with the requirements of the church of England, in regard to its rituals and ceremonies. But to the sophistical reasonings of Gunning, who seemed disposed to forward a reconciliation between the church of England and that of Rome, Dr. Bates constantly urged, that on the very same grounds on which they imposed the crucifix and surplice, they might bring in holy water, and all the trumpery of popery. On this occasion, the doctor displayed heroic firmness of mind, at the same time that he conducted himself with great wisdom and moderation. Whenever he spoke, what he said was solid, judicious, and to the point, which procured him great respect from his brethren.

When he retired from his charge at St. Dunstan's church, in 1662, he took leave of his flock in the following terms: "I know you expect I should say something as to my non-conformity. I shall only say thus much: It is neither fancy, faction, nor humor that makes me refuse to comply, but merely the fear of offending God. And if, after the best means used for my illumination, such as prayer to God, discourse and study, I cannot be satisfied about the lawfulness of what is required, if it be my unhappiness to be in error, surely men will have no reason to be angry with me in this world, and I hope God will pardon me in the next."

Dr. Bates was honored with the friendship of the lord keeper Bridgman, the lord chancellor Finch, the earl of Nottingham, and Archbishop Tillotson. He was offered the deanery of Litchfield and Coventry, at the restoration, but he declined the offer; and, according to Dr. Calamy, he might have been afterwards raised to any bishopric in the kingdom, could he have conformed to the established church. He resided for the latter part of his life at Hackney, where he died on the 19th of July, 1699, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

In external appearance, Dr. Bates was extremely handsome; his countenance mild, yet dignified; his voice remarkably soft and pleasing; and his style highly polished for the age in which he lived. Dr. Calamy says, that he was generally reputed one of the best orators of the day, and was well versed in the politer parts of learning, which so seasoned his conversation, as to render it highly entertaining to the more sensible part of mankind. His apprehension was quick and clear, and his reasoning faculty acute, prompt, and expert. His judgment was penetrating and solid, stable and firm. His memory was singularly tenacious, and scarcely impaired at the period of his death. His language was always neat and fine, but unaffected. His method in all his discourses would bear the test of the severest scrutiny. Mr. Granger says, that Dr. Bates was a man of a good and amiable character; much a scholar—much a gentleman—and no less a Christian. His moderation and sweetness of temper were known to all that conversed with him, among whom were eminent and pious men of various persuasions. Dr. Tillotson's friendship for him began early; and as his merit was invariably the same, it continued without interruption to the end of that prelate's life. He is esteemed the politest writer of the age among the Presbyterians. His works were collected and published in a thick folio volume after his decease; and a new edition of them appeared in 1815, in four volumes octavo, with a Memoir prefixed. His "Harmony of the Divine Attributes in the Work of Man's Redemption," has been deservedly popular.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

BATH; a measure of capacity for things liquid, being the same with the ephah, Ezek. 45: 11, and containing ten homers, or seven gallons and four pints.—Watson.

BATHING. The word washing in the New Testament, from the Greek lavo, signifies bathing. John 13: 10. Acts 9: 37. 16: 33. Heb. 10: 23. 2 Pet. 2: 22. Rev. 1: 5. This is the specific meaning of the word in the Greek writers, and in the Septuagint. Bathing undoubtedly took place first in rivers and in the sea; but men soon learned to enjoy this pleasure in their own houses. Even Homer mentions the use of the bath as an old custom. The bath, at this period, was the first refreshment offered to the guest. In later times, rooms, both public and private, were built expressly for the purpose of bathing. The public baths of the Greeks were mostly connected with the gymnasias, because they were taken immediately after the athletic exercises. The Romans, in the period of their luxury, imitated the Greeks in this point, and built magnificent baths. The following description applies both to the Greek and Roman baths:—The building which contained them was oblong, and had two divisions, the one for males, the other for females. In both, warm or cold baths could be taken. The warm baths, in both divisions, were adjacent to each other, for the sake of being easily heated. In the midst of the building, on the ground floor, was the heating room, by which not only the water for bathing, but sometimes also the floors of the adjacent rooms, were warmed. Above the heating room was an apartment in which three copper kettles were walled in, one above another, so that the lowest was immediately over the fire, the second over the first, and the third over the second. In this way; either boiling, lukewarm, or cold water could be obtained. The water was carried, by separate pipes, from these kettles into the bathing rooms, and a fresh supply was immediately poured into the kettles from a reservoir. Close to the heating room were three separate rooms on each side, for the hot, the lukewarm, and the cold bath. The bathing-rooms had, on the floor, a basin of mason-work, in which there were seats, and round it a gallery, where the bathers remained before they descended into the bath, and where, also, the attendants were. There was also a sweating-room, which was heated by means of flues, and was called laconicum. This room had an opening in the ceiling, through which the light fell, and from which was suspended a brazen plate, that could be raised and let down at pleasure, to increase or lessen the heat. For undressing, for receiving the garments, and for anointing after bathing, there were different rooms; and connected with the bath were walks, covered race-grounds, tennis-courts, and gardens. These buildings, together with a number of bathing-rooms, were necessary for a public bath, which was adorned with splendid furniture, and all the requisites for recreation, and resembled, in its exterior appearance, an extensive palace. Roman luxury, always in search of means for rendering sensual enjoyments more exquisite, in later times, built particular conduits for conducting seawater to the baths, used mountain snow, and enlarged these establishments in such a way that even their ruins excite admiration. (See Wichelhausen, on the Baths of the Ancients, Mannheim, 1807.)—Among the Europeans, the Russians have peculiar establishments for bathing, which are visited by all classes of the people during the whole year. The people regard these baths as a necessary of life, and they are to be found in every village. They are also met with in Finland.—Among the Asiatics, baths are in general use. The Turks are, by their religion, obliged to make repeated ablutions daily: besides these, men and women must bathe in particular circumstances and at certain times. For this purpose, there is, in every city, a public bath connected with a mosque; and rich private persons possess private bath-houses adorned with all the objects of Asiatic luxury.

Public baths are common in Europe, and there are, at present, few cities without them. Medicine has endeavored to increase the wholesome effects of baths by various compositions and modes of application. Baths are distinguished by the nature of the fluid, by the degree of heat, and by their influence upon the body. They are prepared with water, milk, wine, &c.; are of different temperatures; and herbs, iron, soap, and other substances are mixed with them, as the purpose requires. There are, also, baths of earth, sand, air, vapor, and electric baths. They are applied either to the whole body, or only to a single part. The shower bath affords an agreeable and healthful mode of bathing, and much use is made of it in medicine. Mineral baths are those, the water of which naturally contains mineral ingredients.—*Ency. BATH-KOL, daughter of the voice. By this name the Jewish writers distinguish what they called a revelation from God, after verbal prophecy had ceased in Israel; that is, after the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The generality of their traditions and customs are founded on this bath-kol. They pretend that God revealed them to their elders, not by prophecy, but by the daughter of the voice. The bath-kol, as Dr. Prideaux shows, was a fantastical way of divination, invented by the Jews, like the Sortes Virgiliae among the heathen. For, as with them, the words first opened upon in the works of that poet, was the oracle whereby they prognosticated those future events which they desired to be informed of; so with the Jews when they appealed to bath-kol, the next words which they should hear drop from any one's mouth were taken as the desired oracle. With some, it is probable that bath-kol, the daughter of the voice, was only an elegant personification of tradition. Others, however, more bold, said that it was a voice from heaven, sometimes attended by a clap of thunder.—Watson.

BATTLE. The object of a war may be obtained in two different ways: either one party forces the other, by skillful manœuvres, marches, demonstrations, the occupation of advantageous positions, &c. to quit the field (which belongs to the province of strategy); or the hostile masses approach each other (by design or by chance), so that a battle becomes necessary to determine which shall keep the field. The rules for securing a successful issue, whether they respect the preparations for the conflict, or the direction of the forces when actually engaged, belong to tactics, in the narrower sense of the word. Strategy also shows the causes which bring armies together, and produce battles without any agreement between the parties. It belongs not to this article to explain this point. It may be sufficient to say, in general, that armies, in their marches, (and consequently in their meetings,) are chiefly determined by the mountains and rivers of a country.

In ancient times and the middle ages, the battle-ground was often chosen by agreement, and then the battle was a mere trial of strength, a duel en gros; but, in our time, such trifling is done away. War is now carried on for the real or pretended interest of a nation, or a ruler who thinks or pretends that his interest is that of the nation. Wars are not undertaken for the purpose of fighting, and battles are merely the consequence of pursuing the purpose of the war. They arise from one party's striving to prevent the other from gaining his object. Every means, therefore, of winning the battle is resorted to, and an agreement can hardly be thought of. In this respect, a land battle is entirely different from a naval battle. The former is intended merely to remove an obstacle in the way of gaining the object of the war; the destruction of the enemy, therefore, is not the first thing sought for. The views of one party can often be carried into effect with very little effusion of blood; and if a general can obtain the same end by manœuvring as by a battle, he certainly prefers the former. But the object of a naval engagement is, almost always, the destruction of the enemy; those cases only excepted, in which a fleet intends to bring supplies or reinforcements to a blockaded port, and is obliged to fight to accomplish its purpose.

As the armies of the ancients were not so well organized as those of the moderns, and the combatants fought very little at a distance, after the battle had begun, manœuvres were much more difficult, and troops, when actually engaged, were almost entirely beyond the control of the general. With them, therefore, the battle depended almost wholly upon the previous arrangements, and the valor of the troops. Not so in modern times. The finest combinations, the most ingenious manœuvres, are rendered possible by the better organization of the armies, which thus, generally at least, remain under the control of the general.

The battle of the ancients was the rude beginning of an art now much developed. It is the skill of the general, rather than the courage of the soldier, that now determines the event of a battle. There is, probably, no situation, which requires the simultaneous exertion of all the powers of the mind more than that of a general at the decisive moment of a battle. While the soldier can yield himself entirely to the impulse of his courage, the general must coolly calculate the most various combinations; while the soldier retreats, the general must endeavor to turn the tide of battle by his ardor or his genius. Daring courage, undaunted firmness, the most active and ingenious invention, cool calculation, and thorough self-possession, amid scenes of tremendous agitation, and under the consciousness that the fate of a whole nation may depend on him alone in the trying moment,—these are the qualities which a good general cannot dispense with for a moment. If it is the character of genius to conceive great ideas instantaneously, in every genius is in this respect the greatest. Great generals have therefore been, in all ages, the objects of admiration; and as a great artist may be no example, in a moral point of view, although we admire the genius displayed in his productions, so we cannot but bestow the same kind of admiration on the high intellectual gifts of a great general. Few situations, therefore, enable a man to acquire higher glory, than that of a great commander in a good cause.

If troops meet accidentally, and are thus obliged to fight, it is called a rencontre. Further, battles are distinguished into offensive and defensive. Of course, a battle which is offensive for one side, is defensive for the other.

Tacticians divide a battle into three periods—that of the disposition, that of the combat, and the decisive moment. The general examines the strength, reconnoitres the position, and endeavors to learn the intention of the enemy. If the enemy conceals his plan and position, skirmishes and partial assaults are often advisable, in order to disturb him, to obtain a view of his movements, to induce him to advance, or with the view of making prisoners, who may be questioned, &c. Since the general cannot direct all these operations in person, officers of the staff, and aids assist him; single scouts or small bodies are sent out, and spies are employed. Any person or thing (ministers, peasants, shepherds, maps, &c.) which can afford information of the enemy, or the ground on which the battle is to take place, is made use of for obtaining intelligence, by force or otherwise. According to the knowledge thus acquired, and the state of the troops, the plan of the battle, or the disposition, is made; and here military genius has an opportunity to display itself. There is an immense difference between the quick, clear and ingenious disposition of a great general, which shows the leading features of the plan to every commander under him, and provides for all cases favorable or unfavorable, with a few distinct touches, without depriving the different commanders of freedom of action, and the slow, indistinct, minute, and, after all, inaccurate dispositions of a feeble commander. Napoleon's dispositions are real master-pieces. Like a great artist, he delineates, with a few strokes, the whole character of the battle; and as the disciples of Raphael assisted in the painting of his pictures, but necessarily worked in the great style of their master, which his first lines gave to the picture, so all the skilful generals under Napoleon labored for the accomplishment of one great end, sometimes disclosed to them, sometimes concealed in the breast of their commander. To the disposition also belongs the detaching of large bodies which are to co-operate in the battle, but not under the immediate command of the chief. The plan of the battle itself, the position of the troops, &c. is called the order of battle. This is either the parallel, or the inclosing, (if the enemy cannot develop his forces, or you are strong enough to outflank him,) or the oblique.

When each division of troops has taken its position, and received its orders, and the weaker parts have been fortified, (if time allows it,) the artillery placed on the most favorable points, all chasms connected by bridges; villages, woods, &c. taken possession of, and all impediments removed as far as possible, (which very often cannot be done except by fighting,) then comes the second period—that of the engagement. The combat begins, either on several points at a given signal, as is the case when the armies are very large, and a general attack is intended, as, for instance, at Leipsic, where three fire-balls gave the signal for battle on the side of the allies; or by skirmishes of the light troops, which is the most common case. The artillery endeavors to dismount the batteries of the enemy, to destroy his columns, and, in general, to break a passage, if possible, for the other troops. The forces, at the present day, are brought into action mostly in columns, and not, as formerly, in long but weak lines. Here the skill of commanders of battalions is exerted. Upon them rests the principal execution of the actual combat. The plans and orders of a general reach only to a certain point; the chiefs of battalions must do the chief work of the battle. Before the battle, the general places himself upon a point, from which he can see the conflict, and where he can easily receive reports—upon a hill, in a wind-mill, &c. Sometimes if there is no such favorable point, a staging is erected. A few men are near him as his body-guard; others take charge of the plans and maps; telescopes are indispensable. He often sends one of his aids to take instant command of the nearest body of cavalry, in order to execute an order which must be carried into effect quickly. He receives the reports of the generals under him, and gives new orders; disposes of the troops not yet in action; strengthens weak points; throws his force upon the enemy where he sees them waver; or changes, if necessary, with a bold and ingenious thought, the whole order of battle.

The general now uses every means to bring on the third period of the battle—the decisive moment. This cannot always be the result of combinations. It often takes place much sooner than was expected; it is often protracted by accidents, want of energy on the part of the commanders, &c. Sometimes all the operations are drawing to the end which the general aimed at, when an unforeseen accident suddenly gives a new impulse to the enemy. Victory or defeat depend now upon one moment, one happy idea. Perhaps it is all-important to break, at once, the enemy's centre, perhaps to concentrate the destructive power of the artillery, and, sweeping away some obstacle, to send, as Napoleon often did, a torrent of cavalry upon a certain point. Any thing which can carry disorder into the ranks of the enemy is of great use. If he begins to waver, or to retreat in order, or to flee in disorder, it is always necessary to follow up the victory with all possible vigor and celerity. This is as important as victory itself. Napoleon was, till the last war in Germany, a master in this particular.

There are three maxims, as important for the general as they are simple: (1.) Know your enemy, his strength and intentions; (2.) make all the operations and manœuvres of the parts coincide, as much as possible, with the great plan of the battle; (3.) pursue victory to the utmost. It is also a maxim, in regard to battles, as well as to the conduct of the war generally, to make the enemy conform to your plans, and to avoid the necessity of accommodating yourself to his. Stratagems are often of the greatest advantage. After a battle, care must be taken of the wounded. Soldiers are often appointed to take care of their unfortunate comrades during the battle. It ought to be always done, though it never can do good to any great extent. At night, if cold, fires are lighted, that the wounded may creep to them. Peasants are sent out to bring in the living, and to bury the dead in large pits; but, if possible, soldiers should always be sent with them, because the peasants, if of the enemy's nation, often plunder half dead soldiers, and bury them alive. They are generally very rapacious, and think they have a right to indemnify themselves for their severe losses.

Such is the art of war, in ancient and in modern times. How opposite is it to the pacific and benevolent principles of Christianity! The Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them. When his religion shall become universal, the arts of peace and love shall alone be cultivated; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Isai. 2: 4.

But there is a spiritual conflict—a perpetual contest against prejudice, error, sophistry, infidelity, and sin—to which all on earth are summoned, and for which all should be prepared. This is the good fight of faith. Happy they who are found most skilful and successful on this glorious field! Better is he that conquers one criminal passion, that triumphs over one practical illusion, one easily besetting habit of sin, that wins one soul to God, that plants the standard of truth and holiness one step in advance of its present position among men, than he who taketh a city, or even subdues an empire at his feet. He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son. Rev. 21: 7. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. Rev. 2: 10.—*Ency. BAXTER, (RICHARD,) was born at Rowton, in Shropshire, November 12, 1615. He was one of the great non-conformist divines; and though he, in the early part of his life, labored under many and great disadvantages, owing to the irreligion and ignorance of those under whose care he was placed, he was afterwards one of the greatest men of the age in which he lived. During the first few years of his life, he was much addicted to lying, covetousness in play, fondness for romances, &c.; but, fortunately for him, his father directed his attention to the historical part of the Bible, which much interested him, and inspired him with a desire to peruse those parts which were more doctrinal. In consequence of such determination, by the perusal of the Bible and other religious books, and the conversations of his father, his mind became illuminated, and his soul converted to God. After having been for some time under the care of Mr. John Owen, school-master of the free school at Wroxeter, his parents accepted of a proposal for placing him under the care of Mr. Richard Wickstead, chaplain to the council of Ludlow. This gentleman proved to be very incompetent to his charge, being an indifferent scholar, and taking no pains with his pupil. The only benefit he obtained, while under his tuition, was the liberal use of his library, which to him was of great advantage. At this time, the mind of Mr. Baxter was considerably alarmed by the fear of death, which produced in him great seriousness, and a more earnest attention to religion. Divinity became his first and favorite pursuit. Zealous in his attachment to the cause of truth, Mr. Baxter entered into the work of the ministry, after having been examined and ordained by bishop Thornborough, of Worcester. In 1633, he became master of the free school at Dudley, in Worcestershire, where he delivered his first sermon. In 1638, he applied to the bishop of Winchester for holy orders, which he received, being at that time attached to the church of England. The et cetera oath was his first inducement to examine into this point; and, though Mr. Baxter studied the ablest works, he utterly rejected the oath. In 1640, he was requested to become pastor of the church at Kidderminster, which he accepted, and continued there two years. At this place he was eminently useful, and found much encouragement. The state of the country at that period was peculiarly precarious; since at that time the civil war, in the reign of Cromwell, commenced, and Mr. Baxter was a decided friend to the parliament, which exposed him to many and great inconveniences. Notwithstanding his attachment to the parliament, he considered both parties partially erroneous. He admitted that great indiscretion, and even much sin, was displayed and committed, in dishonoring the king, and in the language used against the bishops, liturgy, and the church; but he considered that whoever was faulty, the liberties of the people and public safety ought not to be forfeited, and that the people were not guilty of the faults of king or parliament, when they defended them; and, that if both their causes had been bad, as against each other, yet that the subjects should adhere to that party which most secured the welfare of the nation. When Mr. Baxter was at Kidderminster, he was considerably persecuted, which obliged him to retire to Gloucester, where he found a civil, courteous, and religious people. There he continued a month, when many pamphlets were written on both sides of the contending political parties, which unhappily divided the nation preparatory to a war. At that time, contentions commenced between the commission of array and the parliament militia. At the earnest request of the people, Mr. Baxter returned to Kidderminster, and remained with them fourteen years; when he joined colonel Whalley's regiment, as chaplain, and was present at several sieges. He confessed himself unwilling to leave his studies and friends, but he thought only of the public good. He was, however, compelled to quit the army, in 1657, in consequence of a sudden and dangerous illness, and returned to Worcester. From that place he went to London, to have medical advice. He was advised to visit Tunbridge wells; and after continuing at that place some time, and finding his health improved, he visited London, just before the deposition of Cromwell, and preached to the parliament the day previous to its voting the restoration of the king. He preached, occasionally, about the city of London, having a license from bishop Sheldon. He was one of the Tuesday lecturers at Pinners' hall; and also had a Friday lecture at Fetter lane. In 1662, he preached his farewell sermon at Blackfriars, and afterwards retired to Acton, in Middlesex. In 1676, he built a meeting-house in Oxendon street; and, when he had but once preached there, the congregation was disturbed, and Mr. Sedden, then preaching for him, was sent to the Gatehouse, instead of Mr. Baxter, where he continued three months. In 1682, Mr. Baxter was seized, by a warrant, for coming within five miles of a corporation; and his goods and books were sold, as a penalty, for five sermons he had preached. Owing to the bad state of his health, he was not at that time imprisoned, through the kindness of Mr. Thomas Cox, who went to five justices of the peace, and made oath that Mr. Baxter was in a bad state of health, and that such imprisonment would most likely cause his death. In 1685, he was sent to the king's bench, by a warrant from the lord chief justice Jefferies, for some passages in his Paraphrase on the New Testament; but, having obtained from king James, through the good offices of lord Powis, a pardon, he retired to Charter house yard; occasionally preached to large and devoted congregations, and at length died, December 8, 1691, and was interred in Christ church.

Mr. Baxter's life was one continued scene of discord and reproach, though of most considerable piety and zeal. By multitudes he was revered, whilst by many he was despised. It has been stated, that he was the author of one hundred and forty-five distinct treatises, most of which were polemical, and many were distinguished for their learning and simplicity. Some of the most popular of those treatises are, The Saints' Everlasting Rest; Aphorisms of Justification and the Covenants; Catholic Theology; A Treatise on Universal Redemption; A Call to the Unconverted. For a detailed account of this pious and excellent man, see Baxter's Life, quarto, and Calemy's Non-conformist's Memorial; Jones's Chr. Biog.

BAXTER, (ANDREW); an eminent metaphysician, born 1686, at Aberdeen, died 1750. He was educated at King's college. His principal work was an Inquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul, a production which Warburton highly praised.

BAXTERIANISM; so called from the learned and pious individual whose biography has been given above. His design was to reconcile Calvin and Arminius; for this purpose, he formed a middle scheme between their systems. He taught that God had elected some, whom he is determined to save, without any foresight of antecedent faith; and that others, to whom the Gospel is preached, have common grace, which if they improve, they shall obtain saving grace, according to the doctrine of Arminius. He owns with Calvin, that the merits of Christ's death are to be applied to believers only; but he also asserts that all men are in a state capable of salvation.

Mr. Baxter maintains that there may be a certainty of perseverance here, and yet he cannot tell whether a man may not have so weak a degree of saving grace as to lose it again.

In order to prove that the death of Christ has put all in a state capable of salvation, the following arguments are alleged by this learned author:—1. It was the nature of all mankind which Christ assumed at his incarnation, and the sins of all mankind were the occasion of his suffering. 2. It was to Adam, as the common father of lapsed mankind, that God made the promise. Gen. 3: 15. The conditional new covenant does equally give Christ, pardon, and life to all mankind, on condition of acceptance. The conditional grant is universal:—"Whosoever believeth shall be saved." 3. It is not to the elect only, but to all mankind, that Christ has commanded his ministers to proclaim his Gospel, and offer the benefits of his procuring.

There are, Mr. Baxter allows, certain fruits of Christ's death, which are proper to the elect only: 1. Grace eventually worketh in them true faith, repentance, conversion, and union with Christ as his living members. 2. The actual forgiveness of sin as to the spiritual and eternal punishment. 3. Our reconciliation with God, and adoption and right to the heavenly inheritance. 4. The Spirit of Christ to dwell in us, and sanctify us, by a habit of divine love. Rom. 8: 9—13. Gal. 5: 6. 5. Employment in holy, acceptable service, and access in prayer, with a promise of being heard through Christ. Heb. 2: 5, 6. John 14: 13. 6. Well-grounded hopes of salvation, peace of conscience, and spiritual communion with the church mystical in heaven and earth. Rom. 5: 12. Heb. 12: 22. 7. A special interest in Christ, and intercession with the Father. Rom. 8: 32, 33. 8. Resurrection unto life, and justification in judgment; glorification of the soul at death, and of the body at the resurrection. Phil. 3: 20, 21. 2 Cor. 5: 1, 2, 3.

Christ has made a conditional deed of gift of these benefits to all mankind; but the elect only accept and possess them. Hence he infers, that though Christ never absolutely intended or decreed that his death should eventually put all men in possession of those benefits, yet he did intend and decree that all men should have a conditional gift of them by his death.

Baxter's celebrated "Aphorisms of Justification," published in 1649, afforded employment to himself and his theological critics till near the close of his life; and in the many modifications, concessions, and alterations which were extorted from him by men of different religious tenets, he sometimes incautiously proved himself to be more Calvinistic than Calvin, and at others more Arminian than Arminius. The following observations, from "Orme's Life of Baxter," are, on the whole, just and instructive:—

"Thus did Baxter, at a very early period of his life, launch into the ocean of controversy, on some of the most interesting subjects that can engage the human mind. The manner in which he began to treat them was little favorable to arriving at correct and satisfactory conclusions. Possessed of a mind uncommonly penetrating, he yet seems not to have had the faculty of compressing within narrow limits his own views, or the accounts he was disposed to give of the views of others. All this arose, not from any indisposition to be explicit, but from the peculiar character of his mind. He is perpetually distinguishing things into physical and moral, real and nominal, material and formal. However important these distinctions are, they often render his writings tiresome to the reader, and his reasonings more frequently perplexing than satisfactory. Baxter is generally understood to have pursued a middle course between Calvinism and Arminianism. That he tried to hold and adjust the balance between the two parties, and that he was most anxious to reconcile them, are very certain. But it seems scarcely less evident, that he was much more a Calvinist than he was an Arminian. While this seems to me very apparent, it must be acknowledged, that if certain views which have often been given of Calvinism are necessary to constitute a Calvinist, Richard Baxter was no believer in that creed.

"While satisfied that among Baxter's sentiments, no important or vital error will be found, yet in the style and method in which he too generally advocated or defended them, there is much to censure. The wrangling and disputations manner in which he presented many of his views, was calculated to gender an unsanctified state of mind in persons who either abetted or opposed his sentiments. His scholastic and metaphysical style of arguing is unbefitting the simplicity of the Gospel, and cannot fail to injure it wherever such is employed. It not only savors too much of the spirit of the schools, and the philosophy of this world, but places the truths of revelation on a level with the rudiments of human science.

"In illustration of the influence now adverted to, it must be remarked, that the first stage in that process of deterioration which took place among the Presbyterian Dissenters, was generally characterized by the term Baxterianism; a word to which it is difficult to attach a definite meaning. It denotes no separate sect or party, but rather a system of opinions on doctrinal points, verging towards Arminianism, and which ultimately passed to Arrianism and Socinianism. Even during Baxter's own life, while the Presbyterians taxed the Independents with Antinomianism, the latter retorted the charge of Socinianism, or at least with a tendency towards it, in some of the opinions maintained both by Baxter and others of that party. To whatever cause it is to be attributed, it is a melancholy fact, that the declension which began even at this early period in the Presbyterian body, went on slowly, but surely, till, from the most fervid orthodoxy, it finally arrived, in England, at the frigid zone of Unitarianism.

"I wish not to be understood as stating that Baxter either held any opinions of this description, or was conscious of a tendency in his sentiments towards such a fearful consummation, but, that there was an injurious tendency in his manner of discussing certain important subjects. It was subtle, and full of logomachy; it tended to unsettle, rather than to fix and determine; it generated strife, rather than godly edifying. It is not possible to study such books as his Methodus, and his Catholic Theology, without experiencing that we are brought into a different region from apostolic Christianity; a region of fierce debate and altercation about words, and names, and opinions; in which all that can be said for error is largely dwelt upon, as well as what can be said for truth. The ambiguities of language, the diversities of sects, the uncertainties of human perception and argument, are urged, till the force of revealed truth is considerably weakened, and confidence in our own judgment of its meaning greatly impaired. Erroneous language is maintained to be capable of sound meaning, and the most scriptural phrases to be susceptible of unscriptural interpretation, till truth and error almost change places, and the mind is bewildered, confounded, and paralysed. Into this mode of discussing such subjects, was this most excellent man led, partly by the natural constitution of his mind, which has often been adverted to; partly by his ardent desire of putting an end to the divisions of the Christian world, and producing universal concord and harmony. He failed where success was impossible, however plausible might have been the means which he employed. He understood the causes of difference and contention better than their remedies; hence the measures which he used frequently aggravated instead of curing the disease. While a portion of evil, however, probably resulted from Baxter's mode of conducting controversy, and no great light was thrown by him on some of the dark and difficult subjects which he so keenly discussed, I have no doubt he contributed considerably to produce a more moderate spirit towards each other, between Calvinists and Arminians, than had long prevailed. Though he satisfied neither party, he must have convinced both, that great difficulties exist on the subjects in debate, if pursued beyond a certain length; that allowance ought to be made by each, for the weakness or prejudices of the other; and that genuine religion is compatible with some diversity of opinion respecting one or all of the five points." A similar effect to that which Mr. Orme ascribes to Baxter's writings on the English Presbyterians, followed also on the continent, among the reformed churches. It was the same middle system, with its philosophical subtleties, which Cameron and Amyraut taught abroad; and which produced in them those effects that have been justly ascribed, both in England and abroad, to Arminianism. BAY-TREE. This tree is mentioned only in Ps. 37: 35, 36.—"I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree. Yet he passed away, and lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found." But the original word, ezrebh, merely signifies a native tree—a tree growing in its native soil, not having suffered by transplantation, and therefore spreading itself luxuriantly. Many critics, however, think that czrech is the laurel.—Abbott.

BAYARD, (CHEVALIER DE,) called the knight without fear and without reproach, born in 1476, was one of the most spotless characters of the middle ages. He was simple and modest; a true friend and tender lover; pious, humane, and magnanimous. The family of Terrail, to which he belonged, was one of the most ancient in Dauphiny, and was celebrated for nobility and valor. Bayard, educated under the eyes of his uncle George of Terrail, bishop of Grenoble, early imbibed, in the school of this worthy prelate, the virtues which distinguished him afterwards. The tournaments were his first field of earthly glory. At the age of eighteen, he greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Verona, where he took a standard. Such was the splendor of his reputation, won in subsequent battles, that Francis I. refused to receive knighthood from any other sword than his, and he was saluted in Paris as the savior of his country. He fell in battle, April 30, 1524, surrounded by friends and enemies, who all shed tears of admiration and grief.—Ency. Amer.

BAYARD, (JOUN,) a friend to his country and an eminent Christian, was born August 11, 1738, on Bohemia manor, in Cecil county, Maryland. His father died without a will, and being the eldest son, he became entitled, by the laws of Maryland, to the whole real estate. Such, however, was his affection for his twin brother, younger than himself, that no sooner had he reached the age of manhood, than he conveyed to him half the estate. After receiving an academical education under Dr. Finley, he was put into the counting house of Mr. John Rhea, a merchant of Philadelphia. It was here, that the seeds of grace began first to take root, and to give promise of those fruits of righteousness which afterwards abounded. He early became a communicant of the Presbyterian church, under the charge of Gilbert Tennent. Some years after his marriage, he was chosen a ruling elder, and he filled this place with zeal and reputation. Mr. Whitefield, while on his visits to America, became intimately acquainted with Mr. Bayard, and was much attached to him. They made several tours together. When his brother's widow died, Mr. Bayard adopted the children, and educated them as his own. One of them was an eminent statesman.

At the commencement of the revolutionary war, he took a decided part in favor of his country. At the head of the second battalion of the Philadelphia militia, he marched to the assistance of Washington, and was present at the battle of Trenton. He was a member of the council of safety, and for many years speaker of the legislature. In 1785, he was appointed a member of the old congress, then sitting in New York; but in the following year he was left out of the delegation. In 1788, he removed to New Brunswick, where he was mayor of the city, judge of the court of common pleas, and a ruling elder of the church. Here he died, January 7, 1807, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

At his last hour, he was not left in darkness. That Redeemer, whom he had served with zeal, was with him to support him, and give him the victory. During his last illness, he spoke much of his brother, and one night, awaking from sleep, exclaimed, "My dear brother, I shall soon be with you." He addressed his two sons, "My dear children, you see me just at the close of life. Death has no terrors to me. What now is all the world to me? I would not exchange my hope in Christ for ten thousand worlds. I once entertained some doubts of his divinity; but, blessed be God, these doubts were soon removed by inquiry and reflection. From that time, my hope of acceptance with God has rested on his merits and atonement. Out of Christ, God is a consuming fire." As he approached nearer the grave, he said, "I shall soon be at rest; I shall soon be with my God. Oh glorious hope! Blessed rest! How precious are the promises of the Gospel! It is the support of my soul in my last moments." While sitting up, supported by his two daughters, holding one of his sons by the hand, and looking intently in his face, he said, "My Christian brother!" Then turning to his two daughters, he continued, "You are my Christian sisters. Soon will our present ties be dissolved, but more glorious bonds —" He could say no more, but his looks and arms, directed towards heaven, expressed every thing. He frequently commended himself to the blessed Redeemer, confidant of his love; and the last words which escaped from his dying lips, were, "Lord Jesus, Lord Jesus, Lord Jesus."—Evang. Intelligencer, 1, 1—7, 49—57; Allen.

BAYLE, (PETER,) one of the most eminent of modern philosophers and critics, was the son of a protestant minister, and was born in 1647, at Carlat, in France. In his youth, he manifested uncommon talents, and studied so intensely as to do permanent injury to his health. For a while, he was seduced to the Catholic religion; but he soon abandoned it. In 1675, after having for some time subsisted by private tuition, he became professor of philosophy at Sedan; and when, six years subsequently, the college of Sedan was suppressed, he obtained the same professorship at Rotterdam. The latter, however, he was deprived of, in 1696, by the calumnies and exertions of his quondam friend, Jurien, who never ceased to persecute him. Bayle died at Rotterdam, in 1706, of a disease in the chest. His works are numerous; they compose eight folio volumes, of which four are occupied with his justly celebrated Critical Dictionary. Among the principal of his minor productions, may be mentioned his Thoughts on Comets; Reply to the Questions of a Provincial; and Intelligence of the Republic of Letters. The latter, which is an excellent review, was commenced in 1684, and continued for three years.

"Bayle," says Voltaire, "is the first of logicians and sceptics. His greatest enemies must confess, that there is not a line in his works, which contains an open aspersion of Christianity; but his warmest apologists must acknowledge, that there is not a page in his controversial writings, which does not lead the reader to doubt, and often to scepticism." All books were eagerly devoured by him; his taste for logic led him particularly to study religious controversies; and the confidence of most theologians led him to undertake to prove, that several points are not so certain and so evident as they imagined. But he gradually passed these limits; and his mental habits caused him to doubt even the most universally acknowledged facts. Though an admirable logician, he was so little acquainted with physics, that even the discoveries of Newton were unknown to him. What a favorable change might this knowledge have wrought in his habits of mind! "My talent," he says, "consists in raising doubts; but they are only doubts." He compares himself, in this respect, to cloud-compelling Jupiter. But is there no truth behind the cloud?—Bayle, it is said to his honor never attacked the great laws of morality. His favorite books were Plutarch and Montaigne. The latter, without doubt, encouraged his inclination to scepticism; perhaps both contributed to give to his style that vivacity, that boldness of expression, and antique coloring, so observable in it.

The academic scepticism which the genius of Bayle revived, and made popular in modern times, is fast passing away, if not altogether extinct. Nor is it likely ever to be restored, by any train of favoring circumstances. Men have discovered the radical absurdity of ever seeking, for the avowed purpose of never finding; of perpetually reasoning, in order never to come to any valuable result. Doubt is but the first step of ignorance towards inquiry; and inquiry, honestly and patiently pursued, leads to truth, knowledge, certainty. He who stops short, is but half a philosopher. The academic philosophy is much more suitable to the genius of ancient than of modern times, and more fitted for the infancy of the understanding than for the present more advanced period, when many important discoveries have been ascertained, and the strength of men's faculties have been successfully tried in explaining many of the mysteries of nature.—Davenport; Ency. Amer.; Douglas On Errors regarding Religion.

BAYLY, (LEWIS,) a native of Caermarthen, was educated at Oxford, and, in 1616, was consecrated bishop of Bangor. He died in 1634. The Practice of Piety, a work which was long popular, and went through sixty English editions, besides several in Welsh, was written by this prelate.—Davenport.

BAYNARD, (ANNE), daughter of Dr. E. Baynard. Born at Preston, in Lancashire, in 1672; died at Barnes, in Surry, 1697, aged twenty-five. Her father, observing her genius and natural propensity to learning, gave her a very liberal education, of which she made the best use.

"As for learning," says the Rev. J. Prude, in his funeral sermon, "whether it be to understand natural causes and events, the courses of the sun, moon, and stars, the qualities of herbs and plants; to be acquainted with the demonstrable varieties of mathematics; the study of philosophy, the writings of the ancients, and that in their own proper language, without the help of an interpreter; these, and the like, are the most noble accomplishments of the human mind, and accordingly do bring great delight and satisfaction along with them; these things she was not only conversant in, but mistress of; and that to such a degree, that very few of her sex did ever arrive at."

She took the greatest pains to perfect her knowledge of the Greek tongue, that she might with greater pleasure read St. Chrysostom in his own language. She was not satisfied with reading only, but composed many things in the Latin tongue. She would often say, "It was a sin to be contented with a little knowledge." She was skilled in reasoning, and eager to maintain the pure principles of Christianity, against innovators and deists.

She used to say, "Human learning is worth nothing, unless, as a handmaid, it leads us to the knowledge of Christ, revealed in the Gospel as our Lord and Savior." She was a constant attendant on the means of grace, fond of retirement and meditation, and very charitable. She had a love for the souls of her fellow-creatures; and was heartily afflicted with the errors, follies, and vices of the age; to see that "those who called themselves Christians, should, by bad principles, and worse practice, dishonor their profession, and not only hazard their salvation, but that of their weak brother too, for whom Christ died." And this temper of mind made her not only importunate in her intercessions for the good of the world, but gave her courage and discretion above her years or sex, to benefit the souls of those she conversed with, by friendly reproof, good counsel, or some learned and pious discourse.

Just before her death, she wished, "that all young people might be exhorted to the practice of virtue, to increase their knowledge by the practice of philosophy, and, more especially, to read the great book of nature, wherein they might see the wisdom and power of the great Creator, in the order of the universe, and in the production and preservation of all things. It would fix in their minds a love to so much perfection, frame a divine idea and an awful regard of God, which heightens devotion, lowers the spirit of pride, and gives a disposition and habit to his service; it makes us tremble at folly and profaneness, and commands reverence and prostration to his great and holy name."

"That women," says she, "are capable of such improvements, which will better their judgments and understandings, is past all doubt; would they but set to it in earnest, and spend but half of that time in study and thinking, which they do in visits, vanity, and folly, it would introduce a composure of mind, and lay a sound basis and ground-work for wisdom and knowledge, by which they would be better enabled to serve God and help their neighbors."—Betham.

BDELLIUM, occurs Gen. 2: 12. and Numb. 11: 7. Interpreters seem at a loss to know what to do with this word, and have rendered it variously. Many suppose it a mineral production. The Septuagint translates in the first place, a carbuncle, and in the second, a crystal. The bedoleh, in Genesis, is undoubtedly some precious stone; and its color, mentioned in Numbers, where the manna is spoken of as of the color of bdellium, is explained by a reference to Exod. 16: 14, 31. where it is likened to hoarfrost, which being like little fragments of ice, may confirm the opinion that the bdellium is the beryl, perhaps that pellucid kind, called by Dr. Hill the ellipomocrostyla, or beryl crystal.—Watson.

BEACON, a signa, erected on a rising ground, or top of a hill, to give warning of the approach of an enemy; or on a place of danger, to warn passengers to avoid it. The Jews were like a beacon and ensign on a hill, when the judgments of God had rendered them few in number, and laid on them such alarming distress as loudly warned others to avoid the like sins. Isa. 30: 17.

BEAN, (JOSEPH), minister of Wrentham, was born in Boston, March 7, 1718, of pious parents, was graduated at Harvard college in 1743, and ordained the third minister of Wrentham, November 24, 1750. He died, December 12, 1784, aged sixty-six. Mr. Bean was an eminently pious and faithful minister, and is worthy of honorable remembrance. From his diary, it appears that he usually spent one or two hours, morning and evening, in reading the Bible and secret devotion; also the afternoon of Saturday, when his discourses were prepared for the Sabbath; and the days of the birth of himself and children, as well as other days. He was truly humble, and watchful against all the excitements of pride. His conscience was peculiarly susceptible. His heart was tender and benevolent. Such was his constant intercourse with heaven, that hundreds of times, when riding in the performance of parochial duty, he has dismounted in a retired place to pour out his heart to God. When he had prepared a sermon, he would take it in his hand, and kneel down to implore a blessing on it. Nothing was permitted to divert him from preaching faithfully the solemn truths of the Gospel. He loved his work and his people, and they loved and honored him. Such a life will doubtless obtain the honor which cometh from God; and in the day of judgment, many such obscure men, whom the world knew not, will be exalted far above a multitude of learned doctors in divinity, and celebrated orators, and lofty dignitaries, whose names once resounded through the earth. He published a century sermon, October 26, 1773.—Panoptist, v. 481—488; Allen.

BEAR. In the Hebrew, this animal is very expressively called the grumbler, or growler.

There are three kinds of the bear known: the white, the black, and the brown. Of the two former the Scripture does not speak; the latter kind being the only one known in the eastern regions. The brown bear, says Buffon, is not only savage, but solitary; he takes refuge in the most unfrequented parts, and the most dangerous precipices and uninhabited mountains. He chooses his den in the most gloomy parts of the forest, in some cavern that has been hollowed by time, or in the hollow of some old enormous tree. The disposition of this animal is most surly and rapacious, and his mischievousness has passed into a proverb. His appearance corresponds with his temper: his coat is ragged, his limbs strong and thick, and his countenance, covered with a dark and sullen scowl, indicates the settled moroseness of his disposition. The sacred writers frequently associate this formidable enemy with the king of the forest, as being equally dangerous and destructive. Thus Amos, setting before his incorrigible countrymen the succession of calamities which, under the just judgment of God, was about to befall them, declares that the removal of one would but leave another equally grievous: "Wo unto you that desire the day of the Lord! To what end is it for you? The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light. As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him." Amos 5: 18, 19. And Solomon, who had closely studied the character of the several individuals of the animal kingdom, compares an unprincipled and wicked ruler to these creatures: "As a roaring lion and a ranging bear, so is a wicked ruler over the poor people." Prov. 28: 15.

The she-bear is said to be even more fierce and terrible than the male, especially after she has cubbed. So strong is her attachment to her young, and so extreme the jealousy with which she protects them, that no stranger, whether man or beast, is suffered to intrude on her solitude with impunity. This circumstance finely illustrates the beautiful imagery of the prophet, employed to delineate the amazing change which the Gospel of Christ will be the instrument of effecting in the human heart, and the delightful harmony which will follow in its train: "And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together." Isa. 11: 7.

To the fury of the female bear, when she happens to be robbed of her young, there are several striking allusions in Scripture. Those persons who have witnessed her under such circumstances, describe her rage to be most violent and frantic, and as only to be diverted from the object of her vengeance with the loss of her life. How terrible, then, was the threatening of the incensed ЖЕНОУА, in consequence of the numerous and aggravated iniquities of the kingdom of Israel, as uttered by the prophet Hosea—"I will meet them as a bear bereaved of her whelps, and will rend the caul of their heart!" Chap. 13: 8.

The execution of this terrible denunciation, in the invasion of the land by the Assyrian armies, and the utter subversion of the kingdom, is well known to every reader of Scripture.

In the vision of Daniel, where the four great monarchies of antiquity are symbolized by different beasts of prey, whose qualities resembled the character of these several states, the Medo-Persian empire is represented by a bear, which raised itself up on one side, and had between its teeth three ribs; and they said thus unto it: "Arise, devour much flesh." Dan. 7: 5. All the four monarchies agreed in their fierceness and rapacity; but there were several striking differences in the subordinate features of their character, and their mode of operation, which is clearly intimated by the different characters of their symbolical representatives. The Persian monarchy is represented by a bear, to denote its cruelty and greediness after blood; and in this imputation the prophet Jeremiah unites, by designating the Persians "the spoilers." Chap. 51: 48, 56. The learned Bochart has enumerated several points of resemblance between that character of the Medo-Persians and the dispositions of this animal.—Abbott.

BEARD. The Hebrews wore their beards, but had, doubtless, in common with other Asiatic nations, several fashions in this, as in all other parts of dress. Moses forbids them, Levit. 19: 27. "to cut off entirely the angle, or extremity of their beard;" that is, to avoid the manner of the Egyptians, who left only a little tuft of beard at the extremity of their chins. The Jews, in some places, at this day, suffer a little fillet of hair to grow from below the ears to the chin; where, as well as upon their lower lips, their beards are long. When they mourned, they entirely shaved the hair of their heads and beards, and neglected to trim their beards, to regulate them into neat order, or to remove what grew on their upper lips and cheeks. Jer. 41: 5. 48: 37. In times of grief and affliction, they plucked away the hair of their heads and beards, a mode of expression common to other nations under great calamities. The king of the Ammonites, designing to insult David in the person of his ambassadors, cut away half of their beards, and half of their clothes; that is, he cut off all their beard on one side of their faces. 2 Sam. 10: 4, 5. 1 Chron. 19: 5. To avoid ridicule, David did not wish them to appear at his court till their beards were grown again. When a leper was cured of his leprosy, he washed himself in a bath, and shaved off all the hair of his body; after which, he returned into the camp, or city; seven days afterwards, he washed himself and his clothes again, shaved off all his hair, and offered the sacrifices appointed for his purification. Lev. 14: 9. The Levites, at their consecration, were purified by bathing, and washing their bodies and clothes; after which, they shaved off all the hair of their bodies, and then offered the sacrifices appointed for their consecration. Numb. 8: 7.

Nothing has been more fluctuating in the different ages of the world, and countries, than the fashion of wearing the beard. Some have cultivated one part, and some another; some have endeavored to extirpate it entirely, whilst others have almost idolized it: the revolutions of countries have scarcely been more famous than the revolutions of beards. It is a great mark of infamy among the Arabs to cut off the beard. Many people would prefer death to this kind of treatment. As they would think it a grievous punishment to lose it, they carry things so far as to beg for the sake of it: "By your beard, by the life of your beard, God preserve your blessed beard." When they would express their value for any thing, they say, "It is worth more than a man's beard." And hence, we may easily learn the magnitude of the offence of the Ammonites, in their treatment of David's ambassadors, as above mentioned; and also the force of the emblem used, Ezek. 5: 1—5. where the inhabitants of Jerusalem are compared to the hair of his head and beard. Though they had been dear to God as the hair of an eastern beard to its owner, they should be taken away and consumed, one part by pestilence and famine, another by the sword, another by the calamities incident on exile.—Watson.

BEASTS. When this word is used in opposition to man, as Psalm 36: 5. any brute creature is signified; when to creeping things, as Lev. 11: 2, 7. 29: 30. four-footed animals, from the size of the hare and upwards, are intended; and when to wild creatures, as Gen. 1: 25. cattle, or tame animals, are spoken of. St. Paul, (1 Cor. 15: 32.) speaks of fighting with beasts, &c. by which he does not mean his having been exposed in the amphitheatre, to fight as a gladiator, as some have conjectured, but that he had to contend, at Ephesus, with the fierce uproar of Demetrius and his associates. Ignatius uses the same figure, in his epistle to the Romans: "From Syria even unto Rome, I fight with wild beasts, both by sea and land, both night and day, being bound to ten leopards;" that is, to a band of soldiers. So Lucian, in like manner, says, "For I am not to fight with ordinary wild beasts, but with men, insolent and hard to be convinced." In Revelation 4: 5: 6. mention is made of four beasts, or rather, as the word zoo signifies, Living Ones, as in Ezekiel 1: and so the word might have been more justly translated. Wild beasts are used in Scripture as emblems of tyrannical and persecuting powers. The most illustrious conquerors of antiquity, also, have not a more honorable emblem.—Watson.

BEATIFICATION, in the Roman Catholic church; an act by which the pope declares a person beatified or blessed after death. It is the first step to canonization, which see. No person can be beatified till fifty years after his death. All certificates or attestations of virtues and miracles, the necessary qualifications for sainthood, are examined by the congregation of rites. This examination often continues for several years; after which, his holiness decrees the beatification. The corpse and relics of the future saint are thenceforth exposed to the veneration of the superstitious; his image is crowned with rays, and a particular office is set apart for him; but his body and relics are not carried in procession. Indulgences, likewise, and remissions of sins, are granted on the day of his beatification; which, though not so pompous as that of canonization, is, however, very splendid. Beatification differs from canonization in this, that the pope does not act as a judge in determining the state of the beatified, but only grants a privilege to certain persons to honor him by a particular religious worship, without incurring the penalty of superstitious worshippers; but in canonization, the pope speaks as a judge, and determines, ex cathedra, upon the state of the person canonized. Beatification was introduced when it was thought proper to delay the canonization of saints, for the greater assurance of the truth of the steps taken in the procedure. Some particular orders of monks have assumed to themselves the power of beatification: thus, Octavia Melchiorica was beatified by the Dominicans.—Ency. Amer.

BEATITUDE imports the highest degree of happiness human nature can arrive to, the fruition of God in a future life to all eternity. It is also used when speaking of the theses contained in Christ's sermon on the mount, whereby he pronounces the several characters there mentioned blessed.—Henderson's Buck.

BEATTIE, (JAMES, LL. D.) the author of the celebrated "Essay on the Nature and Immutability of Truth," was born, November 5, 1735, at Lawrencelkirk, in Kincardine, in Scotland. His father was a man of strict probity, and considerable abilities; but at the early age of seven years, he was deprived by death of this faithful guide and guardian. His mother, intelligent and affectionate, soon however discovered indications of genius, and placed him under the care of the distinguished Mr. James Milne. At a very early period of life, Beattie was celebrated by his fellow-pupils, not only for the superiority of his powers, but for his indefatigable application, diligent attention, and regularity, in accomplishing the tasks assigned to him. He was also kind, affectionate, generous, and moral. His reputation considerably extended, and he was beloved and admired. He was not partial to mathematics; but it is evident, from his "Essay on Truth," that his powers of abstraction were very considerable. When he entered the highest class in the university, his attainments in moral philosophy were very considerable. About that time, a great zeal for the cultivation of that branch of knowledge began to discover itself at Aberdeen; and Reid, Campbell, Gregory, and Gerard, (at that time resident at Aberdeen,) were philosophers, with whom few men, of any age or country, can be compared. They gave the direction to the studies of Dr. Beattie, and were the causes of that eminence to which he afterwards attained. The regular course of Marischal college was, however, completed in four years; and Beattie, in the year 1753, took his degree of master of arts. Averse to display, he, however, took that degree in private, because he considered it ostentatious to take it in public; and he held ostentation to be incompatible with real merit.

In 1766, he married Miss Mary Deen, daughter of Dr. James Deen; and, about the same period, his far-famed "Essay on the Nature and Immutability of Truth" was published. Descartes and Locke had laid the foundation of that fabric of sophistry and scepticism, which was afterwards reared by Hume and Berkeley. The two latter had lately shown, that, by their theory of ideas, the most absurd and dangerous doctrines might be proved to follow; and even that body and spirit were not real existences, but merely ideas in our minds. To rebut errors so dangerous, Dr. Beattie wrote this work, and demonstrated, that whilst some truths are perceived intuitively, others require proof; that assent can only be given to the latter, by those who understand the evidence upon which they rest; that the faculty by which truth is perceived, in consequence of proof, is called reason; and that the name of common sense should be given to that faculty, by which we perceive self-evident truth. This essay greatly raised his fame; and his reputation, as an author and philosopher, rapidly extended.

In 1768, he published his beautiful and celebrated "Mineral," a poem which enrolled his name in the list of the most distinguished poets. On the 12th of December, 1770, he received the degree of doctor of laws from King's college, Aberdeen, and in 1771, he visited London. His late majesty, king George the third, was much attached to his writings and character; and, on the 30th of June, 1773, he was presented to the king, at the levee, by lord Dartmouth; and, in the month of August following, received information that his majesty appointed him a pension. In 1777, he prepared for the press his "Essay on Memory and Imagination," which is, by many persons, considered the master-piece of his prose works. In 1784, he published a "Treatise on the Evidences of Christianity." It is written with great ability; and, though nothing new could be expected upon so trite a subject, yet it has been useful, and deserves attention. In 1790, he wrote his "Elements of Moral Science," which contains an accurate enumeration and arrangement of the perceptive faculties and active powers of man; a cursory view of natural theology; and much miscellaneous information on ethics, economics, politics, and logic. The second volume was published in 1793.

By the loss of his pious, learned and excellent son, Mr. James Hay Beattie, at this period, he was greatly afflicted; and, indeed, from the shock with which that melancholy event affected him, he never perfectly recovered. In addition to that bereavement, Dr. Beattie was also deprived, by death, of his son Montague; but whilst, as a Christian, he cheerfully submitted to the determination of Providence, yet those calamities induced him, in later years, to sequester himself from society; and premature old age, with all its infirmities, made rapid advances upon him; and, on the 18th of August, 1803, he expired, at Aberdeen, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. In every situation in life, Dr. Beattie acquitted himself with credit. He performed his duties to his fellow-creatures and his God, with integrity, zeal, and delight. In his early years, he was light and frivolous; but, as he became more acquainted with the nature of his own heart, his conduct was consistent, and uniformly correct. For the cause of truth, Christianity, and science, he was a zealous and able advocate. Many of his pupils have acknowledged their obligations to him; and the present and succeeding generations will cheerfully unite in such acknowledgments. His style was chaste; his sentences uniformly simple; his poetry was very beautiful; and it is to be regretted that so small a part of his time was spent in the cultivation of the muses.—Sir W. Forbes's Life of Dr. Beattie; Jones's Chr. Biog.

BEAUFORT, (MARGARET,) countess of Richmond and Derby, daughter of the duke of Somerset, was born, in 1441, at Bletsor, in Bedfordshire, and died in 1509. She was thrice married—to the earl of Richmond, to Sir Henry Stafford, and to lord Stanley. Her son, by her first husband, was afterwards Henry VII. Christ's and St. John's colleges, Cambridge, and the divinity professorship, were founded by her. She was the third female writer England produced. Her works are, The Mirroure of Golde for a Sinful Soule; and a translation of the first book of Thomas a Kempis.—Davenport.

BEAUMONT, (MADAME LE PRINCE DE;) a justly popular French writer, born at Paris, in 1711. She lived many years in England, chiefly employed in writing upon different subjects. Those of her works which are held in the greatest estimation, are entitled Magazin des Enfants, Magazin des Adolescents; Magazin des Jennes Dames, and Nonveau Magazin Anglois. With the graces of style, they join good sense and solid reasoning. Her sentiments on education, particularly, are worthy of the general admiration they met with.

"In educating youth," says Madame Beaumont, "it is absolutely necessary in forming their young minds to virtue, never to separate religion and reason; one must be dependent on the other: for the support of which, it is of the utmost importance to study the holy Scriptures, which are alone capable of inspiring us with a just idea of the eternal Being, the recompenser of virtue, and the avenger of crimes." Her writings are in the form of dialogues between a governess and her pupils, and abound in illustrative stories.—Bethan.

BECKER, (BELTHASAR,) a learned minister at Amsterdam in the sixteenth century, who took occasion, from the Cartesian definition of spirit, of the truth and precision of which he was intimately persuaded, to deny boldly all the accounts we have in Scripture of the seduction, influence, and operations of the devil and his infernal emissaries, as well as all that has been said in favor of the existence of ghosts, spectres, and magicians. The long and elaborate work which he published in 1691, upon this interesting subject, is still extant. In this singular production, which bears the title of The World Bewitched, he modifies and perverts with the greatest ingenuity, but also with equal temerity and presumption, the accounts given by the sacred writers of the power of Satan and wicked angels, and of persons possessed by evil spirits; he affirms, moreover, that the unhappy and malignant being, who is called in Scripture Satan, or the devil, is chained down with his infernal ministers in hell; so that he can never come forth from this eternal prison to terrify mortals, or to seduce the righteous from the paths of virtue. According to the Cartesian definition, "the essence of mind is thought, and the essence of matter extension. Now since there is no sort of conformity or connection between thought and extension, mind cannot act upon matter, unless these two substances be united, as soul and body are in man: therefore no separate spirits, either good or evil, can act upon mankind. Such acting is miraculous, and miracles can be performed by God alone. It follows of consequence that the scriptural accounts of the actions and operations of good and evil spirits, must be understood in an allegorical sense." This is Becker's argument; and it does, in truth, little honor to his acuteness and sagacity. By proving too much, it proves nothing at all. This error excited great tumults and divisions, not only in all the United Provinces, but also in some parts of Germany, where several doctors of the Lutheran church were alarmed at its progress, and arose to oppose it. Its inventor and promoter, though refuted victoriously by a multitude of adversaries, and publicly deposed from his pastoral charge, died in 1718, in the full persuasion of the truth of those opinions which had drawn upon him so much opposition, and professed, with his last breath, his sincere adherence to every thing he had written on that subject; nor can it be said, that this his doctrine died with him, since it is abundantly known, that it has still many votaries and patrons, who either hold it in secret or profess it publicly. — Moshelm.

BECKET, (THOMAS A.) a celebrated English prelate, the son of a merchant, was born at London, 1119, studied at Oxford, Paris, and Bologna, and, on his return home, entered the church. Henry II. made him high-chancellor and preceptor to prince Henry, in 1158, admitted him to the closest intimacy and confidence, and, in 1162, raised him to the archbishopric of Canterbury. Because of his great pertinacity in maintaining the exorbitant privileges of the clergy, in opposition to the king, he was murdered in Canterbury cathedral, December 22, 1170. — Davenport.

BED. Mattresses, or thick cotton quilts folded, were used for sleeping upon. These were laid upon the duan, or divan, a part of the room elevated above the level of the rest, covered with a carpet in winter, and a fine mat in summer. (See ACCUBATION, and BANQUETS.) A divan cushion serves for a pillow and bolster. They do not keep their beds made; the mattresses are rolled up, carried away, and placed in a cupboard till they are wanted at night. And hence the propriety of our Lord's address to the paralytic, "Arise, take up thy bed," or mattress, "and walk." Matt. 9: 6. The duan on which these mattresses are placed, is at the end of the chamber, and has an ascent of several steps. Hence Hezekiah is said to turn his face to the wall when he prayed, that is, from his attendants. In the day, the duan was used as a seat, and the place of honor was the corner. Amos 3: 12. — Watson.

BEDAN. We read in 1 Sam. 12: 11, that the Lord sent several deliverers of Israel; Jerubbaal, Bedan, Jephthah, Samuel. Jerubbaal we know to be Gideon; but we nowhere find Bedan among the judges of Israel. The LXX, instead of Bedan, read Barak; others think Bedan to be Jair, of Manasseh, who judged Israel twenty-three years. Judg. 10: 3. There was a Bedan, great-grandson to Machir, and Jair was descended from a daughter of Machir. The Chaldee, the rabbins, and after them the generality of commentators, conclude that Bedan was Samson, of Dan; but the opinion which supposes Bedan and Jair to be the same person, seems the most probable. The names of Samson and Barak were added in many Latin copies, before the corrections of them, by the Roman censors, were published. The edition of Sixtus V. reads, "Jerubbaal, et Baldan, et Samson, et Barak, et Jephthe." — Calmet.

BEDE, (generally styled "the venerable Bede,") an eminent writer and an English monk, was born at Weremouth and Jarrow, in the bishopric of Durham, in the year 673. At the early age of six years, he was sent to the monastery of St. Peter, under the superintendance of abbot Benedict, by whom, and his successor Ceolfrid, he was educated for twelve years. When he had arrived at the age of nineteen, he was ordained deacon by bishop Beverley. In a short time, by his diligence and application, he became a proficient in general knowledge, and in classical literature. He was so strongly attached to a monastic life, that when pope Sergius wrote to abbot Ceolfrid, in a very urgent manner, to send him to Rome to give his opinion on some important points, Bede would not accept it. Several years were spent by him in making collections for his celebrated work on ecclesiastical history, the materials for which he collected from the lives of eminent persons, annals in convents, and such chronicles as were written before his time. That work was published in the year 731, when he was fifty-nine years of age. It gained him such universal applause, that the most profound prelates conversed with him, and solicited his advice on the most important subjects; particularly Egbert, bishop of York, a man of very extensive learning; and to whom he wrote a long, learned, and judicious letter, which furnished the world with such an account of the state of the church at that time, as cannot be met with in any other history. He had then every symptom of consumption, which at last proved to be the case. This affliction he supported with incredible firmness of mind; and though this lingering complaint was united with asthma, he was never heard to complain, but was always calm and resigned. Though his body was thus afflicted, his mind was buoyant and active; and he continued, with great assiduity, to translate the Gospel of St. John into the Saxon language, and also some passages which he was then extracting from the works of Isidore. He also took his usual interest in the education and improvement of some monks whom he was instructing. His piety and virtue, united to his lengthened days, entitled him to the appellation of venerable. England scarcely ever produced a greater scholar or divine. Bayle says that "there is scarcely any thing in all antiquity worthy to be read, which is not to be found in Bede, though he travelled not out of his own country;" and that, "if he had lived in the times of St. Augustine, St. Jerome, or Chrysostom, he would undoubtedly have equalled them, since, even in the midst of a superstitious age, he wrote so many excellent treatises." Bede died at the age of sixty-three, A. D. 735. His remains were interred, first in the church of his own monastery, but afterwards removed to Durham, and placed in the same coffin with those of St. Cuthbert. There were several epitaphs composed in honor of him, but none considered suitable to his virtues and talents. As an author, he excelled in the purity and elegance of his style; and, as a man, he was eminent for those virtues and graces which adorn human nature. — Jones's Chr. Biog.

BEE. Shakspeare, our great poet, has admirably described the laws and order of a community of these industrious, useful, and well known insects. To attempt even an outline of the natural history of the bee would occupy more space than can be devoted to this entire article; we must, therefore, refer the reader who is desirous of the information, to other works, and proceed to notice those passages of Scripture in which it is spoken of, and which require elucidation.

In Judges 14: 6, we are informed that Samson, on inspecting the carcass of a lion which he had some time previously killed, found that a swarm of bees had taken up their residence in it. We notice the circumstance, because it has been supposed to contradict the statement of Aristotle and other eminent naturalists, who affirm that bees will not alight upon a dead carcase, nor taste the flesh; that they will never sit down in an unclean place, nor upon any thing which emits an unpleasant smell. The variance between this statement and that of the sacred writer, is, however, only apparent. The frequently occurring phrase introduced into this text, "after a time," shows that the circumstance referred to was long posterior to the death of the animal, whose body, from an exposure to beasts and birds of prey, and the violent heat of the sun, was reduced to a mere skeleton, and divested of all effluvia. That bees have swarmed in dry bones, we have the testimony of Herodotus, of Seranus, and of Aldrovandus. Indeed, as bones in their nature, when dry, are exceedingly dry, there is no more to be said against such a place of residence, than against the same among rocks and stones.

Some writers have contended that bees are destitute of the sense of hearing; but their opinion is entirely without foundation. This will appear, if any proof were necessary, from the following prediction: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the rivers of Egypt; and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria." Isa. 7: 18. The allusion which this text involves, is to the practice of calling out the bees from their hives by a hissing or whistling sound, to their labor in the fields, and summoning them again to return when the heavens begin to lower, or the shadows of evening to fall. In this manner, Jehovah threatens to arouse the enemies of Judah, and lead them to the prey. However widely scattered, or far remote from the scene of action, they should hear his voice, and with as much promptitude as the bee, that has been taught to recognise the signal of its owner, and obey his call, they should assemble their forces; and although weak and insignificant as a swarm of bees in the estimation of a proud and infatuated people, they should come with irresistible might, and take possession of the rich and beautiful region that had been abandoned by its terrified inhabitants.

The allusion of Moses to the attack of the Amorites, which involves a reference to the irritable and revengeful disposition of the bee, is both just and beautiful: "And the Amorites which dwell in that mountain came out against you, and chased you as bees do, and destroyed you in Seir, even unto Hormah." Deut. 1: 44. Every person who has seen a swarm of disturbed bees, will easily conceive the fierce hostility and implacable fury of the enemies of Israel, which this expression is intended to denote. The same remarks will apply to Psalm 18: 12, in which there is a similar allusion.

The surprising industry of the bee has, from the earliest times, furnished man with a delicious and useful article, in the honey which it produces.

This was very common in Palestine. In Exod. 3: 8, &c., the circumstance of its flowing with milk and honey is selected as a striking proof of its being the glory of all lands; and in Deut. 32: 13, and Ps. 81: 16, the inhabitants are said to have sucked honey out of the rocks. With this agree 2 Sam. 14: 25; Matt. 3: 4, &c., and the testimony of intelligent travellers. Hasselquist says, that between Aera and Nazareth, great numbers of wild bees breed, to the advantage of the inhabitants; and Maundrel observes, that when in the great plain near Jericho, he perceived in many places a smell of honey and wax, as strong as if he had been in an apiary.

It is reasonably supposed, however, that the honey mentioned in some of these passages was not the produce of bees, but a sweet syrup produced by the date-tree, which was common in Palestine, and which is known to have furnished an article of this description. There is also in some parts of the East, a kind of honey which collects upon the leaves of the trees, something like dew, and which is gathered by the inhabitants in considerable quantities. It is very sweet when fresh, but turns sour after being kept two days. The Arabs eat it with butter; they also put it into their gruel, and use it in rubbing their water-skins, for the purpose of excluding the air. It is collected in the months of May and June; and some persons assured our traveller that the same substance was likewise produced by the thorny tree Tereshresh, at the same time of the year.

Honey was prohibited as an offering on the altar, under the Levitical dispensation, (Lev. 2: 11.) but its first-fruits were to be presented for the support of the priests. ver. 12. Some writers have supposed that these first-fruits were of the honey of the date, but such an interpretation is forced and unnatural: the articles intended in verse 12, are obviously the same as those which are specified in the preceding verse.

Honey newly taken out of the comb has a peculiar delicacy of flavor, which will in vain be sought for, after it has been for any length of time expressed or clarified. This will help to explain the energy of expression adopted by the Psalmist, when speaking of the divine laws: "More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey, and the droppings of honey-combs." Ps. 19: 10.

A fine lesson on the necessity of moderation is taught by Solomon: (Prov. 25: 16.) "Hast thou found honey? eat so much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it." Upon this passage, Harris has cited the following observations of Dr. Knox: "Man, indeed, may be called a bee in a figurative style. In search of sweets, he roams in various regions, and ransacks every inviting flower. Whatever displays a beautiful appearance solicits his notice, and conciliates his favor, if not his affection. He is often deceived by the vivid color and attractive form, which, instead of supplying honey, produce the rankest poison; but he perseveres in his researches, and if he is often disappointed, he is also often successful. The misfortune is, that when he has found honey, he enters upon the feast with an appetite so voracious, that he usually destroys his own delight by excess and satiety."—Abbott's Scrip. Nat. Hist.

BEER, a well, a town about twelve miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Shechem, or Napolose. It is probable, that Jotham, son of Gideon, retired to this place, to avoid falling into the hands of his brother Abimelech. Judg. 9: 21.—Calmet.

BEEROTH, a city of the Gibeonites, afterwards belonging to Benjamin. (Josh. 9: 17. 18: 25. 2 Sam. 4: 2. Ezra 2: 25.) seven miles from Jerusalem, toward Nicopolis.—Calmet.

BEETLE, is mentioned only in Lev. 11: 22. It is thought by some critics to be a species of the locust, but by others, the very kind of scarabæus to which the ancient Egyptians paid divine honors.—Abbott's Scrip. Nat. Hist.

BEFORE THE LORD. To be before God, is to enjoy his favor, and the smiles of his providence. Ps. 31: 22. To come before him, is to come to his temple and ordinances, and worship him, and have familiar fellowship with him. Ps. 100: 2. 65: 4. 42: 2. To walk before him, is to behave as under his eye, depending on his strength, and aiming at his glory as our chief end. Gen. 17: 1. To sin before him, is to do it in his view, and with a bold and open contempt of him. Gen. 13: 13. To have other gods before him, is to have them in his sight, and in opposition to him. Exod. 20: 3. To set the Lord before us, is to make him the object of our trust, the pattern of our conduct; and to intend his glory, and consider him as our witness and judge in all we do.—Brown's Dict.

BEGHARDS, or BEGUARDS, i. e. hard beggars, a term variously applied in ecclesiastical history. It was applied first to certain religious of the order of St. Francis, who lived in common under monastic vows, and supported themselves by the manufacture of linen cloth. At length degenerating, they were suppressed by the pope's authority, and the name became a term of reproach—beggars. On the dawn of the Reformation, it was applied, in its spiritual sense, to certain praying people, from the earnestness of their devotions, and thence became (like Methodist) a term of reproach, applied to all serious people; particularly the Waldenses abroad, and the Wickliffites and Lollards in England.—Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. vol. iii. pp. 231—234; Hawe's Church Hist. vol. ii. p. 275.

BEGUNES, is said to be the feminine of Beghards; but they seem to have had a prior establishment in the eleventh century. They derive their origin from St. Begge, duchess of Brabant, and daughter of Pepin, mayor of the palace of the king of Austria, in the seventh century. A variety of convents were formed under this name, both in Germany and Flanders, the ladies of whom lived a single life, and divided their time between works of industry and devotion, but without entering into vows of celibacy. After the commencement of the Reformation, the term was applied more generally to pious females, in its best sense—those who wrestled hard in prayer.—Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. vol. iii. p. 233, Note u, by Dr. Moilaine; Williams.

BEHEMOTH. The animal denoted by this appellation in the book of Job, has been variously determined by learned men; some of whom, especially the early Christian writers and the Jewish rabbins, have indulged in sufficiently extravagant notions. To detail these would be useless, and we shall therefore pass them over in silence.

The late editor of Calmet, whose extensive learning and indefatigable industry will always entitle him to respectful attention, notwithstanding his love of fanciful conjecture, has well remarked, that "the author of the book of Job has evidently taken great pains in delineating highly finished and poetical pictures of two remarkable animals, behemoth and leviathan: these he reserves to close his descriptions of animated nature, and with these he terminates the climax of that discourse, which he puts into the mouth of the Almighty. He even interrupts that discourse, and separates, as it were, by that interruption, these surprising creatures from those which he had described before; and he descants on them in a manner which demonstrates the poetic animation with which he wrote. The leviathan is described at a still greater length than the behemoth; and the two evidently appear to be presented as companions; to be reserved as fellows and associates." Mr. Taylor then proceeds to inquire what were the creatures most likely to be companions and associated in early ages, and in countries bordering on Egypt, where the scene of this poem is placed; and from the "Antiquities of Herulanum," the "Pænestine Pavement," and the famous "Statue of the Nile," he shows these to have been the crocodile—now generally admitted to be the leviathan, and the hippopotamus, or river-horse. "After these authorities," he remarks. "I think we may without hesitation, conclude, that this association was not rare or uncommon, but that it really was the customary manner of thinking, and, consequently, of speaking, in ancient times, and in the countries where these creatures were native; we may add, that being well known in Egypt, and being, in some degree, popular objects of Egyptian pride, distinguishing natives of that country, for their magnitude and character, they could not escape the notice of any curious naturalist, or writer on natural history; so that to suppose they were omitted in this part of the book of Job, would be to suppose a blemish in the book, implying a deficiency in the author: and if they are inserted, no other description can be that of the hippopotamus."

Aristotle represents the hippopotamus to be of the size of an ass; Herodotus affirms that in stature he is equal to the largest ox; Diodorus makes his height not less than five cubits, or above seven feet and a half; and Tattius calls him, on account of his prodigious strength, the Egyptian elephant. Captain Beaver thus describes one which he met with in Western Africa: "The animal was not swimming, but standing in the channel, in, I suppose, about five feet water: the body immersed, and the head just above it. It looked steadfastly at the boat till we were within about twenty yards of it, when I lodged a ball half way between its eyes and nostrils: it immediately tumbled down, but instantly rose again, snorted, and walked into shallower water, where I had an opportunity of seeing its whole body, and then discovered that it was an hippopotamus. It afterwards advanced a little towards the boat, then towards the shore, and turned entirely round once or twice, as if at a loss what to do, plunging violently the whole time. At last, it walked into deeper water, and then dived: we watched its rising, and then pursued it; and this we did for near three hours, when, at length it landed on a narrow neck of sand, and walked over it into fifteen or sixteen fathoms of water. We then gave up the pursuit, having never been able to get a second shot at it. The longest time it was under water during the pursuit, was twenty minutes, but immediately after being wounded it rose every three or four minutes. Its body appeared to be somewhat larger than that of the largest buffalo, with shorter but much thicker legs; a head much resembling a horse's, but longer; large, projecting eyes; open and wide distended nostrils; short, erect ears, like a cropt horse when it pricks them up, or those of a well-cropped terrier. I perceived nothing like a mane, and the skin appeared to be without hair; but of this I am not certain, for being totally ignorant whether the animal was ferocious or not, immediately after I fired we rowed from it, expecting it would attack us."

In Job 40: 17, 18, the sacred writer conveys a striking idea of the bulk, vigor, and strength of the behemoth.

He moveth his tail like a cedar:
The sinews of his thighs are interwoven together.
His ribs are as strong pieces of copper;
His backbone like bars of iron.

The idea of his prodigious might is increased by the account given of his bones, which are compared to strong pieces of brass, and bars of iron. Such figures are commonly employed by the sacred writers, to express great hardness and strength, of which a striking example occurs in the prophecy of Micah: "Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion; for I will make thy horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass: and thou shalt beat in pieces many people," (Micah 4: 13.) so hard and strong are the bones of the behemoth.

He is chief of the works of God.
He that made him has fixed his weapon.

Here he is described as one of the noblest animals which the Almighty Creator has produced. The male hippopotamus which Zernighi brought from the Nile to Italy, was sixteen feet nine inches long, from the extremity of the muzzle to the origin of the tail; fifteen feet in circumference; and six feet and a half high; and the legs were about two feet ten inches long. The head was three feet and a half in length, and eight feet and a half in circumference. The opening of the mouth was two feet four inches, and the largest teeth were more than a foot long.

Thus, his prodigious strength; his impenetrable skin; and vast opening of his mouth, and his portentous voracity;

the whiteness and hardness of his teeth; his manner of life, spent with equal ease in the sea, on the land, or at the bottom of the Nile,—equally claim our admiration, and entitle him, says Faxton, to be considered as the chief of the ways of God. Nor is he less remarkable for his sagacity; of which two instances are recorded by Pliny and Solinus. After he has gorged himself with corn, and begins to return with a distended belly to the deep, with averted steps he traces a great many paths, lest his pursuers, following the lines of one plain track, should overtake and destroy him while he is unable to resist. The second instance is not less remarkable: when he has become fat with too much indulgence, he reduces his obesity by copious bleedings. For this purpose he searches for newly-cut reeds, or sharp-pointed rocks, and rubs himself against them till he makes a sufficient aperture for the blood to flow. To promote the discharge, it is said, he agitates his body; and when he thinks he has lost a sufficient quantity, he closes the wound by rolling himself in the mud.

In compliance with the prevailing opinion, which refers this description to the hippopotamus, we have thought it right to exhibit some of the points of resemblance which have been discovered between that creature and the behemoth of the book of Job. Drs. Good and Clarke, however, think that the sacred writer refers to an animal of an extinct genus. Dr. Clarke believes it to have been the mastodontum or mammoth, some part of a skeleton of which he has carefully examined, and thus described in his commentary on Gen. 1: 24. "The mammoth for size will answer the description in verse 19: "He is the chief of the ways of God." That which of this part of a skeleton belonged, which I examined, must have been, by computation, not less than twenty-five feet high, and sixty feet in length! The bones of one toe I measured, and found them three feet in length! One of the very smallest grinders of an animal of this extinct species, full of processes on the surface, more than an inch in depth, which showed that the animal had lived on flesh, I have just now weighed, and found it, in its very dry state, four pounds eight ounces, avoirdupois: the same grinder of an elephant I have weighed also, and found it just two pounds. The mammoth, therefore, from this proportion, must have been as large as two elephants and a quarter. We may judge by this of its size; elephants are frequently ten and eleven feet high: this will make the mammoth at least twenty-five or twenty-six feet high; and as it appears to have been a many-toed animal, the springs which such a creature could make, must have been almost incredible; nothing by swiftness could have escaped its pursuit. God seems to have made it as the proof of his power; and had it been prolific, and not become extinct, it would have depopulated the earth. Creatures of this kind must have been living in the days of Job: the behemoth is referred to here, as if perfectly commonly known."—Abbot; Jones.

BEHMEN, or BOEHME, (JACOB,) a celebrated mystic writer, born in the year 1575, at Old Seidenburgh, near Gorlitz, in Upper Lusatia; he was a shoemaker by trade. He is described as having been thoughtful and religious from his youth, taking peculiar pleasure in frequenting public worship. At length, seriously considering within himself that speech of our Savior, My Father which is in heaven will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him, he was thereby thoroughly awakened in himself, and set forward to desire that promised Comforter; and, continuing in that earnestness, he was at last, to use his own expression, "surrounded with a divine light for seven days, and stood in the highest contemplation and kingdom of joys!" After this, about the year 1600, he was again surrounded by the divine light, and replenished with the heavenly knowledge; inasmuch that, going abroad into the fields, and viewing the herbs and grass, by his inward light he saw into their essences, use and properties, which were discovered to him by their lineaments, figures, and signatures. In the year 1610, he had a third special illumination, wherein still further mysteries were revealed to him. It was not till the year 1612, that Behmen committed these revelations to writing. His first treatise is entitled Aurora, which was seized on and withheld from him by the senate of Gorlitz, (who persecuted him at the instigation of the primate of that place,) before it was finished, and he never afterwards proceeded with it, further than by adding some explanatory notes. The next production of his pen is called The Three Principles. In this work he more fully illustrates the subjects treated of in the former, and supplies what is wanting in that work. The contents of these two treatises may be divided as follows: 1. How all things came from a working will of the holy triune incomprehensible God, manifesting himself as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, through an outward perceptible working triune power of fire, light, and spirit, in the kingdom of heaven. 2. How and what angels and men were in their creation; that they are in and from God, his real offspring; that their life began in and from this divine fire, which is the Father of light, generating a birth of light in their souls; from both which proceeds the Holy Spirit, or breath of divine love in the triune creature, as it does in the triune Creator. 3. How some angels, and all men, are fallen from God, and their first state of a divine triune life in him; what they are in their fallen state, and the difference between the fall of angels and that of man. 4. How the earth, stars, and elements were created in consequence of the fallen angels. 5. Whence there is good and evil in all this temporal world, in all its creatures, animate and inanimate; and what is meant by the curse that dwells every where in it. 6. Of the kingdom of Christ; how it is set in opposition to, and fights and strives against, the kingdom of hell. 7. How man, through faith in Christ, is able to overcome the kingdom of hell, and triumph over it in the divine power, and thereby obtain eternal salvation; also how, through working in the hellish quantity or principle, he casts himself into perdition. 8. How and why sin and misery, wrath and death, shall only reign for a time, till the love, the wisdom, and the power of God, shall, in a supernatural way, (the mystery of God made man,) triumph over sin, misery, and death; and make fallen man rise to the glory of angels, and this material system shake off its curse, and enter into an everlasting union with that heaven from whence it fell.

The year after he wrote his Three Principles,—by which are to be understood the dark world, or hell, in which the devils live; the light world, or heaven, in which the angels live; the external and visible world, which has proceeded from the internal and spiritual worlds, in which man, as to his bodily life, lives,—Behmen produced his Threefold Life of Man, according to the Three Principles. In this work he treats more largely of the state of man in this world: 1. That he has that immortal spark of life which is common to angels and devils. 2. That divine life of the light and spirit of God, which makes the essential difference between an angel and a devil, the last having extinguished this divine life in himself; but that man can only attain unto this heavenly life of the second principle through the new birth in Christ Jesus. 3. The life of the third principle, or of this external and visible world. Thus the life of the first and third principles is common to all men; but the life of the second principle only to a true Christian or child of God.

Behmen wrote several other treatises, besides the three already enumerated; but these three being, as it were, the basis of all his other writings, it was thought proper to notice them particularly. His conceptions are often clothed under allegorical symbols; and in his latter works he has frequently adopted chemical and Latin phrases to express his ideas, which phrases he borrowed from conversation with learned men, the education he had received being too illiterate to furnish him with them: but as to the matter contained in his writings, he disclaimed having borrowed it either from men or books. He died in the year 1624. His last words were, "Now I go hence into Paradise."

Some of Behmen's principles were adopted by the late ingenious and pious William Law, who has clothed them in a more modern dress and in a less obscure style. See Behmen's Works; Oakley's Memoirs of Behmen.—Henderson's Buck.

BEHOLD; a call for particular attention. It imports sudden excitement, wonder, joy, certainty, momentousness. Isa. 7: 14. John 1: 29. Matt. 21: 5. Rev. 10: 15. Luke 24: 39. To behold, is, 1. To look on; see Gen. 31:

51. 2. To consider, know, care for. Lam. 1: 12. John 19: 5, 26, 27. God beheld not iniquity in Jacob, nor perverseness in Israel; though his omniscient eye discerns sin in his people on earth, he observes it not as an enemy, wrathfully to punish them for it. But the word may be rendered, He hath not beheld injury against Jacob, nor vexation against Israel; that is, he will not suffer them to be hurt. Numb. 23: 21. To behold Christ, is with wonder and attention to know, believe in, and receive him. Isa. 65: 1.—Brown.

BEHOOVE, to be necessary, just, and becoming. As it became God, for the honor of his nature, counsels, word, and work, to expose Christ to suffering; so it behooved Christ to suffer, and be in all things like unto his brethren of mankind, that he might display his Father's perfections, fulfil his purposes, promises, and types, destroy the works of the devil, and sympathize with, and serve us. BEL AND THE DRAGON, (HISTORY OF), an apocryphal and uncanonical book of Scripture. It was always rejected by the Jewish church, and is extant neither in the Hebrew nor the Chaldee language; nor is there any proof that it ever was so. Jerome gives it no better title than "the fable of Bel and the Dragon."

Selden thinks this little history ought rather to be considered as a sacred poem, or fiction, than a true account. As to the Dragon, he observes, that serpents (dracones) made a part of the hidden mysteries of the pagan religion; as appears from Clemens Alexandrinus, Julius Firmicus, Justin Martyr, and others. And Aristotle relates, that in Mesopotamia, there were serpents which would not hurt the natives of the country, and infested only strangers. Whence it is not improbable, that both the Mesopotamians themselves, and the neighboring people, might worship a serpent, the former to avert the evil arising from those reptiles, the latter out of a principle of gratitude. But of this there is no clear proof; nor is it certain that the Babylonians worshipped a dragon or serpent.—Hand. Buck.

BELCHER. (JONATHAN,) governor of Massachusetts and New Jersey, was the son of Andrew Belcher of Cambridge, one of the council of the province, and a gentleman of large estate, who died in 1717, and grandson of Andrew Belcher, who lived in Cambridge in 1646, and who received in 1652 a license for an inn, granting him liberty "to sell beer and bread for entertainment of strangers and the good of the town." He was born in January, 1681. As the hopes of the family rested on him, his father carefully superintended his education. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1699. While a member of this institution, his open and pleasant conversation, joined with his manly and generous conduct, conciliated the esteem of all his acquaintance. Not long after the termination of his collegial course, he visited Europe. The acquaintance which he formed with the princess Sophia and her son, afterwards king George II. laid the foundation of his future honors.

After the death of governor Burnet, he was appointed by his majesty to the government of Massachusetts and New Hampshire in 1730. In this station he continued eleven years. The leading men of New Hampshire, who wished for a distinct government, were hostile to him; and his resistance to a proposed new emission of paper bills also created him enemies. On being superseded, he repaired to court, where he vindicated his character and conduct, and exposed the base designs of his enemies. He was restored to the royal favor, and was promised the first vacant government in America. This vacancy occurred in the province of New Jersey, where he arrived in 1747, and where he spent the remaining years of his life. In this province, his memory has been held in deserved respect.

When he first arrived in this province, he found it in the utmost confusion by tumults and riotous disorders, which had for some time prevailed. This circumstance, joined to the unhappy controversy between the two branches of the legislature, rendered the first part of his administration peculiarly difficult; but by his firm and prudent measures he surmounted the difficulties of his situation. He steadily pursued the interest of the province, endeavoring to distinguish and promote men of worth without partiality.

He enlarged the charter of Princeton college, and was its chief patron and benefactor. Even under the growing infirmities of age, he applied himself with his accustomed assiduity and diligence to the high duties of his office. He died at Elizabethtown, August 31, 1757, aged seventy-six years.

Governor Belcher possessed uncommon gracefulness of person and dignity of deportment. He obeyed the royal instructions on the one hand, and exhibited a real regard to the liberties and happiness of the people on the other. He was distinguished by his unshaken integrity, by his zeal for justice, and care to have it equally distributed. Neither the claims of interest nor the solicitations of friends could move him from what appeared to be his duty. He seems to have possessed, in addition to his other accomplishments, that piety, whose lustre is eternal. His religion was not a mere formal thing, which he received from tradition, or professed in conformity to the custom of the country in which he lived; but it impressed his heart, and governed his life. He had such views of the majesty and holiness of God, of the strictness and purity of the divine law, and of his own unworthiness and iniquity, as made him disclaim all dependence on his own righteousness, and led him to place his whole hope for salvation on the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ, who appeared to him an all-sufficient and glorious Savior. He expressed the humblest sense of his own character, and the most exalted views of the rich, free, and glorious grace offered in the gospel to sinners. His faith worked by love, and produced the genuine fruits of obedience. It exhibited itself in a life of piety and devotion, of meekness and humility, of justice, truth, and benevolence. He searched the holy Scriptures with the greatest diligence and delight. In his family he maintained the worship of God, himself reading the volume of truth, and addressing in prayer the Majesty of heaven and of earth, as long as his health and strength would possibly admit. In the hours of retirement, he held intercourse with Heaven, carefully redeeming time from the business of this world, to attend to the more important concerns of another. Though there was nothing ostentatious in his religion, yet he was not ashamed to avow his attachment to the Gospel of Christ, even when he exposed himself to ridicule and censure. When Mr. Whitefield was at Boston in the year 1740, he treated that eloquent itinerant with the greatest respect. He even followed him as far as Worcester, and requested him to continue his faithful instructions and pungent addresses to the conscience, desiring him to spare neither ministers nor rulers. He was indeed deeply interested in the progress of holiness and religion. As he approached the termination of his life, he often expressed his desire to depart, and to enter the world of glory.—*Burr's Fam. BELIAL. The phrase, "sons of Belial," signifies wicked, worthless men. It was given to the inhabitants of Gibeah, who abused the Levite's wife, (Judg. 19: 22.) and to Hophni and Phineas, the wicked and profane sons of Eli. 1 Sam. 2: 12. In later times, the name Belial denoted the devil: "What concord hath Christ with Belial?" (2 Cor. 6: 15.) for as the word literally imports "one who will do no one good," the positive sense of a doer of evil was applied to Satan, who is the author of evil, and, eminently, "the evil one."—Watson.

BELIE; to give one the lie. To belie the Lord, is falsely to ascribe our prosperity or distress to some other principal cause rather than God. Jer. 5: 12. Prov. 30: 9.

BELIEF, in its general and natural sense, denotes a persuasion or an assent of the mind to the truth of any proposition. In this sense, belief has no relation to any particular kind of means or arguments, but may be produced by any means whatever: thus we are said to believe our senses, to believe our reason, to believe a witness. Belief, in its more restrained sense, denotes that kind of assent which is grounded only on the authority or testimony of some person. In this sense, belief stands opposed to knowledge and science. We do not say that we believe snow is white, but we know it to be so. But when a thing is propounded to us, of which we ourselves have no knowledge, but which appears to us to be true, from the testimony given to it by another, this is what we call belief. (See FAITH.)—Henderson's Buck.

BELIEVERS; an appellation given, toward the close of the first century, to those Christians who had been admitted into the church by baptism, and instructed in all the mysteries of religion. They were thus called in contradistinction to the catechumens who had not been baptized, and were debarred from those privileges. Among us, it is often used synonymously with Christian. (See CHRISTIAN.)—Henderson's Buck.

BELKNAP, (JEREMY, D. D.,) minister in Boston, and eminent as a writer, was born June 4, 1744, and was a descendant of Joseph Belknap, who lived in Boston in 1658. He received the rudiments of learning in the grammar school of the celebrated Mr. Lovel, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1762. He exhibited, at this early period, such marks of genius and taste, and such talents in writing and conversation, as to excite the most pleasing hopes of his future usefulness and distinction. Having upon his mind deep impressions of the truths of religion, he now applied himself to the study of theology, and he was ordained pastor of the church in Dover, New Hampshire, February 18, 1767. Here he passed near twenty years of his life with the esteem and affection of his flock, and respected by the first characters of the state. He was persuaded by them to compile his history of New Hampshire, which gained him a high reputation. In 1786, he was dismissed from his people. The presbyterian church in Boston, becoming vacant by the removal of Mr. Annan, and having changed its establishment from the presbyterian to the congregational form, soon invited him to become its pastor. He was accordingly installed, April 4, 1787. Here he passed the remainder of his days, discharging the duties of his pastoral office, exploring various fields of literature, and giving his efficient support to every useful and benevolent institution. After being subject to frequent returns of ill health, he was suddenly seized by a paralytic affection, and died June 20, 1798, aged fifty-four years.

Dr. Belknap in his preaching did not possess the graces of elocution; nor did he aim at splendid diction, but presented his thoughts in plain and perspicuous language, that all might understand him. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, the design of which he was induced to form in consequence of a suggestion of Thomas Wallcut of Boston, a diligent collector of old and valuable books, as well as on account of his frequent disappointment from the loss of valuable papers, in prosecuting his historical researches.

Dr. Belknap gained a high reputation as a writer; but he is more remarkable for the patience and accuracy of his historical researches, than for elegance of style. His deficiency in natural science, as manifested in his history of New Hampshire, is rendered more prominent by the rapid progress of natural history since his death. His Foresters is not only a description of American manners, but a work of humor and wit, which went into a second edition. Before the revolution, he wrote much in favor of freedom and his country, and he afterwards gave to the public many fruits of his labors and researches. His last and most interesting work, his American Biography, he did not live to complete.

The following extract from some lines, found among his papers, expresses his choice with regard to the manner of his death, and the event corresponded with his wishes.

When faith and patience, hope and love
Have made us meet for heaven above,
How blest the privilege to rise,
Snatched in a moment to the skies;
Unconscious to resign our breath,
Nor taste the bitterness of death!

BELLAMY, (JOSEPH, D. D.) an eminent American minister, was born at New Cheshire, Connecticut, in 1719, and was graduated at Yale college in 1735. It was not long after his removal from New Haven, that he became the subject of those serious impressions, which, it is believed, issued in renovation of heart. From this period he consecrated his talents to the evangelical ministry. At the age of eighteen, he began to preach with acceptance and success. An uncommon blessing attended his ministry at Bethlem, in the town of Woodbury; a large proportion of the society appeared to be awakened to a sense of religion, and they were unwilling to part with the man, by whose ministry they had been conducted to a knowledge of the truth. He was ordained to the pastoral office over this church in 1740. In this retirement, he devoted himself with uncommon ardor to his studies and the duties of his office till the memorable revival, which was most conspicuous in 1742. His spirit of piety was then blown into a flame; he could not be contented to confine his labors to his small society. Taking care that his own pulpit should be vacant as little as possible, he devoted a considerable part of his time for several years to itinerating in different parts of Connecticut and the neighboring colonies, preaching the gospel daily to multitudes, who flocked to hear him. He was instrumental in the conversion of many. When the awakening declined, he returned to a more constant attention to his own charge. He now began the task of writing an excellent treatise, entitled, True Religion delineated, which was published in 1750. His abilities, his ardent piety, his theological knowledge, his acquaintance with persons under all kinds of religious impressions qualified him peculiarly for a work of this kind.

From this time he became more conspicuous, and young men, who were preparing for the gospel ministry, applied to him as a teacher. In this branch of his work he was eminently useful till the decline of life, when he relinquished it. His method of instruction was the following: After ascertaining the abilities and genius of those who applied to him, he gave them a number of questions on the leading and most essential subjects of religion in the form of a system. He then directed them to such books as treat these subjects with the greatest perspicuity and force of argument, and usually spent his evenings in inquiring into their improvements and solving difficulties, till they had obtained a good degree of understanding in the general system. After this, he directed them to write on each of the questions before given them, reviewing those parts of the authors, which treated on the subject proposed. These dissertations were submitted to his examination. As they advanced in ability to make proper distinctions, he led them to read the most learned and acute opposers of the truth, the deistical, Arian, and Socinian writers, and laid open the fallacy of their most specious reasonings. When the system was completed, he directed them to write on several of the most important points systematically, in the form of sermons. He next led them to peruse the best experimental and practical discourses, and to compose sermons on like subjects. He revised and corrected their compositions, inculcating the necessity of a heart truly devoted to Christ, and a life of watching and prayer, discoursing occasionally on the various duties, trials, comforts, and motives of the evangelical work, that his pupils might be, as far as possible, "scribes well instructed in the kingdom of God." In 1786, Dr. Bellamy was seized by a paralytic affection, from which he never recovered. He died, March 6, 1790, in the fiftieth year of his ministry, aged seventy-one.

His writings procured him the esteem of the pious and learned, at home and abroad, with many of whom he maintained an epistolary correspondence. In his preaching, a mind rich in thought, a great command of language, and a powerful voice, rendered his extemporary discourses peculiarly acceptable. He was one of the most able divines of this country. In his sentiments, he accorded mainly with president Edwards, with whom he was intimately acquainted.

He published a sermon, entitled, Early Piety recom- menae; True Religion delineated, 1750; sermons on the Divinity of Christ, the Millennium, and the Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin, 1758: letters and dialogues on the Nature of Love to God, Faith in Christ, and Assurance, 1759; essay on the Glory of the Gospel; a vindication of his sermon on the Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin; the Law a School-master, a sermon; and the great Evil of Sin; election sermon, 1762. His works were published in three volumes, 1811, with a sketch of his life.—Benedict's Fun. Serm.; Brainerd's Life, 22, 41, 43, 55; Trumbull, ii. 159; Theol. Mag. i. 5; Allen.

BELLARMINI, (CARDINAL;) a great Roman Catholic oracle and Jesuit, born at Monte Puleiano, in Tuscauy, in 1542. He was most assiduous in his opposition to the Protestants, and was sent into the Low Countries to arrest their progress. The talent which he displayed in his controversies, called forth the most able men on the other side; and, for a number of years, no eminent divine among the Reformers failed to make his arguments a particular subject of refutation. His principal work was, A Body of Controversy, written in Latin, the style of which is perspicuous and precise, without any pretension to purity and elegance. He displays very considerable acquaintance with the Scriptures, and is deeply versed in the doctrine and practice of the church. He was, on the points of predestination and efficacious grace, more a disciple of Augustine than a Jesuit. As his book did not assert that the popes had a direct power over temporal things, it was placed by Sixtus V. among the prohibited books; which, with the differences that were found among the Catholics themselves, gave the Protestants no small advantage. At his death, the cardinal bequeathed one half of his soul to the Virgin Mary, and the other to Jesus Christ.—Hend. Buck.

BELLATOR; an eminent Latin commentator on the Scriptures of the fifth century. He was contemporary with Gregory the Great, Cassiodorus, Primasius, and Isidore of Seville.—Mosheim.

BELLINGHAM, (RICHARD,) governor of Massachusetts, was a native of England, where he was bred a lawyer. He came to this country in 1634, and August 3, was received into the church, with his wife, Elizabeth, and in the following year, was chosen deputy governor. In 1641, he was elected governor, in opposition to Mr. Winthrop, by a majority of six votes; but the election did not seem to be agreeable to the general court. He was re-chosen to this office in 1654, and after the death of governor Endicott was again elected, in May, 1665. He continued chief magistrate of Massachusetts during the remainder of his life. He was deputy governor thirteen years, and governor ten.

Governor Bellingham lived to be the only surviving patentee named in the charter. He was severe against those who were called sectaries; but he was a man of incorruptible integrity, and of acknowledged piety. In the ecclesiastical controversy which was occasioned by the settlement of Mr. Davenport, he was an advocate of the first church.—Allen; Hutchinson, i. 41, 43, 97, 211, 269; Neal's Hist. i. 390; Mather's Mag. ii. 18; Holmes, i. 414; Savage's Winthrop, ii. 43; Hist. Coll. n. s. iii. 143; vi. 610.

BELLOWS; a well-known wind instrument, for blowing of fires, in iron works, smith's forges, &c. The bellows are burnt, the lead is consumed of the fire; the founder melteth in vain: the lungs and labor of the prophets, and the judgments of God, are, as it were, wasted to no purpose, as wickedness and wicked persons are not purged away from church or state. Jer. 6: 29.—Brown.

BELLS. During the three first centuries, it is certain that Christians did not meet in their assemblies by the notice of any public signal; nor can it be imagined, that in an age of persecution, when they met privately in the night, they would, as it were, betray themselves by such notice to their enemies. Baronius, indeed, supposes there was an order of men appointed to give private notice of assembling to every particular member of a Christian congregation; but, for want of light, we can determine nothing about it.

That bells were an early invention, is evident from their use in the days of Moses, since it was enjoined on the high-priest of the Israelites, that the lower hem of the robe in which he officiated should be ornamented with pomegranates and gold bells, set alternately, in order that he might minister therein, that his sound might be heard when he went into the holy place before the Lord, and when he came out, that he might not die. It seems to have been ordained as a mark of respect, that the high-priest might give public notice of his entering before the Lord; and, perhaps, to prevent his being put to death by those who watched the temple, that its sacred precincts might not be violated; none but the high-priest being permitted to enter into the holy place.

Viewed in this light, there appears nothing extraordinary in the use of bells, simply considered; but as sacred persons gave sanction, in the minds of people prone to wander from the simplicity of truth, to make every thing about them, and even their dress, possess some sacred function, so these ornaments came to be held up to the people as something more than mere bells and pomegranates; and hence, Josephus informs us, that while the latter signified lightning, the former denoted thunder; and long before the days of Josephus, it appears that superstitious notions were attached to bells. In illustration of this remark, accept the following extract from Burder's Oriental Customs, vol. ii. p. 291:—"Among the heathens of the East, the sun was called Baal, or Bel, from his supposed dominion over all things, whence the word came at last to denote a lord or master in general. He was considered as the author of vibratory motion, the source of musical sound; and such instruments as emit a sound by percussion, were called bells, from Bell, or Bel, the name by which the sun was denoted among the druids. For the same reason, a bell seems in very early times to have been made a sign or symbol of victory or dominion. Thus, as horses were employed in war, and are celebrated in the earliest antiquity, for their strength, stately port, and undaunted courage, bells became a part of their martial furniture." To this custom the prophet Zechariah alludes, when in announcing the change to be wrought by the universal prevalence of true religion, he says, In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD. Zech. 14: 20.

Possibly, bells were also used as music, with superstitious notions. They are mentioned 1 Chron. 15: 19; and perhaps the sounding brass, coupled with the tinkling cymbal, was a sort of bell. Among the heathen, the use of bells in their religious ceremonies was common in ancient times. The sounding brass, in some shape or other, was struck in the sacred rites of the Dea Syria, and in those of Hecate. It was thought to be good for all kinds of expiation and purification. It had, moreover, some secret influence over the spirits of the departed. The priests of Proserpine at Athens, called Hierophants, rang a bell to call the people together to sacrifice; and one indispensable ceremony in the Indian pooja, is the ringing of a small bell by the officiating brahmin. The women of the idol, or dancing girls of the pagoda, have little golden bells fastened to their feet, the soft harmonious tinkling of which vibrates in unison with the exquisite melody of their voices. Hence it appears probable, that the Jews derived much of their foolish notions respecting bells, as well as other things of more serious moment, from the heathen nations.

The rage for amalgamating the superstitions of the pagan world with the outside of Christianity, through the falsely-called liberality of persons pretending to be the abettors of truth, but who are in reality the worst enemies that Christianity ever had to contend with, together with the desire of the heathen themselves to uphold their old customs—those who, like too many of the present day, exerted all their influence in endeavoring to unite principles that must ever remain separated—this rage for mingling truth with error in the early ages of the church, when heathen usages could be made in any degree to correspond, or when coincidence between pagan gods and goddesses, and Christian saints, could, however remotely, be brought to bear, was the means of introducing a great variety of dogmas, in every respect contrary to the simplicity which becometh the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; and among these, the adoption of bells was not omitted. Hence appears to have arisen the use of them in churches, now so universal; and had their use, without abuse, served the purpose to which they were, perhaps, originally applied, it would have been well: but long before the Reformation in England, the clergy had found means to delude the minds of themselves and their people with the most superstitious opinions respecting them; and, as if they felt anxious that their follies should be carried to future ages, they thought proper to inscribe the bells they erected with those opinions. Of these a few specimens will illustrate the subject. One set of bells in a parish church in Cambridgeshire was thus inscribed:—

Lando Deum verum.	I praise the true God.
Eflebim voco.	I call the people.
Congrego eorum.	I assemble the clergy.
Defunctos ploro.	I lament the dead.
Pestem fungo.	I drive away infection.
Festa decoro.	I grace the festival.

Another—

Funera plango.	I bemoan the dead.
Pulgura frango.	I abate the lightning.
Sabbata pango.	I announce the sabbath.
Excito lentos.	I arouse the indolent.
Disseplo ventos.	I disperse the winds.
Paco cruentos.	I appeal the revengeful.

Another—

Dulcis sicut mellis Campania vocoq Gabriella.	I am called the sweet-toned bell of the angel Gabriel.
--	---

At Lonsborough in Yorkshire—

Sce Cwthberte ora pro nobis.
St. Cuthbert pray for us.

At Aldborough in Yorkshire—

Sce Jacobe ora pro nobis.
St. James pray for us.

These specimens show the influences attributed to bells; and it is almost incredible, so much had the notion of the sanctity of bells prevailed, that the ordinance of baptism was profanely applied to their consecration, by washing them inside and out, with water set apart, in the name of the holy Trinity; the bishop adding holy oil, crosses, and exorcisms, the then usual forms of baptism; and, withal, appointing godfathers and godmothers, who, as they held the ropes, gave them their names, and engaged to answer on their behalf such questions as the bishop might ask the said bells; and besides all this, the bishop, whilst he anointed them, that is, the bells, “prayed God to give his holy Spirit to them, that they might become sanctified for the expelling of all the power, snares, and illusions of the devil—for the souls of the dead; and especially for the chasing away of storms, thunder, and tempests.”

In further proof of what is here advanced regarding the superstitious ideas attached to bells, the following two inscriptions, carefully copied from two bells, in Christ church, Hampshire, are given; the church in which they are placed is supposed to have been erected in the reign of the successor of William, commonly called the Conqueror:—

VIRTUS : CAMPANE : FACIAT : NOS :
VIVERE : SANE * SIT : NOBIS : OMEN :
TOUZEYNS : CVM : SIT : TIBI : NOMEN :

“May the virtue of the bell make us live well.—As thy name is Touzeyns, [all saints], may it be to us a token of good !”

ASSIS : FESTIVVS : PESTAS : PIVS :
VT : PVGET : AGNVS * NOX : AVGVSTINVS :
HEC : DVM : RESONAT : PRECO :
MAGNVS.

“O great Augustine! be kindly present, I pray thee, that, while this bell is ringing, the holy Lamb may speedily chase away all evil!”

These inscriptions appear direct and positive evidence of some of the mischiefs that have arisen from attempts, alas! too successful, to graft Christianity upon the old stock of paganism, by the Romish church. Nor is improvement to be expected within her pale, since the same superstition remains in the countries under her influence; and no longer ago than the year 1819, one of our countrymen travelling through Italy, observed it customary to jingle the church bells whenever there was a thunder-storm; and upon inquiring of a peasant on one occasion the meaning of such disturbance, he was answered, “that it was done to drive away the devil.” And a bell has, not long ago, been exhibited to the society of antiquaries, called the Bell of St. Caenon (St. Kinnon), of whose sanctity the people of that part of Ireland whence it was brought think so highly, as to imagine that the breach of an oath taken upon it, would be followed by instant death!

If such be the sentiments infused into the minds of the unlettered, by those who have the care of souls, over so large a part of what is called the Christian world as the church of Rome embraces within its dominion, how thankful ought we, as Protestants, to be, that, by the blessing of God, we are in some measure drawn from the atmosphere of its influence! How dreadful must be the situation of those who, in matters of comparatively small importance, teach such diabolical opinions;—those who ought to watch over the church of God for good and not for evil! Let us take them as examples to avoid their practices, which are calculated to enslave the mind in ignorance and idolatry, and to call down the vengeance of heaven on those who follow their wicked devices.—Henderson's Duck.

BELOE, (WILLIAM,) a divine and critic, was born at Norwich, in 1756, and educated at Cambridge. After having been assistant to Dr. Parr, who was then head master of Norwich school, he took orders, and obtained church preferment. He was, finally, rector of All-hallows, a prebendary of St. Paul's, and librarian of the British museum. In conjunction with Dr. Nares, he established the British Critic. He is the author of Anecdotes of Literature and Scarce Books; The Sexagenarian; and other works; and the translator of Herodotus, and Anlus Gellius. He died in 1817.—Davenport.

BELSHAM, (THOMAS,) an eminent advocate of Unitarianism, was born April 15, 1750. At the age of sixteen, he was admitted into the academy at Daventry, then under the care of Dr. Ashworth, 1766. At this time it appears he had many doubts of his personal piety. “I much fear,” he says, “that Christ is not formed in my soul.—I have had some pretty deep convictions this month; but I fear I have too often resisted the Holy Spirit. I am ready to fear that God has not elected me, and that I am irrevocably doomed to hopeless misery.” In 1767, he solemnly dedicated himself to God in the manner recommended by Dr. Doddridge in his “Rise and Progress.” From his doubts and fears, however, he seems never to have been relieved, until he adopted the system of philosophical necessity, and final restoration. In 1778, he was settled as pastor of a dissenting congregation at Worcester, from which however he removed, in 1781, to take charge of the Daventry academy. Here his sentiments underwent a change, so far that in 1789 he avowed himself a Unitarian, of the school of Priestley. He resigned his station, and immediately took charge of Hackney college, a Unitarian institution; where he continued to discharge the office of tutor until 1805, when he became minister of Essex street chapel, London, as successor to Dr. Disney and Mr. Lindsey. He seems to have enjoyed little happiness at either of his successive situations; his conscientiousness was painfully great; and his religious system excluded him from the peace and consolation derived from the atonement of Christ, and the influence of his Spirit. He published various works, which gave him great reputation among his friends, though others regard him as a servile thinker, a cold reasoner, and a bold controversialist. After Dr. Priestley, he was regarded as the leader of Unitarianism in England. His Calm Inquiry, Evidence of Chris- tianity, Review of Wilberforce, and Memoirs of Lindsey, including a history of American Unitarianism, are best known. He died in 1830.—Memoirs of Mr. Belsham; Chris. Reg.; Magee on Atonement; Works of Dr. Channing, and Robert Hall.

BELSHAZZAR; the last king of Babylon, and, according to Hales and others, the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 5: 18. During the period that the Jews were in captivity at Babylon, a variety of singular events concurred to prove that the sins which brought desolation on their country, and subjected them for a period of seventy years to the Babylonish yoke, had not dissolved that covenant relation which, as the God of Abraham, Jehovah had entered into with them; and that any act of indignity perpetrated against an afflicted people, or any insult cast upon the service of their temple, would be regarded as an affront to the majesty of Heaven, and not suffered to pass with impunity, though the perpetrators were the princes and potentates of the earth. Belshazzar was a remarkable instance of this. He had an opportunity of seeing, in the case of his ancestor, how hateful pride is, even in royalty itself; how instantly God can blast the dignity of the brightest crown, and reduce him that wears it to a level with the beasts of the field; and consequently how much the prosperity of kings and the stability of their thrones depend upon acknowledging that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will." But all these awful lessons were lost upon Belshazzar.

The only circumstances of his reign recorded, are the visions of the prophet Daniel, in the first and third years, Dan. 7: 1, 8: 1; and his sacrilegious feast and violent death, Dan. 5: 1—30. Isaiah, who represents the Babylonian dynasty as "the scourge of Palestine," styles Nebuchadnezzar "a serpent," Evil-Merodach "a cockatrice," and Belshazzar "a fiery flying serpent," "the worst of all, Isa. 14: 4—29. And Xenophon confirms this prophetic character by two atrocious instances of cruelty and barbarity, exercised by Belshazzar upon some of his chief and most deserving nobles. He slew the only son of Gobryas, in a transport of rage, because at a hunting match he hit with his spear a bear, and afterwards a lion, when the king had missed both; and in a fit of jealousy, he brutally castrated Gadatus, because one of his concubines had commended him as a handsome man. His last and most heinous offence was the profanation of the sacred vessels belonging to the temple of Jerusalem, which his wise grandfather, and even his foolish father Evil-Merodach, had respected. In that very night, in the midst of their mirth and revelling, the city was taken by surprise, Belshazzar himself put to death, and the kingdom transferred to Darius the Mede. If the character of the hand-writing was known to the magi of Babylon, the meaning could not be conjectured. Perhaps, however, the character was that of the ancient Hebrew, or what we now call the Samaritan; and in that case, it would be familiar to Daniel, though rude and unintelligible to the Chaldeans. But even if Daniel could read the words, the import of this solemn graphic message to the proud and impious monarch could only have been made known to the prophet by God. All the ideas the three words convey, are numbering, weighing, and dividing. It was only for the power which sent the omen, to unfold, not in equivocal terms, like the responses of heathen oracles, but in explicit language, the decision of the righteous Judge, the termination of his long-suffering, and the instant visitation of judgment. — See BABYLON.—Watson.

BELTESHAZZAR; the name given to Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 1: 7.

BELUS; a river of Palestine. On leaving Acre, and turning towards the south-east, the traveller crosses the river Belus, near its mouth, where the stream is shallow enough to be easily forded on horseback. This river rises out of a lake, computed to be about six miles distant, towards the south-east, called by the ancients Palus Centaurovia. Of the sand of this river, according to Pliny, glass was first made; and ships from Italy continued to convey it to the glass-houses of Venice and Genoa, so late as the middle of the seventeenth century.

BEMA, (Gr.); a tribunal; the name of the bishop's throne, in the ancient church. This seat, or throne, together with those of the presbyters, were always fixed at the upper end of the chancel, in a semicircle above the altar. For anciently, the seats of the bishops and presbyters were joined together, and both called thrones. The manner of their sitting is related by Gregory Nazianzen, in his description of the church of Anastasia, where he speaks of himself as bishop sitting upon the high throne, and the presbyters on lower benches, on both sides about him. Some learned men think this was done in imitation of the Jewish synagogues, in which, according to Maimonides, at the upper end, looking towards the holy land, the law was placed in the wall, in an arch, and on each side were seated the elders in a semicircle.

Augustine tells Maximus, the Donatist bishop, that "when bishops come to stand before the tribunal of Christ, at the last judgment, they will then have no tribunals, no lofty seats, or covered chairs; though such honors are granted them for a time in this world, for the benefit and advantage of the church." See CHURCH.

The bishop's throne was likewise called sedes and cathedra; whence come our English names cathedral and see, for a church where the bishop's chair or seat is fixed. See CATHEDRAL and SEE.

The term bema was also given by the Manichees to their altar, and to the day on which Manes was killed, because on that day they adorned their bema or altar with great magnificence.—Henderson's Buck.

BENAIAH, son of Jehoiada; captain of David's guard. He took "the two lions of Moab," that is, the two cities of Ar, or Ariel; or the city Ar, divided into two parts by the river Arnon. He also killed a lion in a pit, in time of snow. He killed a giant five cubits high, who was armed with sword and spear, though he himself had a staff only in his hand. He adhered to Solomon against Adonijah; was sent by Solomon to kill Joab; and was made generalissimo in his place, 1 Kings 1: 36. 2: 29.—Some persons of this name returned from Babylon with Ezra.—Calmét.

BEND. God's bending Judah for himself, and the filling the bow with Ephraim, is his enabling them to defeat the Syro-Grecian forces in the time of the Maccabees. Zech. 9: 13. The vine, the royal family of Judah, bent her roots towards the king of Egypt, when king Zedekiah entered into a covenant with, and depended on him for assistance against the king of Babylon. Ezek. 17: 7. The gentiles come bending to the church, when, in the apostolic or after-ages, they unite with it, with great readiness, affection, and humility. Isa. 60: 14. To be bent to back-sliding, is to be earnestly set upon it. Hos. 11: 7.—Brown's Bib. Dict.

BENEATH. Men, especially if wicked, are said to be from beneath; their bodies are sprung of the earth, and live on it, their affections sadly cleave to it, and they are children of hell. John 8: 23.—Brown.

BENEDICT, (Sr.), one of the originators of monastic institutions in the West, was born at Nurscia, in Italy, in 480. Early in life, he retired into a desert, and spent three years in a cavern. Being discovered, his sanctity drew to him such numbers of people, that he founded twelve convents. In 529, he went to Monte Cassino, built a monastery on the site of the temple of Apollo, gave rise to the Benedictine order, and died in 543 or 547.—Davenport.

BENEDICT XIII., (pope,) son of the duke of Gravina, a Neapolitan nobleman, was born in 1649, and was raised to the papal chair in 1721. He was pious, virtuous, and liberal; but, unfortunately, placed too much confidence in cardinal Coscia, his minister, who shamefully oppressed the people. A fruitless attempt which he made to reconcile the Romish, Greek, Lutheran, and Calvinist churches, bears honorable testimony to his tolerant spirit. His theological works form three folio volumes. He died in 1730.—Davenport.

BENEDICT XIV., (pope,) whose name was Prosper Lambertini, was of an illustrious family at Bologna, in which city he was born, in 1675. After having been bishop of Ancona, and archbishop of Bologna, he was elected pope in 1740. He protected the arts and sciences, endeavored to heal the dissensions and reform the discipline of the church; and displayed such a liberal spirit, that ne was sometimes called the Protestant pope. In private life he was extremely amiable. He died in 1753. His works fill sixteen volumes in folio.—Davenport.

BENEDICTINES; an order embracing almost all the monks in the West from the sixth to the tenth century. They were so called, because they followed the rule of Benedict, of Norscia. The rules which the monasteries in France and Spain had received from their bishops, as well as that of St. Columba, were essentially the same as those of Benedict. He established himself in a monastery on Monte Cassino, near Naples, in 529, in a grove of Apollo, after the temple had been destroyed, and this monastery became the model of all the others. After this time, the monks, who had worn different dresses, now wore black. These monasteries were afterwards reformed by the Cluniacs, a branch of the Benedictines, who had their origin and name from the convent of Clugny, in Burgundy, founded in the year 910. In the twelfth century, the order contained two thousand monasteries. In the middle ages, they were the asylums of literature and science; and in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, they had attached to them a considerable number of abbeys and priories in different parts of France. They are still found in Italy, Sicily, Spain, Germany, and Austria; but many of them are very lax in their rules.—Henderson's Buck.

BENEDICTINE FATHERS; celebrated editions of the writings of the fathers, edited by some of the most learned of the Benedictine monks in France.—Henderson's Buck.

BENEDICTION; in a general sense, the act of blessing, or giving praise to God, or returning thanks for his favours. The Jews, it is said, are obliged to rehearse a hundred benedictions every day, of which eighty are to be spoken in the morning. It was usual to give a benediction to travellers on their taking leave, a practice which is still preserved among the monks. Benedictions were likewise given among the ancient Jews, as well as Christians, by imposition of hands. And when at length the primitive simplicity of the Christian worship began to give way to ceremony, they added the sign of the cross, which was made with the same hand as before, only elevated or extended. Hence benediction in the modern Romish church (benedictio sacerdotalis) is used, in a more particular manner, to denote the sign of the cross made by a bishop or prelate, as conferring some grace on the people.

The pope gives a solemn benediction three times every year; viz. on Maunday Thursday, on Easter, and on Ascension day. The term is also employed to denote the blessing pronounced by the priest at the death-bed of the sick, when it is called benedictio benetica.

Among Protestants, the word is commonly applied to the blessing implored by the minister and congregation at the close of public worship, only with this difference, that consistent Dissenters, instead of aping the Romish priest, who really professes to impart the blessing, use the form, "be with us," instead of "be with you."

Benediction is also used for an ecclesiastical ceremony, whereby a thing is rendered sacred or venerable. In this sense, benediction differs from consecration, as in the latter, unction is applied, which is not in the former: thus the chalice is consecrated, and the pix blessed; as the former, not the latter, is anointed, though in the common usage these two words are applied promiscuously. The spirit of piety, or rather of superstition, has introduced into the Romish church benedictions for almost every thing: we read of forms of benedictions for wax candles, for boughs, for ashes, for church vessels, for ornaments, for flags, or ensigns, arms, first-fruits, houses, ships, paschal eggs, cicilium, or the hair-cloth of penitents, church-yards, &c. In general, these benedictions are performed by aspersions of holy water, signs of the cross, and prayers suitable to the nature of the ceremony. The forms of these benedictions are found in the Roman pontifical, in the Roman missal, in the book of ecclesiastical ceremonies, printed in pope Leo X.'s time, and in the rituals and ceremonies of the different churches, which are found collected in father Martene's work on the rites and discipline of the church.—Henderson's Buck.

BENEFACTORS; such as do good to others; especially if in important stations, and on an extensive scale.

Every Christian is called by his religion to earn this truly glorious name. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good. Rom. 12: 21. As we therefore have opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith. Gal. 6: 10. Flatterers have often applied the glorious title of benefactors to rulers and princes who have little deserved the name, (as to Ptolemy Evergetes, king of Egypt,) though their office requires them to be such. To this custom our Lord refers in Luke 22: 25. See Cotton Mather's excellent "Essays to do Good," to the early reading of which Franklin ascribed that love of practical usefulness, which so eminently distinguished his subsequent life. That usefulness might have been still greater, if, like Howard's, it had been ennobled and quickened by Christian principles—by the grateful, ardent, and admiring love of that HEAVENLY BENEFACITOR, who when on earth went about doing good.

BENEFICE, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, means a church endowed with a revenue for the performance of divine service, or the revenue itself assigned to an ecclesiastical person, by way of stipend for the service he is to do that church.

As to the origin of the word, we find it as follows, in Alet's "Ritual." "This word was anciently appropriated to the lands which kings used to bestow on those who had fought valiantly in the wars, and was not used in this particular signification but during the time that the Goths and Lombards reigned in Italy, under whom those feifs were introduced, which were peculiarly termed benefices, and those who enjoyed them beneficiarii, or vassals; for though the Romans also bestowed lands on their captains and soldiers, yet those lands had not the name of benefices appropriated to them; but the word benefice was a general term, which included all kinds of gifts or grants, according to the ancient signification of the Latin word. In imitation of the new sense in which that word was taken with regard to feifs, it began to be employed in the church when her temporalities began to be divided, and to be given up to particular persons, by taking them out of those of the bishops. This the bishops themselves first introduced, purposely to reward merit, and assist such ecclesiastics as might be in necessity. However, this was soon carried to greater lengths, and at last became unlimited, as has since been manifest in the clericate and the monasteries. A benefice, therefore, is not merely a right of receiving part of the temporalities of the church for the service a person renders it; a right which is founded upon the Gospel, and has always subsisted since the apostolic age; but it is that of enjoying a part of the temporalities of the church, assigned and determined in a special form, so as that no other clergyman can lay any claim or pretension to it. And in this age, it is not barely the right of enjoying a part of the temporalities of the church, but is likewise a fixed and permanent right, in such a manner that it devolves on another after the death of the incumbent, which anciently was otherwise; for, at the rise of benefices, they were indulged to clergymen only for a stated time, or for life; after which, they reverted to the church."

It is not easy to determine when the effects of the church were first divided. It is certain, that in the fourth century, all the revenues were in the hands of the bishops, who distributed them by their economi or stewards; and they consisted chiefly in alms and voluntary contributions. When the church came to have inheritances, part of them were assigned for the maintenance of the clergy, of which we find some footsteps in the fifth and sixth centuries; but the allotment seems not to have been a fixed thing, but to have been absolutely discretionary, till the twelfth century.

Benefices were divided, by the canonists, into simple and sacredotal. The first sort lays no obligation, but to read prayers, sing, &c. Such kind of beneficiaries are canons, chaplains, chanters, &c. The second is charged with the cure of souls, the guidance and direction of consciences, &c. Such are rectories, vicarages, &c. The canonists likewise specify three ways of vacating a benefice; viz. de jure, de facto, and by the sentence of a judge. A benefice is void de jure, when a person is guilty of crimes for which he is disqualified by law to hold a benefice: such are heresy, simony, &c. A benefice is void de facto and de jure, by the natural death or resignation of the incum-

ben. Lastly, a benefice is vacated by sentence of the judge, when the incumbent is dispossessed of it, by way of punishment for immorality, or any crime against the state.

The Romanists, again, distinguish benefices into regular and secular. Regular benefices are those held by a religious or monk of any order, abbey, priory, or convent. Secular benefices are those conferred on the secular priests, of which sort are most of their cures.

The church distinguishes between dignities and benefices. The former title is only applicable to bishoprics, deaneries, archdeaconries, and prebends: the latter comprehends all ecclesiastical preferments under those degrees; as rectories and vicarages. It is essential to these latter, that they be bestowed freely, reserving nothing to the patron; that they be given as a provision for the clerk, who is only an usu-fructuary, and has no inheritance in them; and that all contracts concerning them be in their own nature void. See PLURALITIES; RESIDENCE; and SIMONY.—Henderson's B. C.

BENEFICIARY; in Europe, a benefited person, or one who receives and enjoys one or more benefices. He is not, however, the proprietor of the revenues of his church; he has only the administration of them, unaccountable for the same to any but God.—Henderson's B. C.

In the United States, it is more generally used for one who receives aid from an Education society.

BENEFIT; (1.) the gifts and favors of God. 2 Chron. 32: 25. (2.) The favors and useful deeds of men one to another. 2 Cor. 1: 15. Phil. 14. Salvation from sin and misery to holiness and happiness is called the benefit; it is the greatest display of God's favor to us, and comprehends all kindness. 1 Tim. 6: 2.—Brown.

BENEFIT OF CLERGY; a privilege enjoyed by those in holy orders, which originated in a religious regard for the honor of the church, by which the clergy of Roman Catholic countries were either partially or wholly exempted from the jurisdiction of lay tribunals. It extended, in England, only to cases of felony; and though it was intended to apply only to clerical felons or clerics, yet as every one who could read was, by the laws of England, considered to be a clerk, when the rudiments of learning came to be diffused, almost every man in the community came to be entitled to this privilege. Peers were entitled to it whether they could read or not; and by the statutes of 3 and 4 William and Mary, c. 9; and 4 and 5 William and Mary, c. 21, it was extended to women. In the earlier periods of the Catholic church in England, the clerk, on being convicted of felony, and claiming the benefit of clergy, was handed over to the ecclesiastical tribunal for a new trial or purgation, the pretty uniform result of which was his acquittal. His pretended trial of purgation gave rise to a great deal of abuse and perjury, so that at length the secular judges, instead of handing over the culprit to the ecclesiastics for purgation, ordered him to be detained in prison until he should be pardoned by the king. By the statute of 18 Eliz. cap. 7, persons convicted of felony, and entitled to benefit of clergy, were to be discharged from prison, being first branded in the thumb, if laymen; it being left to the discretion of the judge to detain them in prison not exceeding one year; and by the statute of 5 Anne, c. 6, it was enacted, that it should no longer be requisite that a person should be able to read in order to be entitled to the privilege; so that from the passing of this act, a felon was no more liable to be hanged because of his deficiency in learning. The statutes formerly made specific provisions, that, in particular cases, the culprit should not be entitled to benefit of clergy; but the statute of 7 and 8 George IV. c. 28, provides, that "benefit of clergy, with respect to persons convicted of felony, shall be abolished." In North America, this privilege has been formally abolished in some of the states, and allowed only in one or two cases in others; while in others, again, it does not appear to have been known at all. By the act of Congress of April 30, 1790, it is enacted, that "benefit of clergy shall not be used or allowed, upon conviction of any crime for which, by any statute of the United States, the punishment is or shall be declared to be death."—Encyc. Amer.

BENEFIELD. (SEBASTIAN,) an eminent divine of the seventeenth century, was born August 12, 1559, at Pres-tonbury, in Gloucestershire. He was educated at Oxford. In 1608, he took the degree of D. D., and five years afterward, was chosen Margaret professor in that university. Dr. Benefield was so eminent a scholar, disputant, and divine, and particularly so well versed in the fathers and schoolmen, that he had not his equal in the university. He was strongly attached to the doctrinal opinions of Calvin. He was remarkable for strictness of life and sincerity; of a retired and sedentary disposition; and consequently less easy and affable in conversation. He died, August 24, 1630. His works, in ten volumes, are devoted to doctrinal and practical theology.—Middleton's Biog.

BENEZET, (ANTHONY,) a distinguished philanthropist of Philadelphia, was born at St. Quintins, a town in the province of Picardy, France, January 31, 1713. About the time of his birth, the persecution against the Protestants was carried on with relentless severity; in consequence of which many thousands found it necessary to leave their native country, and seek a shelter in a foreign land. Among these were his parents, who removed to London in February, 1715, and, after remaining there upwards of sixteen years, came to Philadelphia in November, 1731. During their residence in Great Britain, they had imbibed the religious opinions of the Quakers, and were received into that body immediately after their arrival in this country.

In the early part of his life, Benezet was put an apprentice to a merchant; but soon after his marriage, in 1740, when his affairs were in a prosperous situation, he left the mercantile business, that he might engage in some pursuit which would afford him more leisure for the duties of religion, and for the exercise of that benevolent spirit, for which, during the course of a long life, he was so conspicuous. But no employment which accorded perfectly with his inclination presented itself, till the year 1742, when he accepted the appointment of instructor in the Friends' English school of Philadelphia. The duties of the honorable, though not very lucrative office, of a teacher of youth, he from this period continued to fulfil with unremitting assiduity and delight, and with very little intermission, till his death. During the two last years of his life, his zeal to do good induced him to resign the school which he had long superintended, and to engage in the instruction of the blacks. In doing this, he did not consult his worldly interest, but was influenced by a regard to the welfare of men, whose minds had been debased by servitude. He wished to contribute something towards rendering them fit for the enjoyment of that freedom, to which many of them had been restored. So great was his sympathy with every being capable of feeling pain, that he resolved towards the close of his life, to eat no animal food. This change in his mode of living is supposed to have been the occasion of his death. His active mind did not yield to the debility of his body. He persevered in his attendance upon his school, till within a few days of his decease. He died, May 3, 1784, aged seventy-one years.

Such was the general esteem in which he was held, that his funeral was attended by persons of all religious denominations. Many hundred negroes followed their friend and benefactor to the grave; and by their tears they proved, that they possessed the sensibilities of men. An officer, who had served in the army during the war with Britain, observed at this time, "I would rather be Anthony Benezet in that coffin, than George Washington with all his fame." He exhibited uncommon activity and industry in every thing which he undertook. He used to say, that the highest act of charity, was to bear with the unreasonableness of mankind. He generally wore plush clothes, and gave as a reason for it, that, after he had worn them for two or three years, they made comfortable and decent garments for the poor. So disposed was he to make himself contented in every situation, that when his memory began to fail him, instead of lamenting the decay of his powers, he said to a young friend, "This gives me one great advantage over you; for you can find entertainment in reading a good book only once; but I enjoy that pleasure as often as I read it, for it is always new to me." Few men, since the days of the apostles, ever lived a more disinterested life; yet upon his death-bed he expressed a desire to live a little longer, "that he might bring down self." The last time he ever walked across his room, was to take from his desk six dollars, which he gave to a poor widow whom he had long assisted to maintain. In his conversation, he was affable and unreserved; in his manners, gentle and conciliating. For the acquisition of wealth, he wanted neither abilities nor opportunity; but he made himself contented with a little; and with a competency, he was liberal beyond most of those whom a bountiful Providence had encumbered with riches. By his will he devised his estate, after the decease of his wife, to certain trustees, for the use of the African school. While the British army was in possession of Philadelphia, he was indefatigable in his endeavors to render the situation of the persons who suffered from captivity, as easy as possible. He knew no fear in the presence of a fellow man, however dignified by titles or station; and such was the propriety and gentleness of his manners in his intercourse with the gentlemen who commanded the British and German troops, that, when he could not obtain the object of his requests, he never failed to secure their civilities and esteem.

Although the life of Mr. Benezet was passed in the instruction of youth, yet his expansive benevolence extended itself to a wider sphere of usefulness. Giving but a small portion of his time to sleep, he employed his pen both day and night in writing books on religious subjects, composed chiefly with a view to inculcate the peaceable temper and doctrines of the Gospel in opposition to the spirit of war, and to expose the flagrant injustice of slavery, and fix the stamp of infamy on the traffic in human blood. His writings contributed much towards meliorating the condition of slaves, and undoubtedly had influence on the public mind in effecting the complete prohibition of that trade, which, until the year 1808, was a blot on the American national character. In order to disseminate his publications and increase his usefulness, he held a correspondence with such persons, in various parts of Europe and America, as united with him in the same benevolent design, or would be likely to promote the objects which he was pursuing. No ambitious or covetous views impelled him to his exertions. Regarding all mankind as children of one common Father, and members of one great family, he was anxious that oppression and tyranny should cease, and that men should live together in mutual kindness and affection. He himself respected, and he wished others to respect, the sacred injunction, "Do unto others, as you would that they should do unto you." On the return of peace, in 1763, apprehending that the revival of commerce would be likely to renew the African slave trade, which during the war had been in some measure obstructed, he addressed a letter to the queen of Great Britain, to solicit her influence on the side of humanity. At the close of this letter he says, "I hope thou wilt kindly excuse the freedom used on this occasion by an ancient man, whose mind, for more than forty years past, has been much separated from the common course of the world, and long painfully exercised in the consideration of the miseries under which so large a part of mankind, equally with us the objects of redeeming love, are suffering the most unjust and grievous oppression, and who sincerely desires the temporal and eternal felicity of the queen and her royal consort." He published, among other tracts, an Account of that Part of Africa inhabited by Negroes, 1762; a Caution to Great Britain and her Colonies, in a short Representation of the Calamitous State of the Enslaved Negroes in the British Dominions, 1767; some Historical Account of Guinea, with an Inquiry into the Rise and Progress of the Slave Trade, 1771; a Short Account of the Religious Society of Friends, 1780; a Dissertation on the Plainness and Simplicity of the Christian Religion, 1782; Tracts against the Use of Ardent Spirits; Observations on the Indian Natives of this Continent, 1784.—Rush's Essays, 311—314; Vaux's Memoir; *New and Gen. BENGELO, or BENGEIUS, (JOHN ALBERT,) a distinguished pious German theologian, and a celebrated biblical critic. He was born at Winneden, in Württemberg, 1687, studied at Stuttgart and Tübingen, and in 1713 became preacher and professor at Denkendorf. In 1741, he was made councillor and dean of the cloister Herbrichtingen; and, in 1749, he was created abbot or prelate of Alpirsbach, where he died, November 2, 1752. His chief studies were the New Testament and the fathers. He was the first Lutheran divine who applied to the criticism of the New Testament a grasp of mind which embraced the subject in its whole extent, and a patience of investigation which the study required. While a student, he was much perplexed by the various readings, which led him to form the determination of making a text for himself, which he executed in a very careful and scrupulous manner, according to very rational and critical rules, excepting that he would not admit any reading into the text which had not been previously printed in some edition. In the book of Revelation alone, he deviated from this rule. His conscientious piety tended greatly to allay the fears which had been excited among the clergy with respect to various readings; and to him belongs the honor of having struck out that path which has since been trod with so much eclat by Wetstein, Griesbach, and others.

Besides his Greek New Testament, printed at Tübingen, 1734 and 1763, 4to. Bengel published a Gnomon which is highly esteemed, and an Exposition of the Apocalypse, which laid the foundation of a prophetic school in Germany, which exists at this day. According to his system, the end of the forty-two months, and of the number of the beast, was May 21, 1810; and the destruction of the beast is to take place June 18, 1836.—Henderson's Duck.

I. BEN-HADAD, a son of Tabrimon, king of Syria, who came to assist Asa, king of Judah, against Baasha, king of Israel, and obliged him to return and succeed his own country, and to abandon Ramah, which he had undertaken to fortify, 1 Kings 15: 18. This Benhadad is probably Hadad, the Edomite, who rebelled against Solomon, 1 Kings 11: 25.—II. A king of Syria, son of the above Ben-hadad, who made war against Ahab, A. M. 3103. See AHAH, and HAZAEL.—III. A son of Hazael, above mentioned, from whom Jehoash, king of Israel, recovered all that Hazael had taken from his predecessor, 2 Kings 13: 3, 24, 25. Jehoash defeated him three times, and compelled him to surrender all the country beyond Jordan, namely, the lands belonging to Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, which Hazael had taken.

Josephus calls those princes Hadad, who, in Scripture, are named Ben-hadad, or son of Hadad; adding that the Syrians of Damascus paid divine honors to the last Hadad, and Hazael, in consideration of the benefits of their government, and particularly because they adorned Damascus with magnificent temples.—Calmet.

BEN-HENNON, or BEN-HINNON, or GER-HINNON, or GER-BEN-HINNON, that is, "the valley of the children of Hinnon;" or, "the son of intense lamentation," south-east of Jerusalem. Some say, it was the common sewer to Jerusalem, and an emblem of hell, which is called gehenna. See GEHENNA. This valley was likewise called Tophet. See TOPHET.—Calmet.

BENI KHAIBIR; sons of Keber, the descendants of the Rechabites, to whom it was promised, Jer. 35: 19, "Thus saith the Lord, Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me forever." They were first brought into notice in modern times by Mr. Samuel Brett, who wrote a narrative of the proceedings of the great council of the Jews in Hungary, A. D. 1650. He says of the sect of the Rechabites, "that they observe their old rules and customs, and neither sow, nor plant, nor build houses; but live in tents, and often remove from one place to another with their whole property and families." They are also mentioned in Niebuhr's travels. Mr. Wolf, a converted Jew, gives the following account in a late journal. He inquired of the rabbins at Jerusalem, relative to these wandering Jews, and received the following information: "Rabbi Mose Secot is quite certain that the Beni Khaibir are descendants of the Rechabites; at this present moment they drink no wine, and have neither vineyard, nor field, nor seed; but dwell, like Arabs, in tents, and are wandering nomades. They receive and observe the law of Moses by tradition, for they are not in possession of the written law." Mr. Wolf afterwards himself visited this people, who have remained, amidst all the changes of nations, a most remarkable monument of the exact fulfilment of a minute, and apparently at first sight an unimportant, prophecy. So true is it, that not one jot or tittle of the word of God shall pass away! See RECHABITES.—Watson.

BENJAMIN; the youngest son of Jacob and Rachel, Gen. 35: 16, 17, &c. Rachel died immediately after he was born, and with her last breath named him Ben-oni, the son of my sorrow: but Jacob called him Benjamin, the son of my right hand. His history may be found in Genesis. He is often called in Scripture Jemini, only, that is, my right hand. Of his tribe Jacob says, "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil;" (Gen. 49: 57.) and Moses, in his last song, says, "The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him; and the Lord shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders." Deut. 33: 12. The words—"Benjamin is a ravening wolf," are allusively applied to Paul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin; but much more properly to the valor of the tribe. See Judg. chapter 20. and CANAAN.—Calmet.

BENSON, (GEORGE, D. D.) an eminently learned non-conformist divine, was descended from a good family, and born at Great Salkeld, in Cumberland, in the year 1699. Being very early distinguished for a remarkable seriousness of temper, and a great attachment to his books, his parents determined to educate him for the ministry; with which view, when he had passed through a course of grammar learning, he was sent to an academy at Whitehaven, where he continued about a year, and from thence he was removed to the university of Glasgow, where he completed his academical studies.

In the year 1721, Mr. Benson came to London, and having been examined and approved by several of the most eminent Presbyterian ministers, he began to preach, first at Chertsey, and afterwards in London, where the learned Dr. Calamy took him into his family, and treated him with great kindness. By the recommendation of this friend, he afterwards went to Abington in Berkshire, and was unanimously chosen pastor of the congregation of Protestant Dissenters in that town, where he continued seven years, diligently employing that time in the study of the sacred writings, and in laboring to instruct and edify the people under his care.

His first publication was "A Defence of the Reasonableness of Prayer, with a Translation of a Discourse of Maximus Tyrius, on the Subject, and Remarks on it." This appeared during his continuance at Abington; whence he removed in the year 1729, upon an invitation to become minister to a congregation in King John's Court, Southwark; where he performed the duties of the pastoral office with great diligence and fidelity for eleven years, and was much beloved by his congregation.

The attempt which Mr. Locke had made to throw light upon some of the most obscure and difficult parts of Paul's Epistles, by close attention to the original design with which they were written, and by carefully pursuing the thread of the author's reasoning, induced and encouraged Mr. Benson to attempt the illustration of the other Epistles of St. Paul, in a similar method. Accordingly, in the year 1731, he published, in quarto, "A Paraphrase and Notes on Paul's Epistle to Philemon, attempted in imitation of Mr. Locke's manner. With an Appendix; in which is shown, that Paul could neither be an Enthusiast, nor an Impostor; and consequently, the Christian Religion must be (as he has represented it) heavenly and divine." This publication meeting with a very favorable reception, our author proceeded, with great diligence, and increasing reputation, to publish Paraphrases and Notes on the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, the first and second Epistle to Timothy, and the Epistle to Titus; adding some Dissertations on several important subjects.

In 1735, Mr. Benson published, in three thin volumes, quarto, "The History of the first planting of the Christian Religion, taken from the Acts of the Apostles, and their Epistles. Together with the remarkable Facts of the Jewish and Roman History, which affected the Christians within this period." In this work, besides illustrating throughout, the history of the Acts, and most of the Epistles, by a view of the history of the times, the occasion of the several Epistles, and the state of the churches to which they were addressed, the learned author hath established the truth of the Christian religion, on a number of facts, the most public, important, and incontestible; the relations of which we have from eye-witnesses of unquestionable integrity; and which produced such great and extensive alterations in the moral and religious state of the world, as cannot be rationally accounted for, without admitting the reality of these facts, and the truth of these relations.

In 1740, Mr. Benson was chosen pastor of the congregation of Protestant Dissenters in Crutched Friars, London, in the room of Dr. William Harris; and in this situation he continued till his death. He had, for several years, as his assistant, the very eminent and learned Dr. Lardner; and they constantly lived together in the greatest friendship. In 1743, Mr. Benson published, in octavo, his treatise on "The Reasonableness of the Christian Religion, as delivered in the Scriptures;" and, the following year, in consideration of his great learning and abilities, the university of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity.

Dr. Benson, having finished those Epistles of Paul on which he intended to write paraphrases and notes, proceeded to explain, after the same manner, the seven Epistles, commonly called Catholic Epistles; namely, the Epistle of James, the two Epistles of Peter, the Epistle of Jude, and the three Epistles of John. These, and his other labors in sacred literature, met with a very favorable reception in foreign countries, and particularly in Germany, as well as at home; where they procured him the friendship and esteem of many eminent persons in the established church, as well as amongst the Dissenters. He died, in a very composed and resigned manner, on the 6th of April, 1762, in the sixty-third year of his age.

Dr. Benson was a man of great piety and learning—intensely studious, and unwearied in his researches after theological truth, which was the principal business of his life. On all occasions, he was a zealous advocate for free inquiry, and the right of private judgment; but, though his integrity was unquestioned, yet the freedom with which he expressed his sentiments on some points controverted amongst Christians, exposed him to censures and indecent reflections from men of little candor and contracted views.

The doctor left behind him, in manuscript, "The History of the Life of Jesus Christ, taken from the New Testament, with Observations and Reflections proper to illustrate the Excellence of his Character, and the Divinity of his Mission and Religion." Several critical dissertations were annexed to this performance; and the whole was published together, in the year 1764, in one volume, quarto; to which was prefixed, a mezzotinto print of the author. Dr. Amory, who was the editor of this work, hath also added to it, "Memoirs of the Life, Character, and Writings of Dr. Benson."—Jones's Chris. Biog.

BENTHAM, (JEREMY,) an English writer of great reputation in legislation, metaphysics, and morals, was born in 1747. At three years of age he is said to have read Rappin's History of England as an amusement, and at seven, he read Telemachus in French. Such was the contemplative turn of his mind, and the clearness and accuracy of his observation, from early childhood, that at the age of five years he had acquired the name of "the philosopher." While at Westminster school, he obtained from Helvetius on the Mind a glimpse of that "greatest happiness principle," which he afterwards so powerfully developed. At thirteen, he entered Oxford, and at sixteen took his degree of A. B. being the youngest graduate then known at either of the universities. He was early acquainted with Hogarth, Blackstone, and Johnson. While at Oxford, the expulsion of five students under the stigma of Methodism, for "reading and talking over the Bible," awakened a disgust with the Church of England which continued through life. On being required to sign the Thirty-nine Articles, he makes these remarks, "When out of the multitude of his attendants Jesus chose twelve for his apostles, by the men in office he was declared to be possessed by a devil; by his own friends he was set down for mad. The like fate, were my conscience to have showed itself more scrupulous than that of my official casuist, was before my eyes. Before the eyes of Jesus stood a comforter—his Father—an Almighty one. Before my weak eyes stood no comforter."

In the year 1772, he was called to the bar, but saw so much chicanery in legal business as then conducted, as led him at first to determine on quitting the profession, and eventually on working a complete reform in the system of English jurisprudence. To this immense labor he devoted the whole of his long and laborious life; and before his death he had constructed a systematic plan of civil and criminal law, founded entirely upon reason, and having for its object the happiness of the human race. He died, June 6, 1832. His ruling passion was strong in death. Sending all but a single attendant from his bedside, he said, "I now feel that I am dying: our care must be to minimize the pain." The influence of his utilitarian principles has been extensive in legislation, its proper sphere; its application in morals is not less just, but is attended with difficulties, perhaps insuperable to the human understanding without the aid of revelation. Happily, in morals we have a sure guide already in the New Testament.

Among Mr. Bentham's intimate friends, were Howard, Romilly, and Lafayette. He availed himself of every means in his power of forming and cherishing a friendship with whoever in any country indicated remarkable benevolence. But, that he might be in the less danger of falling under the influence of any wrong bias, he kept himself as much as possible from all personal contact with what is called the world. With such care over his intellectual faculties and moral affections, and with the excellent direction which he gave to both, his own happiness could not but be sure.

He was capable of great severity and continuity of mental labor. For upwards of half a century, he devoted seldom less than eight, often ten, and occasionally twelve hours of every day, to intense study. This was the more remarkable, as his physical constitution was by no means strong. His health, during the periods of childhood, youth, and adolescence, was infirm; it was not until the age of manhood that it acquired some degree of vigor. But that vigor increased with advancing age; so that during the space of sixty years he never labored under any serious malady, and rarely suffered even from slight indisposition. At the age of eighty-four, he looked no older, and constitutionally was no older than most men at sixty; thus adding another illustrious name to the splendid catalogue which establishes the fact, that severe and constant mental labor is not incompatible with health and longevity, but conducive to both, provided the mind be unanxious, and the habits temperate.

He was a great economist of time. He knew the value of minutes. The disposal of his hours, both of labor and repose, was a matter of systematic arrangement; and the arrangement was determined on the principle, that it is a calamity to lose the smallest portion of time. He did not deem it sufficient to provide against the loss of a day or an hour: he took effectual means to prevent the occurrence of any such calamity to him: he was careful to provide against the loss even of a single minute; and there is on record no example of a human being who lived more habitually under the practical consciousness that his days are numbered, and that "the night cometh, in which no man can work." The serenity and cheerfulness of his mind, when he became satisfied that his work was done, and that he was about to be down to his final rest, was truly affecting. On that work he looked back with a feeling which would have been a feeling of triumph, had not the consciousness of how much still remained to be done, changed it to that of sorrow that he was allowed to do no more. But this feeling again gave place to a calm but deep emotion of exultation, as he recollected that he left behind him able, zealous and faithful minds, that would enter into his labors and complete them.

His various publications amount to about one hundred; and several of the greatest importance have been translated into most European languages.—The Museum; Annual Biography, 1833.

BENTLEY, (DR. RICHARD), an eminent divine and most profound linguist, was born at Wakefield, in the county of York, in the year 1662, but on what day or month seems to be uncertain. His father was either a blacksmith, or a tanner; but he appears to have possessed some means, and to desire that his son should reap the benefit of them by a liberal education; nor was Richard indifferent to, or careless of these advantages. After making considerable progress in the learned languages, he was entered at King's college, Cambridge, where he soon distinguished himself by his assiduous application, and before he was twenty-four years of age, he had compiled for himself a sort of Hexapla, a thick quarto, in the first column of which he arranged all the words in the Hebrew Bible, while the five others exhibited the different acceptations of them, in the Chaldee, Syriac, and Septuagint versions, those of Aquila, and Symmachus, and that of Theodosius. He likewise wrote another quarto volume of the various readings and emendations of the Hebrew text, found in those ancient versions, a work that would have done honor to a more aged critic. Having taken the degree of master of arts at Cambridge, he was incorporated into the university of Oxford, and soon afterwards became domestic chaplain to Dr. Stillingfleet, bishop of Worcester, in whose family he had resided for fourteen years, in the capacity of tutor to his son. A Latin letter to Dr. Mill, containing some observations relative to Johannes Malala, the Greek historiographer, published in 1691, affords a convincing evidence of Dr. Bentley's deep learning, and was highly spoken of by that profound scholar, Grævius, who wrote to him on the occasion in the highest terms of commendation. About this time, the doctor was appointed one of the preachers of the course of lectures founded by the Hon. Mr. Robert Boyle, afterwards lord Orrery; and in the year 1694, he published eight sermons, preached at this lecture. In the same year, he was made keeper of the royal library at St. James's, when an incident occurred, which gave occasion to the controversy that was so long carried on between him and the Hon. Mr. Boyle. During this controversy, he published his edition of Callimachus, to which he prefixed a short, but excellent, essay on the Greek Pronunciation. In the year 1700, his majesty king William III. was pleased to present Dr. Bentley to the mastership of Trinity college, Cambridge, worth about 1000*l.* a year; and the following year, the archdeaconry of Ely was conferred upon him. During his situation in the college, the doctor met with much to try him: being rather of an arbitrary disposition, he excited the opposition of some of the fellows, who complained of him to the bishop of Ely, one of the visitors, with the design of getting him removed from the office of master. The doctor presented to the bishop his defence in the form of a pamphlet, entitled, "The Present State of the University;" and thus commenced a quarrel, which lasted for twenty years, with great animosity on both sides, and was at last dropped without any decision. He was afterwards chosen Regius professor of divinity at Cambridge.

In 1720, Dr. Bentley issued proposals for a new edition of the New Testament in Greek, accompanied with the Latin version of Jerome: taking up that father's observation, that in the translation of the Holy Scriptures, "the very order of the words is mystery," he conjectured that if the most ancient Greek manuscripts were compared with Jerome's Latin, they might be found to agree with that version, both in the words and order; and upon trial, his ideas were realized even beyond his expectations. He stated also in these proposals, that he believed he had recovered, with very few exceptions, the exemplar of Origen, the great standard of the most learned fathers, for more than two hundred years after the council of Nice; and observed, that by the aid of the Greek and Latin manuscripts, the text of the original might be so far settled, that instead of thirty thousand different readings, found in the best modern editions, not more than two hundred would deserve much serious consideration. To these proposals he annexed a specimen, the last chapter of the Book of 3. zelation, with a Latin version, and the various readings in the notes; but Dr. Conyers Middleton, who had opposed him on a former occasion, wrote some very severe remarks upon them; and the tide of opposition ran so high, that the doctor thought proper wholly to drop his design.

Dr. Bentley died on the 14th of July, 1742, at the age of eighty, and was buried in the chapel of Trinity college. With regard to his attainments, he was a profound scholar, and the greatest critic in the learned languages of the time in which he lived; but his uncommon learning was better appreciated abroad than in his own country. In his manners he was rather haughty and overbearing, and too often treated others with contempt: this was particularly illustrated by his saying of Joshua Barnes, that "he understood as much Greek as a Greek cobbler;" and of himself, "When I am dead, Christopher Wasse will be the most learned man in England."—Jones's Chr. Biog.

BEREA; a city of Macedonia, near mount Cithænes, where Paul preached the gospel with success, Acts 17: 11—13. There is a medal of Berea extant, which is remarkable for being inscribed, "of the second Macedonia;" and also for being the only Macedonian medal of the date (A. U. C. 706.) inscribed with the name of the city where it was struck. Compare Acts 17: 11.—"noble Bereans."—Calmet.

BEREANS; a small sect of dissenters from the church of Scotland, who take their title from, and profess to follow the example of, the ancient Bereans, (Acts 17: 11,) in building their system of faith and practice upon the Scriptures alone, without regard to any human authority whatever.

Mr. Barclay, a Scotch clergyman, was the founder of this denomination. They first assembled as a separate society of Christians in Edinburgh, in 1773.

The Bereans agree with the established churches of England and Scotland respecting the Trinity, predestination, and election, (though they allege that these doctrines are not consistently taught in either;) but they differ from them in various points—particularly,

1. They reject all natural religion, as undermining the cause of revealed religion, by rendering it unnecessary and superfluous.

2. They consider faith in Christ and assurance of salvation as inseparable, or rather, as the same thing, because God has said, "He that believeth shall be saved." If we, therefore, credit this testimony, (which is all that they mean by faith,) it must be impious to doubt of our salvation. Mr. Barclay says, "By whatever evidence I hold the resurrection of Jesus, by the same precise evidence I must hold it for a truth that I am justified—for God hath equally asserted both." But on this Mr. Lean remarks—"The resurrection is a truth independent of my believing, and the subject of direct testimony; but my justification is not declared to be a truth until I believe the former; nor is it directly asserted, but promised on that provision, 'If thou shalt believe,' &c. Rom. 10: 9." (See Mr. Lean's Commission of the Apostles.) This seems to be the most dangerous tenet of the Bereans, because it reduces faith to fancy, since it amounts to this,—"If I persuade myself that I am a believer, then I am one."

3. They say, that the sin against the Holy Ghost is nothing else but unbelief; and that the expression, "It shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor that which is to come," means only that a person dying in unbelief would not be forgiven, neither under the former dispensation by Moses, nor under the Gospel dispensation, which, in respect of the Messiah, was a kind of future world, or world to come.—This however is more than doubtful. See Aiox.

4. They consider the whole of the Old Testament prophecies, and especially the book of Psalms, as typical or prophetic of Christ, and never apply them to the experience of private Christians. Under this and the first head, they agree with the followers of Mr. Hutchinason. See Hutchinsonians.

5. They maintain the sovereignty of God, and unconditional election, in the strongest language of the Calvinists.

The Bereans practise infant baptism, and administer the Lord's supper monthly; but, in admitting to communion, they do not require that account of personal experience, which many other churches do; but, after due admonition, they exclude unworthy members for immoral conduct, though they do not pretend to "deliver them over to Satan," as the apostles did.

The denomination has several congregations in Scotland, and some few in England and America.—Barclay's Assurance of Faith vindicated; M'Lean's Commis. p. 92. N; Supplement to Ency. Brit.; Williams.

BERENGARIUS, or BERENGER; a celebrated reformer of the eleventh century. He was a man of most acute genius, extensive learning, and exemplary sanctity of life and manners. He denied the doctrine of the real presence, as it was then commonly termed; and by writing against it, called forth all the learned of the church of Rome to defend the doctrine of transubstantiation. Berenger was a native of France, educated under Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, a very learned man; and taking orders in the church, became deacon of St. Maurice, and ultimately archbishop of Angiers, in the province of Anjou. He was also principal of the academy of Tours. The prevalent sentiment of his day relative to the eucharist was, that the bread was the identical body, and the wine the very blood of Christ—not only figuratively, but substantially and properly. Berenger, on the contrary, insisted that the body of Christ is only in the heavens; and that the elements of bread and wine are merely the symbols of his body and blood. Several of the bishops wrote against him, most bitterly complaining of his heresy; but not feeling the force of their arguments, Berenger remained unmoved, and defended his opinions with the utmost pertinacity. He wrote a letter on the subject to Lanfrank, who was at that time at the head of the convent of St. Stephen's at Caen, in Normandy, and called from thence by William the Conqueror to be archbishop of Canterbury, which being opened while the latter was from home, was officiously transmitted by the convent to pope Leo. The pontiff, shocked at its heretical contents, summoned a council at Ferrelli, at which Berenger was commanded to be present. His friends, however, advised him against going, and he consequently sent two persons to attend the council and answer in his behalf. Lanfrank also was present and pleaded for Berenger; but the latter was condemned, the two persons who appeared for him imprisoned, and Lanfrank commanded by the pope to draw up a refutation of the heresy of Berenger, on pain of being himself reputed a heretic; with which injunction he thought it prudent to comply. This example was followed also by the council of Paris, summoned the very same year by Henry I., in which Berenger and his numerous adherents were threatened with all sorts of evils both spiritual and temporal—evils which were in part executed against the heretical prelate; for the monarch deprived him of all his revenues. But neither threatenings nor fines, nor the decrees of synods, could shake the firmness of his mind, or oblige him to retract his sentiments. In the mean while, the opinions of Berenger were everywhere spreading rapidly, insomuch that, if we may credit contemporary writers, "his doctrine had corrupted all the English, Italian, and French nations." Thuanus adds, that "in Germany were many of the same doctrine, and that Bruno, bishop of Treves, banished them all out of his diocese, sparing only their blood." Three times Berenger was compelled to abjure his sentiments, at Rome; and as often, on returning to France, avowed and spread them with renewed zeal, until, disgusted with a controversy in which the first principles of reason were so impudently insulted, and exhausted by an opposition which he was unable to overcome, he abandoned all his worldly concerns, and retiring into solitude, passed the remainder of his days in fasting, prayer, and the exercise of piety. In the year 1088, death put a period to the affliction which he suffered in retirement, occasioned by bitter reflection upon his repeated dissimulations at Rome; leaving behind him, in the minds of the people, a deep impression of his extraordinary sanctity. It is not so generally known, that Berengarius also strenuously opposed papal celibacy, and the baptism of infants. His followers were as numerous as his fame was illustrious.—Jans; Mosheim; Milner; Eicow, vol. i. p. 22.

BERENGARIANS; a denomination, in the eleventh century, who adhered to the opinions of Berengarius. The Catholics ranked them among the most dangerous heretics. See BERENGARIUS.

BERKELEY, (Dr. GEORGE,) the learned and ingenious bishop of Cloyne, in Ireland, and a distinguished benefactor of Yale college, (Con.) was born in that kingdom, at Kilkenny, near Thomastown, March 12, 1684. He acquired the rudiments of his education at the school of Kilkenny; was admitted pensioner of Trinity college, Dublin, at the age of fifteen; and chosen fellow of that college, July 9, 1707, having been placed under the tuition of Dr. Hall. The first public proof that he gave of his literary abilities, was in a Latin treatise on arithmetic, written before he was twenty years old, though not published till 1707. Two years afterwards, came forth "The Theory of Vision," which, of all his works, seems to do the greatest honor to his sagacity; being, as Dr. Reid remarks, "the first attempt with which we are acquainted, to distinguish the immediate and natural objects of sight, from the conclusions which we have been accustomed from infancy to draw from them." In 1710, appeared "The Principles of Human Knowledge;" and in 1713, "Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous;" the design of both which pieces is to prove the commonly-received notion of the existence of matter to be false: that sensible material objects, as they are called, are not external to the mind, but exist in it, and are nothing more than impressions made upon it by the immediate act of God, according to certain rules, termed laws of nature, from which, in the ordinary course of his government, he never deviates; and that the uniform adherence of the Supreme Spirit to these rules is what constitutes the reality of things to his creatures. These works, if the author himself is to be credited, were drawn up against, or in opposition to, sceptics and atheists; nevertheless, Mr. Hume, speaking of these writings of the very ingenious author, as he calls him, declares that "they form the best lessons of scepticism, which are to be found either among the ancient or modern philosophers, Bayle not excepted." Whatever were Berkeley's intentions in composing them, that they are in reality merely sceptical, appears from this, that they admit of no answer, and produce no conviction. Their only effect is, to cause that momentary amazement, and irresolution, and confusion, which are the results of scepticism. But our author had not reached his twenty-seventh year when he propounded this whimsical theory.

Our present concern, however, is with Dr. Berkeley, not as a philosopher or metaphysician, but as a Christian and friend to revelation, and therefore we proceed to add, that in 1712, he published three sermons in favor of passive obedience and non-resistance, which went through at least three editions at the moment. To such an extent was the duty of allegiance carried in these sermons, that they brought upon the author the reproach of Jacobitism, and it cost his friend Mr. Molineux no little pains to wipe off that impression at court. But the graces of his composition procured him many admirers; for acuteness of parts and beauty of imagination were so conspicuous in his writings, that his reputation was soon established, and his company sought, even where his opinions did not find admission. In 1721, he accompanied the duke of Grafton on his mission to Ireland as viceroy, in the capacity of chaplain; and in the same year obtained the degree of doctor in divinity. On the 18th of May, 1724, he was promoted to the deanery of Derry, worth twelve hundred pounds per annum. In 1725, he published "A Proposal for converting the savage Americans to Christianity, by a College to be erected in the Summer Islands, otherwise called the Isles of Bermuda;" a scheme which had employed his thoughts for three or four years past, and he evinced his earnestness in the noble undertaking by the sacrifices he made to carry it into effect. He made a voluntary offer to resign all his preferments, and to dedicate the remainder of his life to the office of instructing the American youth, on a salary from government of one hundred pounds yearly. He prevailed on three junior fellows of Trinity college, Dublin, to give up all their prospects of preferment at home, and to exchange their fellowships for a settlement in the Atlantic ocean of forty pounds a year. He procured his plan to be laid before George I., who commanded Sir Robert Walpole to submit it to the consideration of the house of commons; the result of which was the granting of a charter to him for erecting a college in Bermuda, to consist of a president and nine fellows, who were obliged to maintain and educate Indian scholars, at ten pounds a year each. He also obtained from the commons the grant of a sum, the amount to be determined by the king; and accordingly ten thousand pounds were promised by the minister, for the purchase of lands, and erecting the college. Having married the daughter of the Hon. John Foster, speaker of the Irish house of commons, on the 1st of August, 1728, Dr. Berkeley set sail in the following month for Rhode Island, on his way to Bermuda, taking with him his wife, a single lady, and two gentlemen of fortune. Yet the scheme entirely failed, and Berkeley was obliged to return home, after residing nearly two years at Newport, Rhode Island. The reason assigned is, that Sir Robert Walpole never heartily embraced the project, and the sum voted by parliament was converted by him to other purposes. At his departure, he distributed the books he had brought with him among the clergy of Rhode Island. For further particulars of his residence in this country, of his literary influence, and liberality to Yale college, see Allen's American Biographical Dictionary.

In 1732, he published "The Minute Philosopher," in two volumes, octavo. This masterly work, which was composed at Newport, Rhode Island, is written by way of dialogue, on the model of Plato, a philosopher he is said to have much admired; and in it he pursued the freethinker through the various characters of atheist, libertine, enthusiast, scorner, critic, metaphysician, fatalist, and sceptic. The same year, he printed a sermon which he had preached before the Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts. In 1733, he was made bishop of Cloyne, and there took up his residence, faithfully prosecuting the duties of his elevated station, and continuing his studies with unwearied application.

In person, bishop Berkeley was remarkably handsome, with a countenance full of expression and benignity, of muscular strength, and a robust constitution. He was an early riser, and much devoted to his studies. The excellence of his moral character is indeed conspicuous in his writings: he was certainly a very amiable, as well as a very superior man; and Pope is scarcely thought to have dealt in hyperbole, when he attributed "To Berkeley every virtue under heaven."

In July, 1752, bishop Berkeley removed, with his lady and family, to Oxford, partly to superintend the education of a son, but chiefly to indulge the passion for learned retirement, which had ever strongly possessed him, and which was one motive with him in forming the Bermuda project. Here he lived highly respected, till the evening of Sunday, January 14, 1753, when, as he was in the midst of his family, listening to a sermon which his lady was reading to him, he was seized with what was called a palsy in the heart, and instantly expired.—Jones's Chr. Bio.

BERNARD of MENTRON, archdeacon of Aosta, was born in 923, near Annecy, in Savoy, and was celebrated among his contemporaries for his learning and piety; but his claims to the notice of later ages rest on his having been the benevolent founder of the two admirable institutions on the Great and Little St. Bernard, by means of which the lives of so many travellers have been saved. He died in 1008.—Davenport.

BERNARD of THURINGIA; a fanatical hermit of the tenth century, who threw almost all Europe into consternation, by preaching that the end of the world was at hand. Multitudes relinquished their occupations, and became pilgrims; and others were so frightened at an eclipse of the sun which then occurred, that they hid themselves in caverns and holes in the rocks. The terror spread by this man was not wholly removed till towards the close of the eleventh century.—Davenport.

BERNARD, (St.,) the celebrated abbot of Clairvaux, was born at Fontaine, in Burgundy, in 1091, of noble parents. An austere manner of living, solitary studies, an inspiring eloquence, boldness of language, and the reputation of a prophet, rendered him an oracle to all Christian Europe. He was named the honeyed teacher, and his writings were styled a stream from Paradise. He was the antagonist of the schoolmen, and uniform advocate of prac-secular Christianity. But it ought to be confessed, that like Athanasius, Augustine, and other Catholic fathers, he was misled by the love of ecclesiastical conformity, to false pretensions, and persecuting principles. All ecclesiastical dignities he constantly refused; but his virtues and talents gained him a higher influence in the Christian world than was possessed even by the pope himself, and the disputes of the church were often referred to his arbitration. His eloquence was powerfully displayed in the multitudes that he induced to assume the characters of crusaders. He died in 1153. Luther says of him, "If there has ever been a pious monk who feared God, it was St. Bernard; whom alone I hold in much higher esteem than all other monks and priests throughout the globe." His devotional Meditations are still read and admired, even among Protestants. They were translated into English by dean Stanhope. There are editions of his works in six volumes, and in two volumes, folio.—Davenport.

BERNARD, (CLAUDE,) a native of Dijon, born in 1588, who assumed the title of "the poor priest," is worthy of commemoration for his ardent and persevering charity. His whole life was devoted to assisting the poor, attending the sick in the hospitals, and preparing criminals for death. For these purposes, he not only solicited benefactions from the rich, but sold his own inheritance, which was worth nearly twenty thousand pounds. He died in 1641.—Davenport.

BERNARDINES; an order of monks, founded by Robert, abbot of Moleme, and reformed by St. Bernard, a celebrated Franciscan friar of the fourteenth century. They wear a white robe, with a black scapulary; and when they officiate, they are clothed with a large gown, which is all white, and has great sleeves, with a hood of the same color. They differ very little from the Cistercians, and had their origin towards the beginning of the twelfth century.—Henderson's Buck.

BERNARDIN DE SAINT-PIERRE, (JAMES HENRY,) author of the celebrated "Studies of Nature," was born at Havre, in 1737, and is said to have been a descendant of the celebrated Eustace de St. Pierre, the patriotic mayor of Calais. At the age of twenty, he entered into the engineer service; and he successively served at Malta, in Russia, and in Poland. On his revisiting his native country, he obtained a captain's commission in the engineer corps, and was sent to the Isle of France, from whence, however, after a residence of three years, he returned, with no other fortune than a collection of shells and insects, and a narrative of his voyage. The latter, which was his first literary effort, was published in 1773; and he, therefore, devoted himself to literature. His Studies of Nature appeared in 1784, and passed rapidly through several editions. Paul and Virginia was published in 1788, and this delightful tale acquired an unprecedented popularity, and set the seal on his reputation. During the reign of terror, he narrowly escaped the scaffold. From Napoleon and his brother Joseph he received pensions, which gave comfort to his latter days. He died in 1814. His Harmonies of Nature was given to the press after his death. The best edition of his works is in twelve octavo volumes. The philosophy of St. Pierre is occasionally eccentric; but the piety of his sentiments, the purity of his morality, and the beauty of his style, deserve the highest praise.—Davenport.

BERNICE, or BERENICE; daughter of Agrippa the Great, king of the Jews, and sister of Agrippa the younger, also king of the Jews. She was first betrothed to Mark, son of Alexander Lysimachus, alabarch of Alexandria; but afterwards she married Herod, king of Chalcis, her own uncle, by the father's side. After the death of Herod, she proposed to Polemon, king of Pontus and part of Cilicia, that if he would be circumcised she would marry him. Polemon complied, but Berenice did not continue long with him. She returned to her brother Agrippa, with whom she lived in such a manner as to excite scandal. She was present with him, and heard the discourse of Paul before Festus, at Casarea of Palestine, Acts 25: 23.—Calmet.

BEROSUS, the Babylonist historian, was, by nation, a Chaldean; and by office, a priest of Belus. Taitan says, he lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and dedicated his work to king Antiochus, the third after Alexander, that is, Antiochus Theos, or perhaps, Antiochus Soter; for the many years between Alexander and Antiochus Theos (some reckoning sixty-four from the death of Alexander to the first year of Antiochus Theos) might induce us to prefer this sense. Berosus, having learned Greek, went first to the isle of Cos, where he taught astronomy and astrology; and afterwards to Athens, where he acquired so much reputation by his astrological predictions, that in the gymnasium, where the youth performed their exercises, a statue, with a golden tongue, was erected to him. Josephus and Eusebius have preserved some valuable fragments of Berosus's history, which greatly elucidate many places in the Old Testament; and without which, it would be difficult to produce an exact series of the kings of Babylon.—Calmet.

BERQUIN, (ARNOLD,) an elegant, pious, and amiable writer, who devoted his pen to the instruction of youth, was born at Bordeaux, in 1749, and died at Paris, in 1791. His works, consisting of Idylls; the Children's Friend; the Youth's Friend; the Little Grandson; the Family Book; and several similar productions, form twenty volumes. The Children's Friend is, in part, imitated from the German of Weiss.—Davenport.

BERSMAN, (GEORGE;) a very eminent classical author, professor of poetry and Greek in the universities of Wittenberg and Leipsic, and well versed in various other departments of science and literature. Born 1539, died 1611, aged seventy-two. In his last sickness he manifested great humility and prayerfulness, and delighted in repeating the words of Job, I know that my Redeemer liveth: and also of John, God so loved the world, &c. And that of the apostle, No one of us liveth to himself; together with the 42d, 51st, and 90th psalms; also the German hymn from the words of the proto-martyr Stephen, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. And thus, at length, placidly, and without any discomposed gesture or motion, like one beginning to fall asleep, he restored his happy spirit to God.—Clissold.

BERTHA; daughter of Charibert, king of France, and wife of Ethelbert, king of Kent, during the heptarchy in England. Ethelbert was one of the wisest and most powerful of the Saxon princes, but a pagan. It was expressly stipulated on the marriage, that Bertha, who was a Christian, should profess her own religion unmolested. Listening to the doctrines of her faith, Ethelbert became a convert to it in 597.—Betham.

BERTRAM, or RATRAM, monk of Corby in France; a celebrated writer in the ninth century, who deserves the first rank among those that reituted the doctrine of Radbert concerning the real presence of Christ in the eucharist. He defended the Latin church against Photius, the hymn Trino Deitas against Hincmar, and the doctrine of Godeschalus concerning predestination.—Masheim.

BERYL; a pellucid gem of a bluish green color, whence it is called by the lapidaries, aqua marina. Its Hebrew name is a word also for the same reason given to the sea, Psalm 48: 7. It is found in the East Indies, Peru, Siberia, and Tartary. It has a brilliant appearance, and is generally transparent. It was the tenth stone belonging to the high-priest's pectoral, Exod. 28: 10, 20. Rev. 21: 20.—Watson.

BERYLLIANS; so called from one Beryllus, a learned Arabian bishop, in the third century. He taught, that Christ did not exist before Mary; but that a Spirit from God himself, a portion of the divine nature, was united to him at his birth. His sentiments, therefore, nearly corresponded with those of the modern Socinians, which see. He is said, however, to have yielded to the arguments of Origen, and to have returned to the bosom of the Christian church.—Mosheim.

BESET; to surround as an army. Judg. 19: 20. God besets men behind and before; he exactly knows, upholds, and governs them, that they can go nowhere but as he permits, and where they are surrounded with his presence. Ps. 139: 5. Men's sinful doings beset them, when they appear charged on them, and with mighty force entangle them in their deserved punishment, Hos. 7: 2. The sin that easily besets men is the sin of their nature and temperament, or their predominant lust, which, being deep rooted in their heart and affections, and connected with their outward circumstances in life, readily, and without much opposition, instigates, and, as it were, shuts them up to the commission of wicked acts. Heb. 12: 1.—Brown.

BESOM; an instrument to sweep with. God's judgments are called a besom of destruction; they make a great stir and confusion; they often cut off multitudes, and with ease sweep them into trouble, the danghll of contempt, or pit of endless misery. Isa. 14: 23.—Brown.

BESOR, or BOSOR; a brook which falls into the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Rhinocorura; or between Rhinocorura and Egypt. This is "the brook of the wilderness," (Amos 6: 14), or the river of Egypt, mentioned in Scripture, Josh. 15: 4—17. 2 Chron. 7: 8.—Calmet.

BETHABARA, beyond Jordan, where John baptized, (John 1: 28.) was the common ford of the river, and probably the same as Beth-barah, Judg. 7: 24.—Calmet.

BETHANY; (John 11: 18.) a village, distant about two miles east from Jerusalem, at the ascent of the mount of Olives, and on the way to Jericho. Here Martha and Mary dwelt, with their brother Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead; and here Mary poured perfume on our Savior's head.—Calmet.

BETH-AVEN; the same with Bethel. On the revolt of the ten tribes, this city belonged to the kingdom of Israel, and was consequently one of the places in which Jeroboam instituted the worship of his golden calves. It seems to have been in allusion to this that the prophet Hosea, in derision, calls it Beth-aven, that is, "the house of vanity, or of idols," chapter 4: 15, instead of Bethel, that is, "the house of God," the name which Jacob formerly gave it, when favored with the vision of the mysterious ladder, on which angels ascended and descended from heaven. Gen. 28.—Jones.

BETHEL; a city west of Hai, on the confines of the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin, (Gen. 12: 8. 28: 10,) and occupying the spot where Jacob slept, and had his memorable dream. See Jacob. Eusebius places Bethel twelve miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Sichem, or Napolose. Bethel was also called Bethaven, and probably is the Eli-oun of Sanchoniatho. See BETH-AVEN.—Calmet.

BETHER. There is mention made of the mountains of Bether, in the Song of Solomon, ch. 2: 17, and 5: 14. It does not seem to be altogether agreed among the learned, what is intended by the mountains of Bether; but the prevailing opinion is, that Betheron is intended, which in Eusebius is called Bether, and Bethara in Josephus. There is frequent mention of Bether in the Jewish writings. It was frequent by the emperor Adrian, during the rebellion of Barchochebas, in the third century. "The number of Jews inclosed in it was so great," says the Gemara, "that the blood which ran from the dead bodies into the sea, carried stones along with it as large as a bushel, and that it ran four miles into the sea." Several are of opinion that the place here alluded to, is the same with Betheron, which lay in the territories of the tribe of Ephraim.—Jones.

BETHESDA. This word signifies the house of mercy, and was the name of a pool, or public bath, at Jerusalem, which had five porticos, piazzas, or covered walks around it. John 5: 2—4. This bath was called Bethesda, because, as some observe, the erecting of baths was an act of great kindness to the common people, whose infirmities in hot countries required frequent bathing; but the generality of expositors think it had this name rather from the great goodness of God manifested to his people, in bestowing healing virtues upon its waters. The word kolumbethra, which in that passage is translated pool, signifies a reservoir of water, deep enough in which to allow a person to swim. There were two pools of that description formerly. Compare 2 Kings 18: 17, with Neh. 3: 15. It was at the latter of these pools that Jesus directed the blind man to wash for the recovery of his sight. John 9: 7. The five porches mentioned by the evangelist, John 5: 2—4, are supposed to have been five apartments for the accommodation of the multitude that came to the pool to be cured of their bodily diseases. Mr. Maundrell says, that when he was at Jerusalem, he saw what was supposed to have been the pool of Bethesda, on the one side adjacent to St. Stephen's gate, and on the other to the area of the temple, in Jerusalem, near the mount on which the temple stood; one of them was called "the Upper Pool," and the other "the Pool of Siloam," which was near the king's garden. "It is," says he, "an hundred and twenty paces long, forty broad, and at least eight deep. At its west end it discovers some old arches, which are now dammed up." Maundrell, ubi supra, pp. 107, 108. "In these porches," says the evangelist, "lay a great number of impotent people, blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water. For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water; whosoever then first, after the troubling of the water, stepped in, was made whole of whatsoever disease he had," John 5: 2—4. Whether the miracles performed at the pool of Bethesda, were confined to the season of the particular feast mentioned in the first verse of the chapter, as the words "at a certain season" seem to imply, or whether that expression may be taken in a more enlarged sense to signify that the water had its healing quality at other Jewish festivals, cannot now be ascertained. That it did not possess these properties at all times, but only when an angel went down and agitated the water, is clear from the words of the evangelist. The agitation of the water; its suddenly healing virtue as to all diseases; and the limitation to the first that should go in, are all miraculous circumstances. Commentators have, however, resorted to various hypotheses to account for the whole without divine agency. Dr. Hammond, Michaelis, Kuinoel, and others, suppose it received medicinal properties from the warm blood of the temple sacrifices; Mead, from metallic salts at the bottom; Mr. Taylor, from a cold spring which flowed only at particular seasons. Doddridge combines the common hypothesis with that of Mead; namely, that the water had at all times more or less of a medicinal property; but at some period, not far distant from that in which the transaction here recorded took place, it was endued with a miraculous power; an extraordinary commotion being probably observed in the water, and Providence so ordering it, that the next person who accidentally bathed here, being under some great disorder, found an immediate and unexpected cure: the like phenomenon in some other desperate case, was probably observed on a second commotion: and these commotions and cures might happen periodically.

All those hypotheses, however, which exclude miracle in this case, are very unsatisfactory, nor is there any reason whatever to resort to them; for, when rightly viewed, there appears a mercy and a wisdom in this miracle, which must strike every one who attentively considers the account, unless he be a determined unbeliever in miraculous interposition. For, 1. The miracle occurred kata kaiiron, from time to time, that is, occasionally, perhaps frequently. 2. Though but one at a time was healed, yet, as this might often occur, a singularly gracious provision was made for the relief of the sick inhabitants of Jerusalem in desperate cases. 3. The angel probably acted invisibly, but the commotion in the waters was so strong and peculiar as to mark a supernatural agent. 4. There is great probability in what Doddridge, following Tertullian, supposes, that the waters obtained their healing property not long before the ministry of Christ, and lost it after his rejection and crucifixion by the Jews. In this case, a connexion was established between the healing virtue of the pool and the presence of Christ on earth, indicating Him to be the source of this benefit, and the true agent in conferring it; and thus it became, afterwards at least, a confirmation of his mission. 5. The whole might also be emblematical, "intended," says Macknight, "to show that Ezekiel's vision of waters issuing out of the sanctuary was about to be fulfilled, of which waters it is said, They shall be healed, and every thing shall live where the river cometh." It cannot be objected that this was not an age of miracles; and if miracles be allowed, we see in this particular supernatural visitation, obvious reasons of fitness, as well as a divine compassion. If, however, the ends to be accomplished by so public and notable a miraculous interposition were less obvious, still we must admit the fact, or either force absurd interpretations upon the text, or make the evangelist carelessly give his sanction to an instance of vulgar credulity and superstition.—Watson; Calmet; Jones.

BETHESDA, TO LIE AT THE POOL of; a gross accommodation of a simple historical fact, in which some preachers indulge when urging sinners not to despair of salvation. There is reason to fear that multitudes have, by this abuse of Scripture, been deluded to their eternal ruin.

In Germany, the formula is used proverbially in speaking of theological candidates who are waiting for a living.—Henderson's Buck.

BETH-EZEL; a place mentioned, Mic. 1: 11, which Grotius supposes to be Beth-el, called here by another name, importing "The house of separation," because it was the principal seat of idolatrous worship.—Calmet.

BETH-HACCEREM; the name of a city situated on an eminence between Jerusalem and Tekoah. Jer. 6: 1. Malchiah, the son of Rechab, was prince of Beth-haccerem. Neh. 3: 14.—Jones.

BETH-HOGLA. There were two places of this name in Palestine, one in the tribe of Judah, Josh. 15: 6, which Eusebius fixes at the distance of eight miles from Gaza; the other, Josh. 17: 21, Jerome places at the distance of two miles from Jordan, and says it belonged to the tribe of Benjamin.—Jones.

BETH-HORON. The Scripture mentions two cities of this name; for it is said, 1 Chron. 7: 24, that Sherah, a female of the tribe of Ephraim, "built Beth-horon, the nether and the upper." But though they both lay within the bounds of the tribe of Ephraim, it is not certain in what part of the tribe each lay. It is plain from the narrative, that one of them at least was situated on an eminence; for when Gibeon smote the Canaanites, the latter are described as going up to Beth-horon, Josh. 10: 10. But from Beth-horon to Azekah, the way lay down hill on the other side; hence it is added, that "as the Canaanites were in the going down (of the hill) of Beth-horon, the Lord cast down great stones upon them, unto Azekah," verse 11.—Wells's Geography, vol. i. 310; Jones.

BETH-JESHIMOTH; a city in the tribe of Reuben, Josh. 13: 20, afterwards possessed by the Moabites. Ezekiel foretold the destruction of this and other cities of Moab, chapter 25: 9. Eusebius places it ten miles from the river Jordan.—Jones.

BETHLEHEM; a city in the tribe of Judah, Judg. 17: 7; and likewise called Ephrath, Gen. 48: 7; or Ephratah, Mic. 5: 2; and the inhabitants of it, Ephrathites, Ruth 1: 2. 1 Sam. 17: 12. Here David was born, and spent his early years as a shepherd. And here also the scene of the beautiful narrative of Ruth is supposed to be laid. But its highest honor is, that here our divine Lord condescended to be born of woman:—"And thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me, that is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting." Travellers describe the first view of Bethlehem as imposing. The town appears covering the ridge of a hill on the southern side of a deep and extensive valley, and reaching from east to west. The most conspicuous object is the monastery erected over the supposed "Cave of the Nativity;" its walls and battlements have the air of a large fortress. From this same point, the Dead sea is seen below on the left, seemingly very near, "but," says Sandys, "not so found by the traveller; for these high, declining mountains are not to be directly descended." The road winds round the top of a valley, which tradition has fixed on as the scene of the angelic vision which announced the birth of our Lord to the shepherds; but different spots have been selected, the Romish authorities not being agreed on this head. Bethlehem (called in the New Testament Ephrath and Ephrata and Zebulon) is situated on a rising ground, about two hours' distance, or not quite six miles from Jerusalem. Here the traveller meets with a repetition of the same puerilities and disgusting mummerly which he has witnessed at the church of the sepulchre. "The stable," to use the words of Pococke, "in which our Lord was born, is a gratto cut out of the rock, according to the eastern custom." It is astonishing to find so intelligent a writer as Dr. E. D. Clarke gravely citing Jerome, who wrote in the fifth century, as an authority for the truth of the absurd legend by which the cave of the nativity is supposed to be identified. The ancient tombs and excavations are occasionally used by the Arabs as places of shelter; but the gospel narrative affords no countenance to the notion that the Virgin took refuge in any cave of this description. On the contrary, it was evidently a manger belonging to the inn or khan: in other words, the upper rooms being wholly occupied, the holy family were compelled to take up their abode in the court allotted to the mules and horses, or other animals. But the New Testament was not the guide which was followed by the mother of Constantine, to whom the original church owed its foundation. The present edifice is represented by Chateaubriand as of undoubtedly high antiquity; yet Doubdan, an old traveller, says that the monastery was destroyed in the year 1263 by the Moslems; and in its present state, at all events, it cannot lay claim to a higher date. The convent is divided among the Greek, Roman, and Armenian Christians, to each of whom separate parts are assigned as places of worship and habitations for the monks; but, on certain days, all may perform their devotions at the altars erected over the consecrated spots. The church is built in the form of a cross; the nave being adorned with forty-eight Corinthian columns in four rows, each column being two feet six inches in diameter, and eighteen feet high, including the base and the capital. The nave, which is in possession of the Armenians, is separated from the three other branches of the cross by a wall, so that the unity of the edifice is destroyed. The top of the cross is occupied by the choir, which belongs to the Greeks. Here is an altar dedicated to the wise men of the east, at the foot of which is a marble star, corresponding, as the monks say, to the point of the heavens where the miraculous meteor became stationary, and directly over the spot where the Savior was born in the subterranean church below! A flight of fifteen steps, and a long narrow passage, conduct to the sacred crypt or grotto of the nativity, which is thirty-seven feet six inches long, by eleven feet three inches in breadth, and nine feet high. It is lined and floored with marble, and provided on each side with five oratories, "answering precisely to the ten cribs or stalls for horses that the stable in which our Savior was born contained!" The precise spot of the birth is marked by a glory in the floor, composed of marble and jasper encircled with silver, around which are inscribed the words, Hic de Virgine Mariâ Jesus Christus natus est. Over it is a marble table or altar, which rests against the side of the rock, here cut into an arcade. The manger is at the distance of seven paces from the altar; it is in a low recess hewn out of the rock, to which you descend by two steps, and consists of a block of marble, raised about a foot and a half above the floor, and hollowed out in the form of a manger. Before it is the altar of the Magi. The chapel is illuminated by thirty-two lamps, presented by different princes of Christendom. Chateaubriand has described the scene in his usual florid and imaginative style: "Nothing can be more pleasing, or better calculated to excite devotional sentiments, than this subterranean church. It is adorned with pictures of the Italian and Spanish schools, which represent the mysteries of the place. The usual ornaments of the manger are of blue satin, embroidered with silver. Incense is continually burning before the cradle of our Savior. I have heard an organ, touched by no ordinary hand, play, during mass, the sweetest and most tender tunes of the best Italian composers. These concerts charm the Christian Arab, who, leaving his camels to feed, repairs, like the shepherds of old, to Bethlehem, to adore the King of kings in the manger. I have seen this inhabitant of the desert communicate at the altar of the Magi, with a fervor, a piety, a devotion, unknown among the Christians of the West. The continual arrival of caravans from all the nations of Christendom; the public prayers; the prostrations; nay, even the richness of the presents sent here by the Christian princes, altogether produce feelings in the soul, which it is much easier to conceive than to describe."

Such are the illusions which the Roman superstition casts over this extraordinary scene! In another subterraneous chapel, tradition places the sepulchre of the Innocents. From this, the pilgrim is conducted to the grotto of St. Jerome, where they show the tomb of that father, who passed great part of his life in this place; and who, in the grotto shown as his oratory, is said to have translated that version of the Bible which has been adopted by the church of Rome, and is called the Vulgate. He died at the advanced age of ninety-one, A. D. 422. The village of Bethlehem contains about three hundred inhabitants, the greater part of whom gain their livelihood by making beads, carving mother-of-pearl shells with sacred subjects, and manufacturing small tables and crucifixes, all which are eagerly purchased by the pilgrims.

Bethlehem has been visited by many modern travellers. The following notice of it by Dr. E. D. Clarke will be read with interest: "After travelling for about an hour from the time of our leaving Jerusalem, we came in view of Bethlehem, and halted to enjoy the interesting sight. The town appeared covering the ridge of a hill, on the southern side of a deep and extensive valley, and reaching from east to west; the most conspicuous object being the monastery, erected over the cave of the nativity, in the suburbs, and upon the eastern side. The battlements and walls of this building seemed like those of a vast fortress. The Dead sea below, upon our left, appeared so near to us that we thought we could have rode thither in a very short space of time. Still nearer stood a mountain upon its western shore, resembling in its form the cone of Vesuvius near Naples, and having also a crater upon its top, which was plainly discernible. The distance, however, is much greater than it appears to be; and the magnitude of the objects beheld in this fine prospect causing them to appear less remote than they really are. The atmosphere was remarkably clear and serene; but we saw none of those clouds of smoke, which, by some writers, are said to exhale from the surface of the lake, nor from any neighboring mountain. Every thing about it was in the highest degree grand and awful. Bethlehem is six miles from Jerusalem. Josephus describes the interval between the two cities as equal only to twenty stadia; and in the passage referred to, he makes an allusion to a celebrated well, which, both from the account given by him of its situation, and more especially from the text of the sacred Scriptures, 2 Sam. 23: 15, seems to have contained the identical fountain, of whose pure and delicious water we were now drinking. Considered merely in point of interest, the sacred narrative is not likely to be surpassed by any circumstance of pagan history. The well still retains its pristine renown; and many an expatriated Bethlehemite has made it the theme of his longing and regret."—Watson.

BETHLEHEMITES; a sect, also called Star-bearers, because they were distinguished by a red star having five rays, which they wore on their breast, in memory of the star which appeared to the wise men. Several authors have mentioned this order, but none of them have told us their origin, nor where their convents were situated; if we except Matthew Paris, who says that, in 1257, they obtained a settlement in England, which was at Cambridge, in Trumpington street.

There still exists, in the Spanish West Indies, an order of Bethlehemites, who are habited like capuchins, except that they wear a leathern girdle instead of a cord, and on their right side an escutcheon representing the nativity of Christ.—Hend. Buck.

BETHPHAGE; so called from its producing figs; a small village situated in mount Olivet, and, as it seems, somewhat nearer Jerusalem than Bethany. Jesus being come from Bethany to Bethphage, commanded his disciples to seek out an ass for him that he might ride, in his triumphant entrance into Jerusalem, Matt. 21: 1, &c. The distance between Bethphage and Jerusalem is about fifteen furlongs.—Watson.

BETHUNE, (Divie), an eminent philanthropist and Christian, was born at Dingwall, Rosshire, Scotland, in 1771. In early life he resided at Tobago, where his only brother was a physician. At the command of his pious mother, he left the irreligious island and removed to the United States, in 1792, and settled as a merchant in New York. He soon joined the church of Dr. Mason; in 1802, became one of its elders. He died, September 18, 1824. His wife was the daughter of Isabella Graham. Before a tract society was formed in this country, Mr. Bethune printed ten thousand tracts at his own expense, and himself distributed many of them. He also imported Bibles for distribution. From 1803 to 1816, he was at the sole expense of one or more Sunday schools. The tenth of his gains he devoted to the service of his heavenly Master. In his last sickness, he said, "I wish my friends to help me through the valley by reading to me the word of God. I have not read much lately but the Bible: the Bible! the Bible! I want nothing but the Bible! O, the light, that has shined into my soul through the Bible!" His end was peace. Such a benefactor of the human family is incomparably more worthy of remembrance, than the selfish philosophers and the great warriors of the earth.—Allen; N. Y. Observer; B. Recorder, Oct. 16.

BETHSAIDA; a city, whose name in Hebrew imports a place of fishing or of hunting, and for both of these exercises it was well situated. As it belonged to the tribe of Naphtali, it was in a country remarkable for plenty of deer; and as it lay on the north end of the lake Genesareth, just where the river Jordan runs into it, it became the residence of fishermen. Three of the apostles, Philip, Andrew, and Peter, were born in this city. It is not mentioned in the Old Testament, though it frequently occurs in the New: the reason is, that it was but a village, as Josephus tells us, till Philip the tetrarch enlarged it, making it a magnificent city, and gave it the name of Julias, out of respect to Julia, the daughter of Augustus Cæsar.

The evangelists speak of Bethsaida; and yet it then possessed that name no longer: it was enlarged and beautified nearly at the same time as Cæsarea, and called Julias. Thus it was called in the days of our Lord, and so would the sacred historians have been accustomed to call it. But if they knew nothing of this, what shall we say of their age? In other respects, they evince the most accurate knowledge of the circumstances of the time. The solution is, that, though Philip had exalted it to the rank of a city, to which he gave the name of Julias, yet, not long afterwards, this Julia, in whose honor this city received its name, was banished from the country by her own father. The deeply-wounded honor of Augustus was even anxious that the world might forget that she was his daughter. Tiberius, whose wife she had been, consigned the unfortunate princess, after the death of Augustus, to the most abject poverty, under which she sank without assistance. Thus adulation must under two reigns have suppressed a name, from which otherwise the city might have wished to derive benefit to itself; and for some time it was called by its ancient name, Bethsaida, instead of Julias. At a later period, this name again came into circulation, and appears in the catalogue of Jewish cities by Pliny. By such incidents, which are so easily overlooked, and the knowledge of which is afterwards lost, do those who are really acquainted with an age disclose their authenticity. "But it is strange," some one will say, "that John reckons this Bethsaida, or Julias, where he was born, in Galilee, John 12: 21. Should he not know to which province his birth-place belonged?" Philip only governed the eastern districts by the sea of Tiberias; but Galilee was the portion of his brother Antipas. Bethsaida or Julias could therefore not have been built by Philip, as the case is; or it did not belong to Galilee, as John alleges. In fact, such an error were sufficient to prove, that this gospel was not written by John. Julias, however, was situated in Gaulonitis, which district was, for deep political reasons, divided from Galilee; but the ordinary language of the time asserted its own opinion, and still reckoned the Gaulonitis province in Galilee. When, therefore, John does the same, he proves, that the peculiarity of those days was not unknown to him; for he expresses himself after the ordinary manner of the period. Thus Josephus informs us of Judas the Gaulonite from Gamala, and also calls him in the following chapters, the Galilean; and then in another work he applies the same expression to him; from whence we may be convinced that the custom of those days paid respect to a more ancient division of the country, and bade defiance, in the present case, to the then existing political geography. Is it possible that historians who, as it is evident from such examples, discover throughout so nice a knowledge of geographical arrangements and local and even temporary circumstances, should have written at a time when the theatre of events was unknown to them, when not only their native country was destroyed, but their nation scattered, and the national existence of the Jews extinguished and extirpated? On the contrary, all this is in proof that they wrote at the very period which they profess, and it also proves the usual antiquity assigned to the gospels.—Watson.

BETHSHAN; a city belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the west of Jordan, and not far from the river. It was a considerable city in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, and was then, as it had been for several ages before, called Scythopolis, or the city of the Scythians, from some remarkable occurrence when the Scythians made an irruption into Syria. It is said to be six hundred furlongs from Jerusalem. 2 Macc. 12: 29. After the battle of mount Gilboa, the Philistines took the body of Saul, and hung it against the wall of Bethshan, 1 Sam. 31: 10. Bethshan is now called Bysan, and is described by Burckhardt as situated on rising ground on the west of the Ghor, or valley of Jordan.—Watson.

BETHSHEMESH, house of the sun; a city of the tribe of Judah, belonging to the priests, Josh. 21: 16. It was thirty miles north-west of Jerusalem. The Philistines having sent back the ark of the Lord, it was brought to Bethshemesh, 1 Sam. 6: 12, where some of the people out of curiosity having looked into it, the Lord smote seventy of the principal men belonging to the city, and fifty thousand of the common people, verse 19. It is here to be observed that it was solemnly enjoined, Numb. 4: 20, that not only the common people, but that even the Levites themselves should not dare look into the ark, upon pain of death. "It is a fearful thing," says bishop Hall, "to use the holy ordinances of God with an irreverent boldness; fear and trembling become us in our access to the majesty of the Almighty."—Watson.

BETH-SHITTAH; a place south-west of the sea of Tiberias, to which Gideon pursued Midian, Judg. 7: 22.—Calmet.

BETH-TAPPUAH; a city of Judah, (Josh. 15: 53,) which Eusebius says is the last city of Palestine, in the way to Egypt, fourteen miles from Raphia.—Calmet.

BETHUEL, son of Nahor and Milcah, was Abraham's nephew, and father of Laban, and of Rebecca, Isaac's wife. Bethuel does not appear in the affair of Rebecca's marriage, but Laban only, Gen. 24: 50. See LABAN.—Calmet.

BETHUL, or BETHUEL; a city of Simeon, (Josh. 19: 4. 1 Chron. 4: 30,) the same, probably, as Bethelia, which Sozomen speaks of, as a town belonging to the inhabitants of Gaza, well peopled, and having several temples remarkable for their structure and antiquity; particularly a pantheon, (or temple dedicated to all the gods,) situated on an eminence made of earth, brought thither for the purpose, which commanded the whole city. He conjectures that it was named Bethelia, which signifies the house of God, by reason of this temple.—Calmet.

BETH-ZUR; a city of Judah, (Josh. 15: 58,) which was fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. 11: 7. Lysias, regent of Syria under young Antiochus, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, besieged Bethzur with an army of sixty thousand foot and five thousand horse; but Judas Maccabæus coming to succor the place, Lysias was obliged to raise the siege, 1 Macc. 4: 28. 6: 7. Judas put his army to flight, and afterwards, making the best use of the arms and booty found in the enemy's camp, the Jews became stronger and more formidable than they had heretofore been. Bethzur lay opposite to South Edom, and defended the passages into Judea from thence. We read, 2 Macc. 11: 5, that Bethzur was five furlongs from Jerusalem; but this is evidently a mistake. Eusebius places it twenty miles from that city, toward Hebron, and Dr. Pococke speaks of a village on a hill hereabouts, called Bethsaon.—Calmet.

BETROTHMENT; a mutual promise or compact between two parties for a future marriage. The word imports as much as giving one's troth; that is, true faith, or promise. Among the ancient Jews, the betrothing was performed either by a writing, or by a piece of silver given to the bride. After the marriage was contracted, the young people had the liberty of seeing each other, which was not allowed them before. If, after the betrothing, the bride should trespass against that fidelity she owed to her bridegroom, she was treated as an adulteress. See MARRIAGE.

God betroths or espouses his people to himself, when he leads them by faith into union with the Lord Jesus Christ, forming with him a relation so close, tender and sacred, that they enjoy a saving interest in his person, righteousness, grace, and glory, and he and they may rejoice in one another. He betroths them forever, by an everlasting covenant, that neither time, sin, nor any thing else can disannul; and in righteousness, consistently with his essential righteousness, and clothed with his imputed righteousness; and in judgment, with great wisdom and prudence; and in faithfulness, in fulfilment of his covenant and promise, and sincerely determined to fulfil the marriage trust towards them; and in loving-kindness and mercies to their persons, so base, wretched, guilty, vile, and rebellious. Song: 3: 11. Hos. 2: 19, 20. Of this, ministers, by the preaching of the Gospel, are means and instruments. 2 Cor. 11: 2.—Watson; Bronn.

BETTER. On the definite understanding of this little word, as used in Scripture, depends much of our right conception, both of the superior excellence of spiritual to providential blessings, and of the Christian dispensation to the patriarchal and Mosaic which preceded it. In both cases, we are to look upon the former as simply preparatory, the latter final and eternal. God's love is better than life, is more sweet, pleasant, profitable, sure, and honorable. Psalm 63: 3. Christ's love is better than wine; we cannot sinfully exceed in desire of, and delight in it: it is enjoyed without money and without price; it never loses its sweetness and virtue; our living on it by faith renders us active, holy, and zealous for God, content with our lot, happy in ourselves, and a comfort to all around us. Song 1: 2. His obedience and suffering are better sacrifices than the Jewish, in respect of matter, manner of oblation, efficacy, and fruit. Heb. 9: 23. His blood speaks better things than that of Abel: it purchases and procures full remission and eternal salvation to his enemies and murderers; whereas Abel's imprecated vengeance on his murderer. Heb. 12: 24. He, his fruit, word, and saving instruction, are better than gold, than rubies; are more valuable, delightful, useful, exalting, and durable. Prov. 8: 14—19. and 3: 14. Psalm 119: 72. His priesthood, and the promises of the Gospel, are a better hope, a more clear, honorable, and extensive ground of hope for all the blessings of time and eternity, than the Jewish sacrifices and shadows could be. Heb. 7: 19. The better covenant, established on better promises, is the covenant of grace, which, in respect of its party contracted with, its freedom, firmness, benefits conferred, honor and use, is far preferable to the covenant of works:—and is better than the national covenant made with the Hebrews at Sinai; it promises far more valuable blessings than the quiet possession of Canaan, and is more sure and permanent;—and the New Testament dispensation of it is far more spiritual, easy, clear, and extensive than the Old. Heb. 7: 22. and 8: 6. Our revelation is more plain, full and extensive: our ordinances are more clear, spiritual, and easy: we have the substance of their ceremonies with infinite advantage, in Christ's birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension; have a more abundant and wide-spread effusion of the Holy Ghost, and a more eminent freedom from the impression of the broken law on our conscience. Heb. 11: 40.

A day in God's courts is better than a thousand elsewhere. Fellowship with him is infinitely more delightful, profitable and honorable than any earthly advantage. Ps. 84: 10. A little that a righteous man hath, his dinner of herbs, or dry morsel, is better than the wealth or delicate provision of the wicked. It springs from God's redeeming love, is blessed of him, is a pledge of glory, and a means of drawing the affections and thoughts to God in Christ. Ps. 37: 16. Prov. 15: 16, 17, and 16: 8, and 17: 1. The saints' resurrection is better, more glorious and happy than a recovery from a state of affliction; or a miraculous restoration to natural life; or the resurrection of the wicked to everlasting damnation. Heb. 11: 35. Heaven is a better country; its inhabitants, exercises, and enjoyments are far more holy, honored, and happy than those on earth: and to be with Christ is far better than to be with saints and ordinances on earth; as one is freed from every stain of sin, every temptation and trouble, and clearly sees, and fully delights in God as his all in all. Heb. 11: 16. Phil. 1: 23.

BEULAH, married; a name given to the Jewish church, importing its marriage with God, as his husband and sovereign Lord, Isa. 62: 4.—Calmet.

BEVERIDGE, (WILLIAM, D. D.) bishop of St. Asaph, was born at Barrow, in Leicestershire, in the year 1638. He was distinguished, when young, for his seriousness and intelligence; and when only of the age of fifteen, was sent to St. John's college, Cambridge. There his industry, his knowledge, and his rapid improvement surprised and delighted his tutors; and when only eighteen, he took his degree of bachelor of arts. His incessant application to the study of the learned languages, and of oriental learning, had been so astonishing, that at that time he wrote "A Treatise on the Excellency and Use of the Oriental Tongues;" and at the age of twenty, he published a Syriac Grammar, both of which works demonstrated him to be a scholar of no ordinary powers. Nor was he less distinguished for his moral than his mental qualifications. He was serious, pious, and exemplary in all his transactions with men, and in all the connexions of life. At the age of twenty-two, the seclusion and classic pursuits of the college he exchanged for the duties of a clergyman. In 1660, he was ordained deacon in the church of St. Botolph, Aldersgate: afterwards, in the same month, a priest; and Dr. Sheldon, then bishop of London, immediately collated him to the vicarage of Yealing in Middlesex. At that time he was engaged in writing an interesting work, afterwards published, and entitled "Private Thoughts upon Religion, digested into Twelve Articles, with Practical Resolutions founded thereon." To the performance of his clerical duties at Yealing he was conscientiously attentive, and gained the esteem of his parishioners. In 1669, he published his celebrated work on chronology, to the study of which it is a good introduction. In 1672, he was chosen, by the mayor and aldermen of London, rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill; and persuaded that, connected with such appointment, many and arduous duties would be imposed on him, he conscientiously resigned the vicarage of Yealing. In the same year he presented to the world an elaborate and most valuable work—A Collection of all the Apostolical Canons, consisting of those attributed to the Apostles; of the Councils of Nice, Ephesus, Constantinople, Chalcedon, Trullo, Carthage, Ancyra, Neocesarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea; the Arguments and Arabic Paraphrases of Joseph the Egyptian, on the Canons of the Four General Councils; the Canons of Dionysius Alexandrinus, Petrus, St. Athanasius, St. Basil, Theophilus, Archbishop of Alexandria; the Catholic Epistles of Cyril; with a variety of other Letters; and an Alphabetical Index of the Contents of all the Canons and various Synods; to all of which interesting and important documents he subjoined learned and voluminous notes. His time, though thus occupied, was not however wholly engaged by the acquisition or communication of sacred learning. He applied himself with the utmost zeal and industry to the discharge of the duties of his ministry. His discourses were instructive and serious, his private exhortations warm and affectionate; his attendance at the church, and to all his pastoral functions, was regular and uniform; and his labors were crowned with such eminent success, that he was then called "The great Reviver and Restorer of Primitive Piety." In 1704, he accepted the see of St. Asaph, vacant by the translation of Dr. George Hooper to Bath and Wells. Thus placed in a station far more eminent, his care and diligence increased in proportion as his power in the church became enlarged. His labors in his study were most important. He wrote an admirable work—"Private Thoughts upon a Christian Life; or, Necessary Directions for its Beginning and Progress upon Earth, in order to its Final Perfection in the Beatific Vision." Also a treatise, which has been repeatedly published, and as repeatedly admired, called "The Great Necessity and Advantage of Public Prayer and frequent Communion; designed to revive Primitive Piety; with Meditations, Ejaculations, and Prayers before, at, and after the Sacrament." In addition to the works which, in this sketch of his life, have been enumerated, he composed—1. "Thesaurus Theologicus, or a Complete System of Divinity, summed up in brief Notes upon select Places of the Old and New Testament, &c."—2. "A Defence of the Book of Psalms, collected into English Metre by Sternhold and Hopkins, with Critical Observations on the New Version compared with the Old."—And 3. "An Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles;" on which many strictures have been wisely and justly made.

Bishop Beveridge was a person of sincere piety, of strict integrity, and of great zeal for religion. It was said of him, when living, and, though long since dead, it may be repeated, that "he was one of the greatest and best men that England ever bred." He was never married, and had but few relations. But to them he was invariably kind and affectionate; and thus distinguished himself in all his relations of life, and connexions with men. At length, at the age of seventy-one, full of grace and good works, he died, March 5, 1708, at his lodgings in the Cloisters, in Westminster abbey, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. To the societies for the Propagation of the Gospel, and Promoting Christian Knowledge, he left the greatest part of his estates. For further account of this excellent man, see his Life and Works. BEWARE. To beware of Christ, is to have a due and holy awe of him on our spirit, and carefully guard against every thing tending to offend him. Ex. 23: 21. To beware of men, is to take heed lest they deceive us. Mark 12: 38. To beware of sin, is to avoid every appearance of it, and temptation to it; and to the utmost of our power watch against and oppose it. Matt. 16: 6.—Brown.

BEWITCH; wickedly to deceive and hurt, by juggling tricks and diabolic charms. Acts 8: 9. False teachers bewitch men, when by satanic methods of guileful reasoning, specious pretences to holiness or learning, apparent miracles, or proud boasting, they deceive their mind, and destroy their soul. Gal. 3: 1.—Brown.

BEYOND. To know the signification of beyond, on the other side, or, on this side, it is necessary to know where the sacred writer was at the time of writing. Thus, beyond or on the other side of Jordan, with Moses, who gave his finished books to the Hebrews eastward of Jordan, signifies the west side of that river; while such as lived or wrote on the west side of Jordan, call the east side beyond, or the other side. Deut. 3: 25, and 11: 30. Josh. 9: 10, and 13: 8. Some critics think the Hebrew word Hheber ought sometimes to be rendered on this side, as Josh. 12: 7. Deut. 1: 1, and perhaps Gen. 1: 10. Beyond measure, is exceedingly. Mark 6: 51. To go beyond and defraud, is to exceed the conditions of a bargain, and laws of honesty; or to transgress the rules of chastity and rites of marriage. 1 Thess. 4: 6.—Brown.

BEZA, or BEZE, (THEODORE,) one of the most eminent of the reformers, was born at Vezelai, in the Nivernois, in 1519, and was originally a Catholic, and intended for the law. At the age of twenty, he gained an unenviable reputation, by the composition of Latin poetry which was at once elegant and licentious, and which, some years afterwards, he published under the title of Juvenile Poems. Though not in orders, he possessed benefices of considerable value. These, however, he abandoned in 1548, and retired to Geneva, where he publicly abjured Popery. To this he was induced by his having meditated, during illness, upon the doctrines which he had heard from his Protestant tutor, Melchior Wolmar; and perhaps also, in some measure, by his attachment to a lady, whom he carried with him to Geneva, and married. He now accepted the Greek professorship at Lansanne, which he held for ten years. It was while he was thus occupied, that he produced his tragedy of Abraham's Sacrifice, his version of the New Testament, and his hateful defence of the right of the magistrate to punish heretics. In 1559, he removed to Geneva, and became the colleague of Calvin, through whom he was appointed rector of the academy, and theological professor. Two years after this, he took a prominent part in the conference at Poissy, and was present at the battle of Dreux. He returned to Geneva, in 1563, succeeded Calvin in his offices and influence, and was thenceforward considered as the head of the Calvinistic church. After an exceedingly active life, he died on the 13th of October, 1605. His theological works are numerous, but are now nearly forgotten.—Davenport.

BEZALEEL; a famous artificer, son of Uri, (Exod. 31: 2. 35: 30,) of whom it is said, that he was filled with the Spirit of God, to devise excellent works in gold, silver, and all other workmanship.—A remarkable testimony to the antiquity of the arts, to the esteem in which they were held, to the source whence they were understood to spring, and to the wisdom (by inspiration) of this artist.

BEZEK; a city where Saul reviewed his army, before he marched against Jabez-Gilead. 1 Sam. 11: 8. Eusebius says there were two cities of this name near one another, seven miles from Sichem, in the way to Scythopolis.—Calmet.

BEZPOFOFTSCHINS; a class of Russian dissenters, including all those which either have no regular priests, or who refuse to acknowledge those of the established church: they are the Duhoborts, Pomorjans, Theodosians, and some others.—Pinkerton's Greek Church, p. 305. (See RASKONNIKI).—Williams.

BIBLE; (biblia;) the name applied by Christians, by way of eminence, to the collection of sacred writings of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments.

I. BIBLE, History of.—It is thought that Ezra published the Scriptures in the Chaldee character; for, that language being generally used among the Jews, he thought proper to change the old Hebrew character for it, which hath since that time been retained only by the Samaritans, among whom it is preserved to this day. Pridaux is of opinion that Ezra made additions in several parts of the Bible, where anything appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing the work; in which he appears to have been assisted by the same Spirit in which they were first written. Among such additions are to be reckoned the last chapter of Deuteronomy, wherein Moses seems to give an account of his own death and burial, and the succession of Joshua after him. To the same cause our learned author thinks are to be attributed many other interpolations in the Bible, which created difficulties and objections to the authenticity of the sacred text, no ways to be solved without allowing them. Ezra changed the names of several places which were grown obsolete, and, instead of them, put their new names by which they were then called in the text. Thus it is that Abraham is said to have pursued the kings who carried Lot away captive as far as Dan; whereas that place in Moses' time was called Laish, the name Dan being unknown till the Danites, long after the death of Moses, possessed themselves of it. The Jewish canon of Scripture was then settled by Ezra, yet not so but that several variations have been made in it. Malachi, for instance, could not be put in the Bible by him, since that prophet is allowed to have lived after Ezra; nor could Nehemiah be there, since that book mentions, (chap. 12. v. 22.) Jaddua as high-priest, and Darius Codomanus as king of Persia, who were at least a hundred years later than Ezra. It may be added, that, in the first book of Chronicles, the genealogy of the sons of Zerubbabel is carried down for so many generations as must necessarily bring it to the time of Alexander; and consequently this book, or at least this part of it, could not be in the canon in Ezra's days. It is probable the two books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Malachi, were adopted into the Bible in the time of Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue.

II. BIBLE, ancient Divisions and Order of.—After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, Ezra collected as many copies as he could of the sacred writings, and out of them all prepared a correct edition, arranging the several books in their proper order. These books he divided into three parts: I. The law. II. The prophets. III. The Hagiographa, i. e. the holy writings. I. The law contains—1. Genesis; 2. Exodus; 3. Leviticus; 4. Numbers; 5. Deuteronomy. II. The writings of the prophets are—1. Joshua; 2. Judges, with Ruth; 3. Samuel; 4. Kings; 5. Isaiah; 6. Jeremiah, with his Lamentations; 7. Ezekiel; 8. Daniel; 9. The twelve minor prophets; 10. Job; 11. Ezra; 12. Nehemiah; 13. Esther. III. The Hagiographa consists of—1. The Psalms; 2. The Proverbs; 3. Ecclesiastes; 4. The Song of Solomon. This division was made for the sake of reducing the number of the sacred books to the number of the letters in their alphabet, which amount to twenty-two. Afterwards the Jews reckoned twenty-four books in their canon of Scripture; in disposing of which, the law stood as in the former division, and the prophets were distributed into former and latter: the former prophets are Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; the latter prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets; and the Hagiographa consists of the Psalms, the Proverbs, Job, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, the Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, the Chronicles. Under the name of Ezra they comprehend Nehemiah: this order hath not always been observed, but the variations from it are of no moment. The five books of the law are divided into fifty-four sections. This division many of the Jews hold to have been appointed by Moses himself; but others, with more probability, ascribe it to Ezra. The design of this division was, that one of these sections might be read in their synagogues every sabbath-day: the number was fifty-four, because, in their intercalated years, a month being then added, there were fifty-four sabbaths; in other years they reduced them to fifty-two, by twice joining together two short sections.

III. BIBLE, modern Divisions of.—The division of the Scriptures into chapters, as we at present have them, is of modern date. Some attribute it to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, in the reigns of John and Henry III.; but the true author of the invention was Hugo de Sancto Caro, commonly called Hugo Cardinalis, because he was the first Dominican that ever was raised to the degree of cardinal. This Hugo flourished about A. D. 1210: he wrote a comment on the Scriptures, and projected the first concordance, which is that of the vulgar Latin Bible. The aim of this work being for the more easy finding out any word or passage in the Scriptures, he found it necessary to divide the book into sections, and the sections into subdivisions; for till that time the vulgar Latin Bibles were without any division at all. These sections are the chapters into which the Bible hath ever since been divided; but the subdivision of the chapters was not then into verses, as it is now. Hugo's method of subdividing them was by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, placed in the margin, at an equal distance from each other, according to the length of the chapters. The subdivision of the chapters into verses, as they now stand in our Bibles, had its original from a famous Jewish rabbi, named Mordecai Nathan, about 1445. This rabbi, in imitation of Hugo Cardinalis, drew up a concordance to the Hebrew Bible, for the use of the Jews. But though he followed Hugo in his division of the books into chapters, he refined upon his inventions as to the subdivision, and contrived that by verses. This being found to be a much more convenient method, it has been ever since followed. And thus, as the Jews borrowed the division of the books of the holy Scriptures into chapters from the Christians, in like manner the Christians borrowed that of the chapters into verses from the Jews. The present order of the several books is almost the same (the Apocrypha excepted,) as that made by the council of Trent.

IV. BIBLE, MSS. of.—Notwithstanding the tendency of the art of printing to supersede, and even to occasion the total loss of written copies of the Scriptures, numerous apographs still exist, some of which are of great antiquity, and possess great authority in determining certain questions of biblical criticism. Others of great value are known to have existed till within a late period, and served, ere they disappeared, as exemplars from which others were taken.

1. Hebrew MSS.—These are either rolls designed for the use of the synagogue, or square manuscripts designed for private use. The former are all on parchment, and written with the greatest care and accuracy: the latter are either on vellum or paper, and are of various sizes. The characters vary in their appearance: the Spanish being perfectly square and elegant; the German crooked and rude; and the Italian holding a middle place between both. A family relationship has also been discovered between these three classes. The Spanish are held in great estimation among the Jews, on account of their having been corrected after the Codex of Hillel—a MS. of the highest antiquity. The German MSS. frequently vary from the Masoretic text, and are greatly valued by biblical critics. The Italian differ from both these classes, and form a separate family.

All the Hebrew manuscripts of note, known to be extant, were written, according to Dr. Kennicott, between the years 1000 and 1457—a circumstance which leads him to infer, as bishop Walton had done before him, that some measures had been adopted by the Jews for the general destruction of such as did not agree with the corrected or genuine copies. They have been collated by Kennicott and De Rossi, and amount in all to eleven hundred and nine. One of the most remarkable is the Codex Landianus, which contains not fewer than fourteen thousand variations from Vander Hooght's edition of the Hebrew Bible.

2. Samaritan MSS.—Of the Pentateuch, written in the Samaritan character, seventeen manuscripts are known to be extant: they are preserved in the Bodleian, the British Museum, and the libraries at Leyden, Paris, Milan, and Rome.

3. Greek MSS.—Of these, an immense number are still in existence; some of them containing the books both of the Old and New Testaments, and others only certain parts, divisions, or books. Some are written in uncial or capital letters, others in ursive or small letters; some without any division of words, in what is called scriptio continua; some on vellum or parchment, and others on paper. They are of various ages, from the fourth to the fifteenth century. Some of them are what is called rescripti, or transcribed on parchment which has since been used, the writing on which having been obliterated to give place for the more recent text. Some are bi-lingual, i. e. they exhibit, besides the Greek text, the Latin version in the opposite page or column.

[1.] Greek MSS. of the Old Testament.—The number of these extant has not yet been ascertained; but Dr. Holmes collated one hundred and thirty-five for his edition of the LXX. The principal, which are in uncial characters, are the Alexandrian, Vatican, Cottonian, Sarravian, Coislinian, Cæsarean, Ambrosian, Coislinian, Basiliano-Vatican, and Turinian.

[2.] Greek MSS. of the New Testament.—Nearly five hundred of these were either wholly or partially collated previous to the publication of the more recent critical editions of the New Testament: in the execution of which, Griesbach took a distinguished part, having collated for his own edition not fewer than three hundred and fifty-five; but Professor Scholz, who is now editing a critical edition, is said to have consulted six hundred manuscripts that were totally unknown to Griesbach. It has been customary, since the time of Bengel, to distinguish between certain families, recensions, or editions of the MSS., according to their supposed affinity or relationship; and various systems of affinity have been concerted by Bengel, Semler, Griesbach, Michaelis, Hupf. and Scholz. That of Griesbach, according to his system, classifies them into the Alexandrian, Occidental, and Byzantine, has been not unsuccessfully attacked by Matthæi, Dr. Laurence, and Mr. Nolan; while that of Hug has been greatly modified by the results brought out by the indefatigable researches of his pupil, Professor Scholz. Some of the principal uncial MSS. are the Alexandrian of the fourth century, now preserved in the British Museum; the Vatican, of the fifth; the Codex Bezae, or Cantabrigiensis, of the fifth; Ephremi, a rescript of the sixth or seventh; Clermont, of the seventh or eighth. For a full account of these, and most of the other MSS. see the Introductions of Michaelis and Horne.

V. PRINTED EDITIONS OF THE Hebrew and Greek Texts.—Since the invention of printing, nearly one hundred different editions of the Hebrew Bible have been issued from the press, and about three hundred and fifty editions of the Greek New Testament. It is of course impossible to describe all these editions in a work like the present; but the following list will be found to contain the more important:—

1. HEBREW BIBLE.—By a collation of the different editions of the Hebrew Bible, it has been ascertained that they admit of a distinct classification.

[1.] The Soncinnian Recension of 1488, the first printed Hebrew Bible.—The Pentateuch was reprinted from the Bologna edition of the same in 1482, and the other books were based on other earlier editions of the several parts of the Bible. From this Bible were derived the Brixian of 1494; the rabbinical Bibles of Bomberg, 1518—21; and the editions of Munster, 1536; and Stephens, 1539—44.

[2.] The Complutensian Recension, in the famous Polyglot, of 1514—17.—The only edition derived from this source is the Hebrew text of Bertram's Triglott, 1586.

[3.] The Bombergian Recension, in Bomberg's Bible of 1525—28.—The text of this edition was altered throughout, to make it agree with the Masora. It was edited by the celebrated rabbi, Jacob ben Haiim, and gave birth to the following: Bomberg's, of 1528, in 4to., 1533, 1544, and his rabbinical Bible of 1547—49; Stephens', 1544—46; Justinian's, 1551, 1552, 1563, 1573; Elon's, of 1618; DeGava's, 1566, 1568, 1582; Bragandin's, 1614, 1615, 1619, 1628, 1707; Plantin's, 1566; Hartman's, 1595, 1598; and a Wittenberg edition of 1586 or 1587.

[4.] Editions containing a mixed text.—1. The Antwerp Polyglot, 1569, 1572, from which sprang the Paris Polyglot, 1628, 1645; the London Polyglot, 1657; the Leipsic Polyglot, 1750; Arias Montanus's Bible, 1571; Reineccii, 1725, 1739, 1756, and in 1793 by Doederlein and Meisner, with the various readings of Kennicott and De Rossi. 2. The Hutterian text, 1587; from this were derived the texts of Wolder, 1596, and Nisselius, 1662. 3. The Buxtorfian text, 1611; Janson's 1639; Buxi. Rabbinical Bible, 1615, 1619; Amsterdam Rabbinical Bible, 1724. 4. Text of Menasse ben Israel, 1630, 1631, 1645. 5. The text of Joseph Athias, 1661, 1667; from this text is taken that of Clodius, 1677, 1692, 1716; Jablonsky, 1699, 1712; Opitius, 1709; J. D. Michaelis, 1720; and the celebrated edition of Vander Hooght, 1705, of the text of which the following are reprints:—Prop's, 1724; Schmidius, 1740; Houbigant's, 1753; Simonis's, 1752, et freq.; Kennicott's, 1776, 1780; Jahn's, 1806; Boothroyd's, 1810; Frey's, 1812; Hahn's, 1832; and the stereotype edition now printed by Mr. Duncan.

2. GREEK NEW TESTAMENT.—The principal editions of the Greek New Testament may be divided into the more ancient and the more modern: the former are of importance, inasmuch as they are the sources from which so many others have been derived; the latter, because they are the result of a more complete collation of MSS. and editions, and have been conducted on more matured principles of biblical criticism.

(A.) More ancient editions.—1. The Complutensian text, 1514, followed in the Antwerp and Paris Polyglots, and in the editions of Plantin and many others. 2. The editions of Erasmus, 1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, 1535, &c. 3. Stephens', 1546, 1549, 1550; London Polyglot, 1657; Mill, 1707; Kuster, 1710; Bagster's Polyglots. 4. Beza, 1565, 1576, 1582, 1589, 1598; ELZEVIUS, 1624, &c.

(B.) More modern editions.—1. Hell's Greek and English New Testament, 1709, 19. 2. Bengelius's, 1734. 3. Wet- stein's, 1751, 1782. 4. Bowyer's, 1763; Harwood's, 1776, 1784; Matthæi's, Riga, 1782, 1788, 1803, 1804, 1807; Alter's, 1786, 1787; Griesbach's, 1796, 1806, 1809, 1818; Knapp's 1797, 1813, 1824; Vater's, 1824.

VI. BIBLE, Versions of.—The number of translations of the Scriptures is now very great. Some of them are derived from a common origin; some are made immediately from the originals; others are mediate, or versions made from other versions.

(A.) Genealogy of Biblical Versions.

(i.) Versions made immediately from the HEBREW.—1. The Greek of the LXX. 2. That of Aquila. 3. Theodotion. 4. Symmachus. 5th, 6th, and 7th, or the three anonymous versions. 8. The version of St. Mark, Venice. 9. The Samaritan version. 10—17. The different Chaldee Targums. 18. The Syriac. 19. The Arabic of Saadias. 20. That of Joshua in the Polyglot. 21. That of Erpenius. 22. That of Ben Levi. 23. Samaritan-Arabic. 24. Jewish-Arabic. 25. Malay-Arabic. 26. Septuagint. 27. Jewish-Tartar. 28. Jewish-Greek. 29. Jewish-Spanish. 30. Jewish-German. 31—43. The Latin versions of Jerome, (or the Vulgate); Pagninus, Montanus, Malvenda, Cajetan, Houbigant, Munster, Leo, Juda, Castalia, Junius and Tremelius, S. Schmidt, Dathe, Schoett and Winzer. 44—46. German, of Luther, Michaelis, Augusti, and De Wette. 47—50. English, King James's Bible of 1611, Purves's, Geddes's, Boothroyd's, with translations of single books by Louth, Blayney, Horsley, Stock, Goode, and others. 51. Resen's Danish version. 52. Swedish version of 1774. 53. Gaelic. 54. Dutch. 55. Modern Russ. 56. Carniolan. 57. Italian of Bruceioli. 58. French. 59. Polish of Radzivil. 60. Burman of Judson.

(ii.) Versions made from the GREEK.—1—10. The Syriac of the Hexapla; the Philoxenian; Figurata; those of Jacob of Edessa, Mar Abba, Thomas of Heraclæa, Simeon of Licinius, Ephraim Syrus, the Karkuphic, and the Syriac Targum. 11—14. The Arabic of the Pentateuch in MSS.; of the Pentateuch in the Parisian and London Polyglots; of the Hagiographa and the version in use among the Melchites. 15, 16. The Latin, the Itala and Jerome's corrected version. 17. Gothic. 18. Armenian. 19. Slavonic. 20. Georgian. 21. Ethiopic. 22. Coptic. 23. Sahidic. 24. Bashmuric. 25. Anglo-American version, by Thompson. Besides these, with the exception of the Samaritan and the mixed Jewish dialects, here does not exist a language into which the Old Testament has been translated from the Hebrew, which does not possess a translation of the New Testament from the Greek.

(iii.) Versions made from the SYRIAC.—1. The Arabic of Job and the Chronicles in the Polyglots. 2. And various Psalms and Pentateuchs.

(iv.) Versions derived from the LATIN.—1. The Anglo-Saxon. 2. The English versions of Wicliffe and other early translators. 3. That of Rheims. 4—6. The Arabic of Don Juan, Raphael Tuki, and the Propaganda. 7. The German versions, made before the Reformation, and those of Eckius and Uleberg. 8. The French of De Lacy. 9, 10. The Italian of Malermi and Martini. 11, 12. The Spanish of 1478, and 1793—4. 13. The Hungarian by Kaldi. 14. The Polish. 15. The Bohemian. 16. The Portuguese by Peveyra.

(v.) Versions from the GERMAN.—1. The First Danish version. 2. Swedish. 3. Finnish. 4. Icelandic. 5. Pomeanian. 6. Low Saxon. 7. First Dutch. 8. Greenlandic. 9. Esquimaux.

(vi.) Versions from the ENGLISH.—1. The Irish. 2. The Welsh. 3. The Mohawk.

(vii.) From the ETHIOPIC.—The Anharic.

(viii.) From the COPTIC.—An Arabic version in the Maronite monastery at Rome.

(x.) From the SLAVONIC.—The Tchuvashian, Tchermsian, Mordvinian, Carelian, and Zirianic Gospels.

In the absence of authentic accounts, respecting the manner in which most of the more recent versions have been executed, it is at present impossible to determine whether they have been done immediately from the originals, or whether they claim as their parent one or other of the preceding translations.

(B.) History of Biblical versions. We have already mentioned the first translation of the Old Testament by the LXX. Both Old and New Testaments were afterwards translated into Latin by the primitive Christians; and while the Roman empire subsisted in Europe, the reading of the Scriptures in the Latin tongue, which was the universal language of that empire, prevailed everywhere; but since the face of affairs in Europe has been changed, and so many different monarchies erected upon the ruins of the Roman empire, the Latin tongue has by degrees grown into disuse; whence has arisen a necessity of translating the Bible into the respective languages of each people; and this has produced as many different versions of the Scriptures in the modern languages, as there are different nations professing the Christian religion. Besides which, many versions have recently been made by the missionaries and others, for the benefit of the heathen. Of most of these, as well as of the ancient translations, and the earliest printed editions, we shall now take notice in their order.

I. THE ANCIENT VERSION.

1. Anglo-Saxon versions of the Psalms were made by bishop Adhelm, about the year 706, and by king Alfred, who died in the year 900. The whole Bible was translated by the venerable Bede, about the beginning of the eighth century. The Heptateuch, translated by Elfric towards the close of the tenth century, was published at Oxford in 1699; and the Gospels were printed, London, 1571, 1658; Dordrecht and Amsterdam, 1665, 1684.

2. The Arabic.—In this language there exist numerous versions of different portions of the Bible. Of these the more important are the Pentateuch, by Saadias, in the tenth century, and published at Constantinople in 1546. It is printed also in the Polyglots, the text of the other books in which is from unknown authors. The Arabic version of the four Gospels was first published at Rome in 1590, 1591; the New Testament by Erpenius, at Leyden, in 1616, and another under the editorship of Salomon Negri, in London, in 1729. The whole Bible was printed for the Propaganda at Rome, 1671, in three vols. folio.

3. The Armenian version was made towards the close of the fourth century, by Miesrob and Isaac, two of the most learned men of the nation. It was first printed at Amsterdam, 1666, under the care of Uscan, an Armenian archbishop, who has been charged with altering it after the Vulgate. It has since appeared at Constantinople, 1705; Venice, 1805; and Petersburgh and Serampore, 1817. The edition of 1805 is highly critical. The New Testament was first published separately in 1668.

4. Of the Bashmuric, an Egyptian dialect, fragments only have been published, by Pastor Engelbreth, Copenhagen, 1816. They exist in the Borgian museum, at Velitri.

5. The Coptic New Testament was published by Wilkins, Oxford, 1716. The version is of high antiquity, probably from the fourth century, and is greatly esteemed by critics.

6. The Ethiopic version is also supposed to have been made in the fourth century. Separate books of the Old Testament have been published at different times, and in the London Polyglot. The New Testament was first printed in 1548, 1549, but very inaccurately; and indeed the present text of this version, which otherwise would be of great service in biblical criticism, is altogether in such a state, as to be comparatively of little value. That of the Polyglot edition is still more incorrect than the Roman.

7. The Georgian was made about the year 600, by natives qualified for the undertaking, who had spent some time in Greece, and made themselves well acquainted with sacred literature. The first edition of the New Testament was printed at Tiflis about the beginning of last century, and the whole Bible, at Moscow, in 1743.

8. The Gothic version was made by Ulphilas, bishop of the Mease-Goths, about the middle of the fourth century. It comprised all the books of the Scripture; but with the exception of the four Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and some fragments of Ezra and Nehemiah, they have either been lost, or remain undiscovered in some of the libraries of Italy. The four Gospels are preserved in the Codex Argenteus, or "Silver Book," in the university library at Upsala, in Sweden, and were first published by Junius, at Dordrecht, 1665. The last edition, by Zahn, printed at Weissenfels, 1805, is an elegant and complete critical work.

9. Greek of the LXX. (See SEPTUAGINT.)

10. Latin. The Latin versions were numerous, and some of them of high antiquity. The most celebrated are, 1. The Vetus, or Itala, which appears to have been made about the beginning of the second century. Few fragments of it now remain, but such as have been preserved were collected and published from various sources, by Blanchini, Rome, 1720, and Sabatier, Rheims, 1743. 2. The Revised Version of Jerome. Owing to the great confusion which had been introduced into the ancient Vulgate, by the discrepancies existing between the different copies of the Ante-Hexaplar Septuagint, from which it was made, it was found necessary, towards the close of the fourth century, to undertake a revision of it, which task pope Damasus devolved upon Jerome, the first biblical scholar of that age. Of this version only the Book of Job and the Psalms have come down to our times. 3. The New Version of Jerome, now partly contained in the modern Vulgate. This was made from the original Hebrew, and closely follows the rabbinical interpretation at that time current in Palestine, where Jerome made himself thoroughly acquainted with the Hebrew language. It was violently opposed at first, but gradually superseded the less correct translations, and, after the time of Gregory the Great, was universally received in the western church. In the council of Trent, it was declared to be the only authentic text, and the standard by which all disputations, expositions, and sermons were to be tried. It has undergone several revisions, the two most remarkable of which are those made by popes Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. Though the former of these pontiffs had affixed the seal of infallibility to the edition published under his auspices, it was ordered by his successor to be suppressed, as swarming with errors; and another equally infallible edition was brought out, differing from the former in upwards of two thousand instances!

11. The Persic version of the Pentateuch, published in the Constantinopolitan Polyglot, 1540, was made by Jacob ben Joseph, a native of Tus, in Persia, and is not more ancient than the ninth century. It is barbarously servile. The Gospels exist in two Persic translations; that published in the London Polyglot, and that published by Wheeler and Pierson, 1052—57. They are neither of them very ancient.

12. The Schidic version is supposed to have been made in the second or third century, and is considered of great value for critical purposes. The most complete collection of the fragments which we possess of this version was prepared by Dr. Woide, and published at Oxford, 1799.

13. The Samaritan version, made some time between the second and eighth centuries. It is done from the Samaritan text, but the translator has made considerable use of the Targum of Onkelos. It is found in the Paris and London Polyglots.

14. The Syriac versions are four in number:—1. The Peshito, or accurate version, most probably made early in the second century; and, of all the translations now extant, so far as the New Testament is concerned, the most deserving to be thoroughly studied by every biblical scholar. The text of the Old Testament was first printed by Gabriel Sionita in the Paris Polyglot; and the editio princeps of the New Testament by Widmanstap, Vienna, 1555. The most useful edition of the Syriac New Testament is that published by Schaff, with an excellent lexicon: the most convenient and elegant edition is that lately furnished by Mr. Bagster. 2. The Philoxenian, made by Polycarp, the rural bishop of Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis or Mabug, in the government of Aleppo, A. D. 488—508. It is servile in the extreme, but is of great use in determining certain readings of the New Testament. It was published at Oxford, 1778, 1779, accompanied with a Latin translation. 3. The Hexaplar version, made by Paul, bishop of Tella, in the years 616 and 617. Only the books of Joshua, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel have been un-lished. As the name indicates, it was made from the Septuagint text in Origen's Hexapla. 4. The Jerusalem Syriac version, of which some fragments have been discovered and published by Professor Alder.

II. THE MODERN VERSIONS.

1. The Amharic version, undertaken by M. Asselin, French consul at Cairo, is in the royal dialect spoken at the court of Gondar, in Abyssinia, and prevalent in the eastern parts of Africa. The four Gospels were published by the Bible Society, in 1823.

2. The Assamese, in the language of the kingdom of Assam, in the East Indies. The New Testament in this language was printed at Serampore, in 1819.

3. The Basque New Testament was first printed at Rochelle, 1571.

4. The Bikaner New Testament has been published by the Serampore missionaries, for the use of the natives who live to the south of the Punjab.

5. The Bohemian. Of the Scriptures in the Bohemian language, not fewer than fourteen translations have come down to our times. The oldest was made in 1400, and is still preserved in Dresden. The New Testament was first published in 1474, and the whole Bible in 1488. The Protestants have a version made by eight of their learned men, who were sent to Wirtemberg and Basle to study the Oriental languages, and make themselves well acquainted with the principles on which other translations had been conducted. It was first published in 1579—93, in six vols. 4to., at the expense of the baron John Zerotimus.

6. The Brija-Bhassa Gospels have been prepared by the Serampore missionaries, and that of Matthew was finished in 1816.

7. The Bullom version of the four Gospels and the Acts has recently been made by the Rev. Mr. Rylander, a missionary on the west coast of Africa, where that language is spoken. The Gospel of Matthew was printed in 1816.

8. The Bulocha or Bulshée, another Serampore version, made for the use of the natives of Bulochistan, a province in the north-west of India.

9. The Bundelkoonce, undertaken at the same place.

10. The Burman New Testament was translated by Felix Carey, but was lost at sea; a new translation has since been prepared and printed by Mr. Judson, the American missionary in the Burman empire; to which he has added the Old Testament.

11. The Calcutta version of the New Testament has been prepared by Mr. Schmidt of St. Petersburg, and part of it has been printed by the Russian Bible Society.

12. The Canarese New Testament, translated by the Rev. Mr. Hands, into the language of the Carnatic, was printed in 1820. The Old Testament is far advanced.

13. The Chinese. Two versions of the entire Bible exist in the Chinese language; the one executed by Dr. Marshman, 1814—21, the other by Dr. Morrison and Milne, 1812—23. Vast numbers of copies of the New Testament, and separate books, have been circulated among the Chinese who live out of China Proper, or who trade in the Eastern seas.

14. The Cingalese, originally prepared by the Dutch for the inhabitants of Ceylon. The four Gospels were first printed at Colombo in 1739; the entire New Testament, with Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus, in 1783. A new version has been undertaken by the missionaries resident on the island, and part of it has already gone through more than one edition.

15. The Croalese version, made for the use of the negroes in the Danish West India Islands, was published at Copenhagen, 1781, at the expense of the king of Denmark. Another for the use of the slaves in Surinam, has been published by the Bible Society.

16. The Croatian New Testament, by Pastor Truber, was first published at Tubingen, 1551. The whole Bible was first printed at Wittemberg in 1584.

17. The Curdish version of the New Testament is proceeding under the auspices of the Bible Society, but has not yet been completed.

18. The first Danish New Testament, by Mikkelsen, was published in 1524; the whole Bible in 1550. It is one of the best of the European versions of the Scriptures.

19. The Dutch have three versions: the first made from the version of Luther, and published in 1560; the second, which is now commonly in use, and is of high value, was prepared, by order of the synod of Dort, from the original languages. It was first printed in 1637. The third version comprises the New Testament only, and was published for the use of the Remonstrants, in 1680.

20. The Delaware version comprises only the three epistles of John. It was prepared by Mr. Dencke, a Moravian missionary, and printed at New York, 1818.

21. The English Bible. The first English Bible we read of was that translated by J. Wickliffe, about the year 1360, but never printed, though there are manuscript copies of it in several of the public libraries. A translation, however, of the New Testament by Wickliffe, was printed by Mr. Lewis, in 1731. J. de Trevisa, who died about 1398, is also said to have translated the whole Bible; but whether any copies of it are remaining does not appear. The first printed Bible in our language was that translated by W. Tindal, assisted by Miles Coverdale, printed abroad in 1526; but most of the copies were bought up and burnt by bishop Tonstal and Sir Thomas More. Tindal's first publication only contained the New Testament, and was revised and republished by him in 1530. The prologues and prefaces added to it, reflect on the bishops and clergy; but this edition was also suppressed, and the copies burnt. In 1532, Tindal and his associates finished the whole Bible, except the Apocrypha, and printed it abroad; but while he was afterwards preparing a second edition, he was taken up and burnt for heresy in Flanders. On Tindal's death, his work was carried on by Coverdale and John Rogers, (superintendent of an English church in Germany, and the first martyr in the reign of queen Mary,) who translated the Apocrypha, and revised Tindal's translation, comparing it with the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German, and adding prefaces and notes from Luther's Bible. He dedicated the whole to Henry VIII. in 1537, under the borrowed name of Thomas Matthews; whence this has been usually called Matthew's Bible. It was printed at Hamburg, and license obtained for publishing it in England, by the favor of archbishop Cranmer, and the bishops Latimer and Shaxton.

The first Bible printed by authority in England, and publicly set up in churches, was the same Tindal's version, revised and compared with the Hebrew, and in many places amended by Miles Coverdale, afterwards bishop of Exeter; and examined after him by archbishop Cranmer, who added a preface to it; whence this was called Cranmer's Bible. It was printed by Grafton, of the largest volume, and published in 1540; and, by a royal proclamation, every parish was obliged to set one of the copies in their church, under the penalty of forty shillings a month; yet, two years after, the popish bishops obtained its suppression by the king. It was restored under Edward VI., suppressed again under queen Mary's reign, and restored again in the first year of queen Elizabeth, and a new edition of it given in 1562. Some English exiles at Geneva, in queen Mary's reign, viz. Coverdale, Goodman, Gilbie, Sampson, Cole, Wittingham, and Knox, made a new translation, printed there in 1560, the New Testament having been printed in 1557; hence called the Geneva Bible, containing the variations of readings, marginal annotations, &c. on account of which it was much valued by the Puritan party in that and the following reigns. Archbishop Parker resolved on a new translation for the public use of the church, and engaged the bishops, and other learned men, to take each a share or portion; these being afterwards joined together and printed, with short annotations, in 1568, in large folio, made what was afterwards called the Great English Bible, and commonly the Bishops' Bible. In 1589, it was also published in octavo, in a small, but fine black letter; and here the chapters were divided into verses, but without any breaks for them, in which the method of the Geneva Bible was followed, which was the first English Bible where any distinction of verses was made. It was afterwards printed in large folio, with corrections, and several prolegomena, in 1572: this is called Matthew Parker's Bible. The initial letters of each translator's name were put at the end of his part; v. gr. at the end of the Pentateuch W.

E., for William Exon, that is, William, bishop of Exeter whose allotment ended there; at the end of Samuel, R M., for Richard Menevensis, or bishop of St. David's, to whom the second allotment fell; and the like of the rest. The archbishop oversaw, directed, examined, and finished the whole. This translation was used in the churches for forty years, though the Geneva Bible was more read in private houses, being printed above twenty times in as many years. King James bore it an inveterate hatred on account of the notes, which, at the Hampton court conference, he charged as partial, untrue, seditious, &c. The Bishops' Bible, too, had its faults. The king frankly owned that he had seen no good translation of the Bible in English; but he thought that of Geneva the worst of all. After the translation of the Bible by the bishops, two other private versions had been made of the New Testament; the first by Laurence Thompson, from Beza's Latin edition, with the notes of Beza, published in 1582, in quarto, and afterwards in 1589, varying very little from the Geneva Bible; the second by the Papists at Rheims, in 1584, called the Rhemish Bible, or Rhemish translation. These, finding it impossible to keep the people from having the Scriptures in their vulgar tongue, resolved to give a version of their own, as favorable to their cause as might be. It was printed on a large paper, with a fair letter and margin; one complaint against it was, its retaining a multitude of Hebrew and Greek words, untranslated, for want, as the editors express it, of proper and adequate terms in the English to render them by; as the words azymus, tumbe, holocaust, prepuce, pasche, &c.; however, many of the copies were seized by the queen's searchers, and confiscated; and Thomas Cartwright was solicited by secretary Walsingham to refute it; but, after a good progress made therein, archbishop Whitgift prohibited his further proceeding, as judging it improper that the doctrine of the church of England should be committed to the defence of a Puritan; and appointed Dr. Fulke in his place, who refuted the Rhemists with great spirit and learning. Cartwright's refutation was also afterwards published in 1618, under archbishop Abbot. About thirty years after their New Testament, the Roman Catholics published a translation of the Old at Douay, 1609 and 1610, from the Vulgate, with annotations, so that the English Roman Catholics have now the whole Bible in their mother-tongue; though, it is to be observed, they are forbidden to read it without a license from their superiors.

The last English Bible was that which proceeded from the Hampton court conference, in 1603, where, many exceptions being made to the Bishops' Bible, king James gave order for a new one; not, as the preface expresses it, for a translation altogether new, nor yet to make a good one better; or, of many good ones, one best. Fifty-four learned men were appointed to this office by the king, as appears by his letter to the archbishop, dated 1604, which being three years before the translation was entered upon, it is probable seven of them were either dead, or had declined the task, since Fuller's list of the translators makes but forty-seven, who, being ranged under six divisions, entered on their province in 1607. It was published in 1611, with a dedication to James, and a learned preface, and is commonly called King James's Bible. After this, all the other versions dropped, and fell into disuse, except the epistles and gospels in the Common Prayer Book, which were still continued according to the Bishops' translation, till the alteration of the liturgy in 1661, and the psalms and hymns, which are to this day continued as in the old version. The judicious Selden, in his Table-Talk, speaking of the Bible, says, "The English translation of the Bible is the best translation in the world, and renders the sense of the original best, taking in for the English translation the Bishops' Bible, as well as King James's. The translators in King James's time took an excellent way. That part of the Bible was given to him who was most excellent in such a tongue, (as the Apocrypha to Andrew Downs,) and then they met together, and one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned tongues, or French, Spanish, or Italian, &c. If they found a fault, they spoke; if not, he read on." [King James's Bible is that now read by authority in all the churches in Britain.] Notwith-
